"Bless you, sir, no. Beaumont is the best judge of horse-flesh in the country. I won a hundred dollars at the race-course on Kitty the other day, in consequence of Beaumont's tipping me the wink. Perhaps you don't know Kitty's pedigree! She is the offspring of old Sir Alfred; her dam by imp Wonder; granddam by Thunderclap, full brother to the famous old Chanciecler, by Wildair; great, great grandam by old Mark Antony: not to speak of a collateral relationship to Yorick, Blazella, Tippoo Sab, Gohanna, Silver Tail, Violet Fane, and Slammerkins. Well, sir, the match stood five to four on Kitty against Arnold's Whalebone. First heat, Kitty comes off second best—second heat, the conqueror. The third heat comes the tug of war. Riders are mounted—tap goes the drum—bang—they are off. What a dash! Go it, Whalebone! Up with him, Kitty! Whalebone takes the lead. Kitty is close upon him. She makes play. Go it, Whalebone! Don't be alarmed. Keep cool. That's your sort. Kitty shoots ahead. Huzza! She takes the lead—bids defiance to snaffle-gag, bit and rein—she sweeps round the north turn and up the stretch like a streak of lightning. Ten to one on Kitty, and no takers. Round the south turn she comes—down the back stretch—she's at the last turn—she's round it—she's coming up the stretch fifty yards ahead—she's home in three minutes and thirty-five seconds. Egad, isn't she a screamer!"

"Upon my word, a very satisfactory display of erudition. Can you doubt now, madam, that your son is admirably fitted for Cambridge?"

"The dear boy does seem to have been in bad company. Harry, my love, can't you say some Latin to your father? Is there no science that you have made yourself acquainted with?"

"Is it science you want, mother? By the powers, I can show you that same. Here, Domingo," (addressing a favourite servant, who had just entered the room) "put down that salver. Now defend yourself, if you don't want me to bruise your meg, tap your claret, and pitch into your bread-basket—not to speak of gouging and treading on shins."

"Worra, yah, yah, yah! whar did massa Harry get so much brag!" said the black, displaying his grinders, and retreating before the pugilistic passes of the boy, who, driving him into a corner, made a feat of hitting him, and then turned upon his heel, exclaiming:

"There, mother, isn't that science! And as for your 'immortal passado, your punto and your punto reverso,' and then your hit, your most palpable hit, if I am not the boy for it all, pin me to the wall with a pitch-fork, and let me remain there like an impaled beetle."

"You may depend upon it, Mr. Sumpter," said the lady, "Harry is not as ignorant as he would have us think."

"Ignorant, mother! I ignorant! Can't I tell Chateau Margaux from Chateau Lafitte with my eyes shut! Can't I snuff a candle seven times out of nine at ten paces! Can't I leap Kubla Khan over a five-barred gate without stirring in the saddle! Haven't I been elected an honorary member of the Tally-ho Club! Can't I whip my weight in wild cats! In short, haven't I the prettiest sister, the ugliest dog, the sharpest jack-knife, the fastest horse and the longest rifle in all Virginia!"

"Harry, have done with your nonsense, and follow me into the library."

"I shall in all my best obey you, father."

CHAPTER III.

"Farewell! my blessing speed thee on thy journey."

The interview in the library closed in a manner satisfactory both to father and son. Harry's acquirements were found to be much more extensive than his representations would have led one to suppose. He was as shrewd a judge of Homer as of horse-flesh; and he was evidently a mathematician as well as a pugilist; for he manifested as much ability in extracting a root as ever he did in planning a settler.

"My dear mamma," said Harry, as he bounded into the parlour, and seized his mother's hand with a very filial air—"papa and I have fixed upon a plan for settling me in life. We have concluded that it would be most philosophical for me to follow the natural bent of my genius, and the result of our consultation is, that I am to go on to the stage!"

"On to the stage!" shrieked Mrs. Sumpter; "ridiculous! Oh Harry, you are joking. It seems to me—"

"—Seras, madam! say, it is; I know not seems: 'Tis not alone my rinky cloak, good mother, No, nor the fruitful river in the eye, Nor—"

"Why, Harry, this is mere madness."

"Mother, for love of grace, Lay not that flattering unctious to your soul, That not your trespass but my madness speaks."

"Egad, though, wouldn't I produce a sensation! The part of Hamlet by a young gentleman, his first appearance. Mother, you'll come to my benefit!"

"Your benefit, you graceless, ungrateful, good-for-nothing reprobate. To think that a Sumpter should so demean himself! Surely your father—"

"My father! Methinks I see my father."

"Where?"

"In my mind's eye, Horatio."

"Oh, Harry, you will break my heart, if you turn stroller."

Harry began to see that his joke was misapprehended, and that his good mother, as was too much her custom, had taken his remarks au pied de la lettre. He then explained that by going on to the stage, he simply meant going off in the mail coach. At this assurance, Mrs. Sumpter's indignation was considerably allayed; and it ended in downright admiration of the execrating cleverness of her interesting progeny.

"Yes, mother," said the boy, "I actually start to-morrow for Cambridge. The college commencement takes place in a month, and I shall have barely time to pack up and be off."

As soon as the prospect of Harry's departure was brought home to the imagination of the worthy matron, her maternal fondness broke forth in endearing exclamations of sorrow. She could not listen to Harry's going off amongst the horrid Yankees and Yahoos. She couldn't perceive why he did not know enough already, without stuffing his brain with any more Greek and Latin stuff. She could not exist without him, and was very sure that Harry would never live to come back.

"It is all very true," said Harry, with an hysterical sob, and with a very tragic application of his handkerchief to his eyes—"and then I shall miss the race—race races! boo—hooh! and then there are no faro tables in Cambridge—hoo—boo—ugh! and Beau—Beau—Beaumont says the juleps ain't worth a d—n! hoo—boo—hullabaloo!"

"Why you little dissipated wretch," exclaimed the fond parent, changing her tone of condolence to one of astonishment and anger, "you shall go to Cambridge now; and it is a great pity you were not going to be sent upon a voyage round Cape Horn. Joleps and faro tables indeed!" and Mrs. Sumpter left the room to make instant preparations for Harry's departure.

And so he was packed off to college! The last I saw of him he was on horseback following the coach that contained his luggage. He rose in his saddle, gave us a parting tally-ho-ho, and was snatched from view by an angle in the road. I have not yet heard what sort of a figure Harry has made at Cambridge, but I will make it a point to inquire when I am there, and will not fail to apprise the reader of the result of my investigations.

Life would be as insupportable without the prospect of death, as it would be with sleep.

There are no persons capable of stooping so low as those who desire to rise in the world.

They declaim most against the world who have most sinned against it; as people generally abuse those they have injured.

It is more difficult to convince the vicious that virtue exists, than to persuade the good that it is rare.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

FABLES.

THE BEES AND THE WASP.

"What a generous creature man must be!" said a young bee; he feeds us, gives us a shelter, and spares us even when we do him harm. I myself saw the other day, that some of us stung him, when he was giving us food, and yet he did not pause in his act of generosity. What a noble creature he is!"

"What a selfish one, rather!" replied an older neighbour. "He knows very well that he gets his honey back from us with usury; that is the only reason why he feeds us in winter, and forgives our stinging him."

"That is all very well," rejoined a wasp, who happened to fly past; "man is but a selfish animal, after all. I should like to know if anybody ever heard of his feeding us!"

"If he did, he would show greater folly than I supposed him capable of. None but a spendthrift is ever liberal to drones and idlers."

THE KNIGHT AND PAWN.

1.—A Knight at chess looked down triumphantly on a neighbouring Pawn. "A fine time we should have of it, if all our army was made up of such fellows as you! How slow you travel! only look at me once!" so he spoke, and jumped at one spring half across the board. The Pawn said nothing, but crept on, step by step, till it became—a Queen.

2.—This, however, was not the end of it. "Did not yonder idle fellow," said the new Queen, "sneer at my former low estate! Let us see, if he is in a jesting humour now?" She advanced against him, and the poor Knight fell before her, at the very first attack.

3.—"Is not such revenge sweet?" asked the Queen of a neighbouring Castle.

"No doubt it is," was the answer. "But I am sorry to say that it betrays thy original mean extraction. The truly noble never seek revenge."

THE YOUNG WOLF.

A young Wolf, who had ran away from his post in an action with the troops of Duke Leopold, was brought up before the judgment-seat of his majesty, the Lion, and condemned by the angry monarch to receive twelve blows, and to lose one of his ears.

"That for me!" cried the culprit, and knelt down before him—"for me, whose father once saved thy crown and life in a perilous rebellion, and was raised to the highest rank in the realm for his good conduct."

"You are right," said King Lion, smiling, "the son of such a father deserves to be distinguished from other criminals; so let him have four-and-twenty blows, and lose both his ears."

"There are different ideas of justice in both the human and brute kingdom."

THE DOVE AND FOX.

The Dove once obtained the honourable and delicate post of historian to the animal kingdom, and her impartiality was generally praised. Only the Fox, whose tricks she frequently had occasion to mention, deemed himself injured; so he watched for her, and when he caught her, cried laughingly, "Ah, slanderer! your life shall pay the forfeit of your falsehoods!"

"Have pity on me," exclaimed the poor Dove; "I never said anything about you but the exact truth."

"That is the very reason, you fool!—that is the very reason I am going to strangle you."

THE LITTLE GIRL AND HER CHRISTMAS PRESENT.

A little girl once got, among her other Christmas presents, a whip, but it was a beautiful one, all worked with gold and red silk. The poor little thing, who always used to cry as soon as she saw such an instrument, was much pleased with this dubious kind of present, for she thought, "Surely, so pretty a rod cannot hurt so much as others do." So she made a plaything of it, and carried it about with her wherever she went. Unluckily, the very next morning, she did something to displease her mother, who, at once, laid the young lady across her knee, when she found, to her sorrow, that the embroidered rod produced exactly the same effects as the same used to.

The subjects of many a monarch make the same discovery as this little girl.

THE SUN AND THE NEGROES.

"Really, good Sun, you are sometimes too fierce!" cried the people of the warmest region in Africa; "only look, we are fairly burning up."

"Don't let that put you out of temper, my friends," answered the God; "millions on millions of people, who live to the northward of you, would freeze to death, if I was to take away any of my rays from you."

"We are overburdened with business," said Shah Akbar's servants. "So much the better," answered he; "your extra labours enable millions of my subjects to rest in peace."

THE HOLLOW NUT.

"Is this my reward!" cried a Nut, already half hollowed out, to the Wasp that was feeding on it. "I gave thee birth, and thou destroyest me."

"If you only brought me into the world, to let me die of hunger. I do not see that my life was a very valuable present, or deserves any peculiar gratitude," was the answer.

done, but the knights knew better, and Lord Eglintoun (for whom all good-natured people were sorry) had again to apologize for the postponement of the sports.

Friday, however, was a day of uninterrupted sunshine. The gathering of people was as great as on the Wednesday. The stands were crowded as before with persons in the rich and picturesque costumes of former ages, though there was, upon the whole, a larger infusion of modern fashion, as if to challenge comparison with the past, but the comparison was certainly not in favour of the moderns. The grotesque extravagancies of Paris do not show to much advantage alongside of the "millinery and dress-making of former times." Indeed, as a London paper happily enough remarks—"It was impossible to look upon the steel armour of the knights, the gay decorations of the esquires and pages, the quaintly-devised liveries of the retainers and serving-men, and then to survey the assembled crowd (in modern costume) without feeling that the present age, in exchange for the many varied and unspeakable advantages it has conferred, has taken away from us much that in former times must have contributed to grace the beauty and poetry of ordinary life."

The procession this day was really an imposing representation of the dresses, manners and customs five centuries ago. The tilting, however, was, as on the first day, not anything very particular, and scarcely worthy of detailed notice. Lord Eglintoun, who seems to have paid much attention to these martial exercises, came off victor in every contest in which he was engaged.

We except one capital bout, however, between the "knight of the griffin" (Earl Craven) and the "knight of the golden lion," (Captain J. O. Fairlie, from the general charge of tanneries. The appearance of the earl of Craven excited considerable interest, from the circumstance that the armour in which he was sheathed was that which was worn by his ancestor, then baron of Hilton, at the famous battle of Cressy. The first shock between those knights was the finest passage of arms in the whole tournament. Both knights met in full career; the lances of each were shivered, that of his lordship being broken off almost at the gambut's grasp. This gallant action was hailed with loud acclamations by the surrounding multitudes. In the second course both passed without striking. In the third the earl once more splintered his lance, and was declared the victor. The Queen of Beauty's smiles were again in request.

The day's sports concluded by a sort of general mêlée, when the marquis of Waterford and Lord Alford had to be parted by the knight martial of the lute.

The sports were to be renewed on Monday, when, among other attractions, the Irvine archers displayed their skill, and some of the fair damsels exhibited their acquaintance with woodcraft.

Some of the radicals, ultra-utilitarian, or particularly well-soaked editors have got out of temper with the tournament, and pronounced it to be a "humbug." This is uncourteous and unfair. Lord Eglintoun did what man could do to give satisfaction, and his arrangements were made on a scale of princely munificence. If his tournament be pronounced a failure, it must at least be admitted that it was a splendid one. There was no lack of zeal, care, research, perseverance, and prodigal expenditure to make it go off with effect, and if untoward circumstances in some measure marred that effect, it is ungenerous to become captious and querulous about what could not possibly be helped. The weather may be more propitious another time, but the causes of want of complete success lie deeper. These knightly affairs are felt to be at variance with the spirit and manners of the times. A sense of the ludicrous, that most fatal enemy to romance, in some measure overreared the whole of the late exhibition. You may teach steeds to prance, curvet, and caracole, and armour may be furnished as brightly as of yore—and ladies may bestow gloves, and scarfs, and ringlets and smiles and glances, for that is easily done—but it is a more difficult task to kindle imagination, or reproduce enthusiasm, or infuse even a tone of moderate earnestness into knight, damsel, or spectator. There was too evident a lack of sincerity. The whole was too palpably felt, (alas! that we should write it,) to be a mere spectacle. Strip any of the "good and courageous" knights present of their armour, and ten to one but his complete antipode, the modern dandy, with his quizzing-glass, his coldness, and his nonchalance, would stand revealed. The most extravagant piece of quixotism that the most fearless damsel could have looked for from any of them, would have been for him to have renounced his "club," and the most magnanimous piece of self-denial to have abstained from Crockford's or Tattersall's. True was Barker's exclamation half a century ago in reference to Marie Antoinette—"The age of chivalry is past!" and though the feeling still remains, doubtless, in many a gallant breast that would resist oppression to the death, and stand up at every hazard to protect the weak against the strong, still it does not manifest itself in the shape of knight-errantry. Just and equitable laws have rendered individual prowess of less consequence, and insulted and forsaken damsels now-a-days, commence actions at law for the breach of (written) oaths and vows; their knight is a counsellor, and their esquire an attorney, (both valorous and assiduous in proportion to their fee,) and most indignantly does the wordy knight demand remuneration in hard cash for the outraged feelings of injured innocence. No—"The age of chivalry is past!"

In despite of the times, however, the marquis of Waterford intends giving another exhibition next year at Ford Castle, in Cumberland. Well, it is better than throwing away fortunes in the saloons of Paris, on the turn up of dice or the colour of cards, and as far as the noble marquis is concerned, it is better pastime than painting signs or maltreating wenchmen.

METROPOLITAN SKETCHES.

AN HOUR IN TRINITY CHURCH YARD.

Time—ceaseless, corroding time—nations, empires, pyramids, and temples, crumble—yea, DEATH itself fades before thee: semblance of eternity, all hail!

Stranger, if you mourn the march of this mighty conqueror when he lays his broad hand upon relics long revered, stand with me and look your last upon yon tall spire, which is now tottering beneath the attacks of the Vandals who have determined upon its destruction. The walls have already fallen, and lie in mingled heaps amid the tomb-stones, and above the graves which they once overlooked; and now, piece by piece, falls the spire. I watch its demolition as feelingly as I would the last moments of an old companion; it is associated with the recollections of my earliest boyhood, and I cannot witness its destruction unmoved. Many a Saturday's afternoon have I, one of a "school-boy troop," frolicked in innocent glee over the old tombs with our childish games, until the shadow of the old spire grew fainter and fainter across the churchyard, warning us that our sport was over; then, with a shout and a bound, would we clamber over the old fence of wood into Broadway, and disperse to meet again at the same place on the next holiday. On Sabbath mornings, too, how often have I listened to its chiming bells with delight, until it seemed to me that there was a mysterious connexion between religion and the sound of those bells. And on every Fourth of July, "old Reynolds," with patriotic fervour, would leave his beer-shop in Thames-street, and ring a merry peal at morning, noon and night. But they are gone—church, spire, bells, and all—OLD TRINITY is levelled with the dust!

"We never shall look upon its like again."

One bright afternoon, a month or two bygone, (I think it was in June,) I strolled into the old churchyard, to ponder an hour or two over dilapidated monuments and mouldering hatchments, where, as Horace writes,

"Pallida Mors æquale pede pauperum tabernas Regumque turres."

The swelling mounds were dressed in nature's greenest livery, the elm trees and sycamores were in full leaf, and the horse-chestnut was in blossom. The chirp of the grasshopper sounded clear and lively as he leapt out of my path, and the occasional note of some tiny bird, from the branches of the tall trees, mingled with the faint hum that swept from the busy crowd without, and added to the harmony of the scene and senses. It was the resting-place of the dead surrounded by the living. Numberless thousands were here reposing in the long sleep of death whose footsteps had once beat as firmly as those which now fell upon my ear, and probably trod the same broad pavement with as high hopes, and as brief anticipation of death. How little we think of the certain end that awaits us, when we pass the graveyard in the populous city. It is in the hamlet, surrounded by nature undisturbed, where the murmuring brook flows gently, an the forest rears its majesty beauty—where the birds sing their blithesome tunes, and the flowers spring up in prolific luxuriance, that the graveyard awakes contemplation. There we can ponder deeply, and wisely, if we will, upon the mysterious gloominess of death. Remember this, ye denizens of cities, and pass not the tomb without a thought.

I entered the enclosure to the left of the gate towards Rector-street, which is here filled with numerous vaults running the whole length of the church, and comparatively of modern construction, for I scanned over the tablets bearing the inscriptions of their owners, without observing any of the Knickerbocker names of the "olden time." Outside of these commence the graves. I wandered slowly along, reading the various inscriptions upon the headstones; some were to the memory of tiny infants—others sacred to the ashes of octogenarians, many of whom had been buried near a century.—There was a handsome monument, some three feet square, and of proportionate height, open at the four sides, containing a marble urn. On the base of the tomb was an inscription to the memory of Mrs. GRACE LYNE. A plain slab, "Sacred to all that could be lost in a friend and a brother," marked the grave of a Midshipman CARPENTER, who was unfortunately drowned in the discharge of his duty. Some of the stones had sunk so deep in the soil, that the inscriptions were obscured, and the rarely carved death's head was alone to be discovered. A plain oblong monument, slightly elevated, next attracted my attention; I advanced and read the following:

MY MOTHER!

"The trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised."

Touching and simple epitaph—"My Mother!" No other inscription was on the tomb to tell the name of the sleeper, or when she died—filial affection had reared the marble—filial affection had dropped many a tear over the nameless grave. As I stood by the tomb, I thought of my own remaining parent—long, long may it be before I shall be called to write, or read, the inscription upon her monument. A little beyond, lay one who had died before the revolution. I could not help copying the name, for it bespoke a countryman of the first settlers, from the land of Ven Tromp and De Ruyter.

Austrian Moghland.

I next endeavoured to decipher the inscription upon a vault-stone beneath my feet, but I could only trace the outlines of a family crest and coat-of-arms; a age frequent footsteps had so defaced the Latin motto and title, that I could interpret nothing definite, though I believe it belonged to one of the early bishops or rectors of the church.

Yonder is a monument of more pretensions to the name than any that surrounds it. It evidently covers the remains of some personage distinguished while living, or wealth has attempted to leave a name in marble, which nought else could perpetuate. Not that it is lofty, or gorgeous, for it is neither, but it occupies a large space for a crowded churchyard, and its materials are costly. The base is oblong, broad and high, with its corners surmounted by urns. A pyramidal shaped block nearly covers the base; the whole is of white marble, surrounded by an iron railing. It is the grave of one who filled a large space in the early history of the republic, both as a soldier and a statesman—of one who fell in the zenith of his fame, revered and lamented by his countrymen. In the language of one of our own poets, of him it might be truly said,

"Beside his coffin with wet eyes,"

That monument covers the remains of GENERAL ALEXANDER HAMILTON. Approach and read the inscription:

To the memory of
ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
The Corporation of Trinity Church has erected this MONUMENT.

In testimony of their respect for
The Patriot of incorruptible Integrity,
The Soldier of approved Valour,
The STATESMAN of consummate Wisdom,
Whose TALENTS and VIRTUES will be admired
By

Grateful posterity,
Long after this marble shall have mouldered into DUST

He died July 12th 1804 aged 47.

His was no common fall,—in the full maturity of his intellect—possessing a noble ambition—the acknowledged head of a powerful party—fame with all her honours beckoned him on. But the shadow of his greatness darkened the path of one equally ambitious—the rivals met, not separated until the funeral pall obscured for ever the high hopes and burning thoughts of HAMILTON, and the soon of an indignant world crushed for ever the wild ambitions of the living BURN.

We are now at the rear of the church, and the vaults grow more numerous. Here, from the inscriptions, lie the DEARBORNES, DE PEYTERS, JANCYNS, LUDLOWS, GORLETS, LISPERNARS, NICOLLS LIVINGSTONS, CLARKSONS, names familiar in the early records of the city and province, whose descendants still remain, with a pride of ancestry equal to the most aristocratic families of the mother country. They were a good old stock these first settlers, yet it must be acknowledged that the race was not injured by the New-England intermixture. But I forget myself, such reflections are not for the churchyard.

Here are some ten headstones in a cluster, they mark the graves of a family named PEACE.

"The gray-haired man
Beside the infant sleeps."

There is something sacred in the burying of families together, their dust mingles in decay, and in death they are not divided. Wandering a little farther, I espied on a humble sandstone "The grave of JOHN SMITH, who died June ye 17. 1764." Requiescat in pace, honest John Smith, thy name shall live for ever. Here is a vault bearing the name of that brave old veteran soldier, Colonel the hero of Fort Stanwix; he died a few years since, ripe in age and honours. I saw him laid in the earth, and heard the last volley fired over his grave. Next comes a stone covering the dust of several distinguished men, bearing this inscription:

MARINUS WILLETT,

Vault built in 1738
by JAMES ALEXANDER and his descendants, and his son WILLIAM Earl of Sterling and his daughters.

In that vault lie the remains of LORN STERLING, the revolutionary general,—WILLIAM LIVINGSTON, the patriotic governor of New-Jersey, at the same period,—and, also, the body of his son, Judge BROCKHOLST LIVINGSTON, of the Supreme Court of the United States. Distinguished and revered names all.

Yonder, in an angle of the churchyard, stands a pillar so dilapidated that we would imagine the storms of one or two centuries had swept over it. The capstone lies broken within the enclosure, but two slabs remain on the base, the others are in pieces, and the whole looks desolate and drear. Yet, that monument was erected only twenty-five years since to cover the remains of a most gallant but unfortunate naval hero—Captain JAMES LAWRENCE. Shame! to the citizens of New-York, who can open their purses for the purpose of gorgeously entertaining their favourite political partisans, and neglect the shattered tombs of their gallant dead! One of the slabs bears this inscription:

The Hero
Whose remains are here deposited, with his expiring breath, expressed his devotion to his Country.
Neither the fury of battle,
The anguish of a mortal wound
Nor the horrors of approaching death
Could subdue his gallant spirit,
His dying words were
"DON'T GIVE UP THE SHIP."

He fell in the action between the Chesapeake and Shannon, on the first of June, 1813, at the early age of thirty-two. Lieutenant LUDLOW, who fell at the same time, lies buried in the family vault in the vicinity. And this is the end of ambition—a name remembered for a season—six feet of earth, and a broken sepulchre! Pass on. A plain red stone tells us that, "Here lies interred Peter Ireland, Sergeant Major of the Royal regiment of Artillery, who died Oct. 23d 1770 aged 26 years." Some youth, perhaps, who was seduced from his home across the seas by the sound of the "alluring drum," to abandon parents and relatives, in search of the ignis fatuus of fame; and here he fills a forgotten grave, unknowing and unknown! Next comes "James Glassford, Barrack master to the army of his Majesty," in this city, during the revolution. Death at length, it appears, drew the soldier's eternal "billet," and here he lies "quartered" in peace.

"Till he hears the last bugle."

Here is a slatestone bearing an inscription as fresh as if made but yesterday, though more than a century old. It is the grave of a mother and her three children.

Here lyeth ye Body of Mary Arding
With her three Babes at Rest,
I hope the Lord her Cry did here
And granted her Request.
Deed Jan'y ye 3d 1732 aged 25 yrs.

A little beyond is a small granite stone with rude cut letters, erected one hundred and eleven years ago. "Here lyeth ye Body of Willem Light, aged 36. Dec'd Aug ye 7 1728"

We are now at the north side of the church, where the tombs are so numerous that we can hardly clamber along. Most of the stones are of modern date, indeed it is the spot where the latest burials were made. Here is a slab, however, somewhat aged, surmounted by a skull, well carved in alto relievo

H L
1731.

Nameless dead! But, stop—what singular epitaph is this? It would seem to be the grave of a poet—let us read:

Sidney Breeze June 9th 1767,
Made by himself.
Ha! Sidney, Sidney
Liest thou here!
I here lye
Till time is flown
To its extremity.

Ah! the wag—"made by himself." He had no idea of a posthumous epigram. He was right—one may as well know beforehand what is to be inscribed on one's sepulchre, as to trust to the cold indifference of heirs or friends. Farewell, Sidney—thou must have been "a fellow of most exquisite humour"

As I pass along I am struck with the frequent mention of the birthplace of the departed, engraved upon the old tombs. He or she, was the native of such a town, and shire in "old England." The remembrance of the green hills and valleys they should see no more, was perhaps among the last thoughts of the dying, and the humble stone tells, to every passer by, the country and birthplace of the dead!

Here is a tomb, with an inscription as follows:

"Here lies the Body of Mr William Bradford Printer, who departed this life May 23 1752 aged 92 years. He was born in Leicestershire in Old England in 1660; and came over to America in 1682, before the City of Philadelphia was laid out. He was Printer to this Government for upwards of 50 years: and being quite worn out with old age and labour, he left this mortal state in the lively Hopes of a blessed Immortality."

Beneath are a few lines in verse, and an inscription to the memory of his wife, who died in 1731, aged sixty-eight years. And who was WILLIAM BRADFORD! He was the first printer of note in the province—the founder of the gazette edited, a century afterwards, by the lamented JOHN LANE, and still flourishing vigorous and hearty under its weight of years. Franklin, in his own life, mentions Bradford, as the printer he first saw on his arrival from Boston, when a mere boy in pursuit of those fortunes afterwards so celebrated. He described Bradford, at that time, as an old man, of venerable appearance. I believe he was several times imprisoned for publishing political matters offensive to the royal government. Peace to the ashes of the first representative of Faust in the loyal province of New-York

The shades of evening are gathering around me—the crickets have commenced their nightly call from the crevices of the old tombs, and the last rays of the sun are falling upon the tall spire. More rapid and hasty is heard the footfall of the traveller without as he wends his way homeward, to rest from the fretting cares and toils of the day.

Hark! the organ is pealing forth its solemn strains, like a requiem, for the departed. Fit association for the hour and the place! With a lingering look at the old tombs, I pass out of the gateway, and cherish among my recollections of time spent, usefully and well, an hour in TRINITY CHURCH YARD.

H. A. B.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

WONDERFUL CASE OF ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

Gulltown, October 20th.

MR. EDITOR—I am confident that you will not refuse to permit me to make your journal the medium of communicating to the world one of the most extraordinary instances of animal magnetism upon record. Indeed, had I not myself been an eye witness and an ear-witness of the occurrence, I should have been one of the last in the world to give it credit. But you know me well enough, Mr. Editor, to be assured that, from my habits of caution and investigation, I am not a person likely to be made the victim of an imposture—nay, that my habitual skepticism is such, and such my adherence to old established opinions, that it was a long time before I would admit that Mr. Spots, the great orator of our county, was an honest man and disinterested patriot; or that Mr. Prosey, our village-poet, would be remembered when Pope was forgotten; or that Sir Thomas Lawrence couldn't hold a candle to our celebrated portrait-painter, Mr. Daubert. These facts are now universally admitted, but it was not till the proofs were overwhelming that I permitted myself to give them the least credit.

Of course, you know all about our city of Gulltown. It is delightfully situated at the junction of the Great Gumbagee with the Little Mudpuddle, and its population is, by the next census, which will be taken in five or six years, somewhere about twenty thousand. The Great Union railroad passes, or rather will pass, right by the market-house and court-house, both of which are under contract, to be built of our new Keshkoo granite by the famous architect, Mr. Moonshine. The railroad will be commenced the moment that Mr. Bambuzel, the president of our bank, (which will soon go into operation) returns from negotiating the great Gulltown loan in London. Nothing could be more healthy than the location of our city. To be sure, we have a little fever and ague, but every one soon gets so accustomed to that as not to mind it. The rattlesnakes are yearly diminishing, and, in our principal street, it is not once a month that any of our children are bitten by them. The wolves are very harmless, and can be easily driven away by setting fire to the trees. Should you, Mr. Editor, or any of your friends wish to invest anything in house-lots in our thriving little city, you will please apprise me by return of mail, as they will probably be all taken up, should you delay.

But to return to the wonderful case of animal magnetism. The operator was the distinguished Dr. Hummunwell, whose reputation as a man of science and successful practitioner is familiar to everybody. The operator was Mr. Hoaxee of our city, a very promising young gentleman, who has acquired a fortune by his land speculations in Gulltown. The scene of the operation was the bar-room of the Gulltown House, a splendid edifice, which (when finished) will surpass Astor's great hotel in New-York. For some days previous to the affair, Mr. Hoaxee had been somewhat of an invalid in consequence of having indulged a little too freely in the juleps, cobbleries, hairtoms, and other liquid commodities, which may be obtained in such admirable perfection at the Gulltown House. On the afternoon in question, he was sitting before the fire puffing a cigar, when Dr. Hummunwell entered, and after asking for a brandy sling, took a seat by his side, and began to converse upon his favourite topic of animal magnetism. I immediately joined in the conversation, ridiculing the science, and laughing at the whole tribe of believers from Mesmer to Colonel Stone. At length the doctor's pride was roused

"What will you bet," said he, "that I can't throw our friend Hoaxee here into a magnetic sleep—nay, carry him as far as the tenth stage, which is that of transcendental lucidity?"

"Pooh, nonsense!" I replied. "It is impossible."

"Will you bet me a bottle of old Monongahela that I can't?"

"Yes, a dozen bottles."

"You hear him, gentlemen! He bets a dozen bottles. You will decide who is the loser."

The doctor then commenced manipulating his subject, passing his forefinger and thumb slowly from the shoulder to the waist. To my utter surprise, five minutes had not elapsed before Mr. Hoaxee was sound asleep.

"There, gentlemen," said the doctor, "he is now in the third, or somnambulatory stage, when he is perfectly passive to the exercise of my will. I can converse with him now without the agency of the voice, through the medium of simple volition. Of course he cannot hear a word that you may say, neither anything that I may say, without I will it. Suppose I now put the question to him mentally whether he will lend me a couple of thousand dollars. You will see by the expression of his countenance how he takes my inquiry."

Without speaking a word, the doctor then put the question. What was our amazement at seeing an expression of strong reluctance and displeasure come over the countenance of the magnetized patient!

"And now, gentlemen," continued the doctor, "I will say something different. I will say—'Hoaxee, let us take a drink.' You will notice whether or no his countenance changes."

Again did the doctor look hard at the sleeping man, and, without uttering a syllable, make the proposed remark. Will you believe it!—The face of the patient immediately brightened, and he held forth his hand as if to receive a tumbler.

"I will now, gentlemen, with your permission," continued Doctor Hummunwell, "carry my patient through the intermediate stages into that of transcendental lucidity—a stage, wherein he can not only see things a thousand miles off, but things a thousand years off!"

The doctor then, with his forefinger, made a few circles round the head of the patient, until the latter sneezed and opened his eyes. This was the consummation the magnetizer had been waiting for.

"Now then, we shall have a little peep behind the great curtain," said the doctor, rubbing his hands. "First, he shall go to New-York, and tell us what is going on there. Hoaxee, just do me the favour to take a jump into Broadway, at the head of Wall-street, and let me know what they are about."

I need not describe our amazement on hearing Hoaxee reply: "Blow me, but they are tearing down old Trinity church. Clouds of dust and mortar are flying about. 'Broadway up! Broadway up!' cry the omnibus boys. The street is crowded with vehicles of all kinds. 'Here's the Evening Tattler—only one cent,' shouts an urchin under my nose."

"Buy it, Hoaxee, and read us the news," interrupted the doctor. To our increased wonder, the patient took a cent from his pocket and threw it down, and then, seeming to read from a newspaper, continued:

"The new Metropolitan theatre, watch returns, Major Noah, Marsh's last, grand spectacle at the Bowery, Stephen Price and the press, Vandenhoff's Hamlet, great fire, new Wellensm, capital number of the Mirror, etc.—nothing new."

"Enough, Hoaxee; now, if you please, just pitch into the middle of next year, and take a walk through Wall-street, and tell us what you see."

You may partially conceive of our astonishment, Mr. Editor, when Mr. Hoaxee, without more ado, complied with this extraordinary request. The architecture of the street he described in the most amusing and minute manner, expressing his admiration, in the warmest terms, at the appearance of the new exchange and the custom-house. No sooner had he completed his description than the doctor requested him to push ahead as far as the year 1900, and to walk into the first hotel he might come across in Broadway, and read the newspapers.

I will close my present communication, Mr. Editor, by furnishing you with some of the extracts which Mr. Hoaxee read to us from "The Great Western Gazette" of 1900. The size of the sheet, according to Mr. Hoaxee's asseveration, was sixteen feet by twenty-five, and it was sold for a penny. As he read the different paragraphs, I took them down in short hand, and they form, as you may suppose, a series of most remarkable revelations. It is unnecessary to add, that I lost my bet to Dr. Hummunwell, and readily paid it in return for the very curious information I was enabled to gather:

From the Great Western Gazette.

DISASTROUS CONFLAGRATION.

The great fire in Seventy-first-street, last night, was distinctly visible to the inhabitants of both extremities of our insular city. The new Manhattan theatre, built to hold ten thousand people, was totally destroyed. The fire is supposed to have originated from the combustibles employed in the representation of Mr. Fitzduster's splendid drama of "The Demon of the Volcano," which was produced last evening, for the six hundredth time, to an overwhelming house. The magnificent wardrobe of our great native tragedian, Mr. Tarett, was wholly destroyed; and Miss Teetoom, the danseuse, lost about fifty thousand dollars in dresses, slippers, rouge, etc. It is expected that a new theatre, on a much larger scale, embracing three whole squares on Eighty-seventh-street, will be erected before the close of the week. In the meantime, the Manhattan company will be engaged at the old Metropolitan theatre, corner of Chambers-street and Broadway.

AERIAL ACCIDENTS.

During the tremendous hurricane of last Wednesday, the balloon cars "President" and "Great Western" came in contact about ninety feet over the town of Saratoga. A hundred passengers were thrown out of the cars by the collision, and precipitated to the earth. The ground about the Congress-hotel was found strewn with limbs the next morning. In consequence of the temporary withdrawal of these two aerial locomotives from the route, the St. Louis papers of yesterday have not yet been received.

FROM THE EAST.

The Boston papers of this morning state that there is at length a prospect that the Bunker Hill Monument will be completed. The old foundation, however, is found to be so dilapidated that it will be necessary to raise three or four hundred thousand dollars more, before the work can be recommenced. It is feared that this will delay operations two or three years longer. A Boston paper very significantly and appropriately remarks: "The completion of this monument has been so long deferred, that people have forgotten what it was meant to commemorate." We honestly confess our ignorance upon this head? Can any of our antiquarian friends enlighten us?

USEFUL INVENTION.

The late accident which befel the balloon cars, near Saratoga, reminds us that Mr. Gungum continues to manufacture his "indiarubber safety parachutes," at his splendid establishment, corner of Fourteenth-street and Broadway. By means of one of these admirable articles, our worthy fellow-citizen, Major Bluff, succeeded in descending to the ground safely with his wife and children on the occasion of the late deplorable accident. We refer our readers to Mr. Gungum's advertisement at the bottom of fifteenth column of the third page of this day's paper.

FATAL RENCONTRE

A Chicago paper states that a fatal rencontre took place last Tuesday between Mr. Spitfire, the editor of the "Independent Screamer," and Mr. Slash of the "National Scapling Knife." The parties fought with battle-axes, and the engagement, which was extremely desperate, lasted ten minutes. The first round ended in both parties losing an ear and a part of the jaw-bone. Many terrible gashes were then given and received, till the heads of both were nearly severed from the shoulders—when, throwing aside their axes, the infuriated combatants grappled each other by the throat, and fell mortally wounded, each with the other's head in his arms. This occurrence," says the Chicago Courier, "has thrown a gloom over our peaceful city."

WHERE IS THE BLAME?

We wish that our new postmaster-general would be a little more attentive to the duties of his station. Our New-Orleans papers do not reach us till two days after their publication. A letter from a friend in the city of Oregon, dated October twelfth, did not reach us till the twentieth. This remissness is altogether too bad.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Damsel of Darnley. By the author of "The Yemassee," "Guy Rivers," "Malchamps," etc. etc. New York, Philadelphia, Lea and Blanchard.

From the size and appearance of this work we should judge that the present was the most ambitious and successful incursion into the realms of romance, that the author has yet made. Mr. Simms wields a pen of no ordinary power. He is one of the most affluent writers of the day. His imagery is lavish and beautiful, and his style bold, expressive and diffuse. If we were called upon to name a defect, we should say that the principal was a want of condensation and sententiousness. He is sometimes circumlocutory when he should be abrupt. But his style has its advantages. His colours are laid on with so liberal a hand, that fine effects are often produced where none were premeditated. There are some splendid scenes in this highly-wrought romance. The description of the hurricane in the first volume is masterly. The dramatic interest of the story is skilfully excited, and the characters are sketched with much spirit and ability. This will be one of the most popular of the author's works.

Calidore; A Legendary Poem: By William J. Pabodie. Boston: Marsh, Capen, Lyon and Webb. Pp. 48.

"Calidore" is the title of a poem pronounced by the author before the society of United Brothers, of Brown University. The blank verse of Mr. Pabodie is occasionally a little too prosaic, but the principal poem is marked by many highly poetical thoughts and melodious passages. The story is interesting and well told. The following line from the German of Goethe possesses an indefinable charm:

SONG.

Many thousand stars are burning
Brightly in the vault of night,
Many an earth-born heart is yearning
Upwards with a fond delight.
Stars of beauty, stars of glory,
Radiant wanderers of the sky,
Wary of the world's sad story,
Ever would we gaze on high.

The following extract is a favourable specimen of the longer poem:

O, when the heart is torn, when, one by one,
The forms to which it clung are swept away,
If but a single object still remain,
Unharm'd amid the storms of time and death,
How doth it stretch its severed tendril forth—
And twine around the sole-remaining hope—
With what a deep intensity of love,
With what an anxious fondness! Such her true,
Unshar'd devotion to this opening flower.
Nor was the boy unworthy of a love
Even such as this—from his earliest years,
He was a patient and a gentle child.
Nor his the patience that doth oftoms spring
From the soul's torpor—for his spirit lyre
To each, the slightest breeze that swept its chords
Answer'd responsive—but in part it rose
From that overflowing kindness of heart,
That generous love for all things animate,
Which, of itself regardless, would not pain
The least of all its fellows; and in part
From the possession of a soul which found
A world within itself, and need not
The aid of outward circumstance to wake
Its myriad emotions.

Hunt's Mercantile Magazine, and Commercial Review. Published by Freeman Hunt, 142 Fulton-street.

We are especially pleased to witness the continued success of this magazine. But it has not surprised us. It was a novel experiment, yet filling so wide a gap in our literature that we expected its triumph, dependent of course on the talent and enterprise invested in its management. These have been abundantly bestowed, and the magazine is no longer a doubtful experiment. Every number has been replete with sound mercantile exposures and clear and comprehensive statistics. The October number before us fully equals its predecessors. "What constitutes a Merchant?" by Charles Edwards, Esq., is an eloquent and luminous essay upon the dignity of a mercantile life. Mr. Aldrich has contrived a sound paper on the moral law of contracts; and the history of navigation, by E. C. Ward, Esq., is worthy of its place in the magazine.

Morton's Hope, or the Memoirs of a Provincial. In two vols. New-York: Harper and Brothers.

We are late in the field in our notice of this highly successful romance. The public have already passed their verdict upon its merits, by buying up a large edition. The style is sententious and spirited; and the descriptions and characters, with which the work abounds, are full of animation, variety and interest. We have never met with so graphic and amusing a picture of life in a German university as is here contained. The duelling scenes, the aesthetic parties at Gottenburgh, and the adventures at Prague, are all described with extraordinary power and originality. These volumes have been republished by Colburn of London, and have been praised in the highest terms by the principal English journals. We believe it is no longer a secret, that the author of "Morton's Hope," is Mr. J. L. MORTLEY, a young lawyer of Boston, and a brother-in-law of Park Benjamin, the well-known writer of this city.

"The Courtes of the Days of Charles I." With other Tales. By the author of "Mrs. Armitage," "Stocks and Place," "Mary Raymond," etc. In two vols. New-York, Harper and Brothers.

Another new novel from the pen of Mrs. Gore will doubtless excite a fair share of public attention. These volumes are far superior in interest to most of the previous productions of the author, and we can sincerely commend them to the reader as composed with more than ordinary ability. These stories are of a character highly interesting and dramatic.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We are gratified to find that our last number, embellished as it was with one of the most beautiful plates ever executed in this country, has given universal satisfaction. Good as that number unquestionably was in its literary contents, (thanks to our correspondents,) the present will be found, we hope, equally interesting. We have some pictorial novelties in preparation, which we shall soon have the pleasure of announcing. The excellent paper, by John T. Irving, Esq., entitled "A Legend of Long Island," shall appear in our next. Our musical page will closed next week with a beautiful, original "Romanza" by Bassini. It has, while in manuscript, excited the admiration of many distinguished amateurs.—"An Old Contributor" has effectively diagnosed both his handwriting and his style. His verses are a little too carelessly put together for our purposes.—"We have no disposition to embark in the stormy controversy which our correspondent "C." seems disposed to excite. A letter from a "Member of the Dramatic Club" is full of unprovoked slanders. We wonder that the writer could imagine, for a moment, that he could make the Mirror his organ of communication. The verses by "West Point," the story by "X," and the stanzas to a popular prima donna by "L. Y." are respectfully declined.—An immense quantity of poetry lies under our table, subject to the disposition of the writers.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1839.

The late William Dunlap.—We should not omit to take a more detailed notice, than has yet appeared in our columns, of one who has occupied, during the last century, a considerable space in the eyes of the world of art and of literature. The Commercial Advertiser contains the following biographical allusions, and we trust that a more minute account, from a competent hand, will soon be offered to the public.—"As an artist, Mr. Dunlap occupied a respectable rank, and as a man of letters a distinguished one. He early turned his attention to painting, and his portrait of Washington—a crayon sketch—is believed to be the oldest picture of that illustrious man extant. His latter and greater works of art were the "Christ Rejected," and the "Crucifixion," painted after the designs of West, from the etched outlines, which only he had seen. Some of his portraits had considerable merit, as for example that of the late Thomas Eddy, painted for the New-York Hospital. His Jack Lawton, painted as an illustration of one of Cooper's characters in the Spy, is also very clever. He had a strong love for the drama, and did much towards its elevation in this country. He was, for years, the principal manager of the old John-street theatre, and we believe, also, for a time, of the Park. But his reputation as a man of letters will be the most enduring. The productions of his pen have been numerous, and his works are to be found in the several departments of the drama, biography, history and fiction. His first biographical work, we believe, was the life of Charles Brockden Brown—which was soon followed by the life of George Frederick Cooke. More valuable still were his two able works of mingled history and biography, the History of the American Stage, and the History of the Arts of Design in the United States. His more recent works, with the exception of that clever and wholesome fiction, "The Cold Water Man," have been historical. About four years ago he published a valuable compend of the history of the state of New-York, for the use of schools, and at the time of the attack of paralysis, which has eventually carried him off, he was engaged upon, and had almost completed, a large history of the state. The first volume of this work has been published, and the second we are told is nearly out. We think it will be a valuable acquisition to our store of history—especially as a repository of facts. It was as a collector of these rather than as a brilliant writer that Mr. Dunlap excelled. His diligence and his patience in research were remarkable and untiring. His mind was clear and vigorous down to the time of his attack by diseases, and his memory was a grand store-house of facts and anecdotes, personal and historical. Hence he was one of the most interesting companions in conversation often to be met with."

Mr. Powell.—This young artist has returned from the far west, and brought with him some admirable sketches of well-known characters. We saw upon his easel the other day, the portrait of a lady, whose features were so strikingly delineated that a bystander wondered she did not speak! Powell is an extraordinary lad. His "Vanderhoff as Cato" is a masterpiece, and all the recent productions of his pencil show a great improvement upon his former efforts. He is destined to take the highest rank in his profession. His rooms are at number ninety Chamber street.

The opera at the National theatre.—The return of the operatic corps, and their appearance at Niblo's theatre, have been greeted by well-filled houses. The opera of "Amilce" appears to have lost none of its attractions; and the substitution of Mrs. Henry Wallack, in the part of Zeila, has added materially to the strength of the cast. Miss Shirreff is as much a favourite as ever, and was never in better voice. Wilson and Seguin have also a due share of public applause bestowed upon their vocal efforts. The opera was never more popular in the city than at present.

Bowery theatre.—This establishment, which has long maintained a melodramatic celebrity, appears to be now almost the sole stay and support of the legitimate drama in this city. We have alluded to the production of the classical tragedy of Douglas. With equal care and skill, Massinger's celebrated play of the "Fatal Dowry" has been produced, and Mr. Hamblin has won new laurels in the part of "Romont." Hamlet, Romeo and Juliet, and other Shakspearian plays, are frequently brought forward at this establishment to good houses and in excellent style. Nor is melodrama wholly neglected, as the revival of "The Bronze Horse," in a manner never surpassed in splendour, abundantly proves.

Dahlia.—We regret that we did not visit the establishment of Mr. Thorburn at Hallo's Cove earlier in the season; but, even at this late period, we were struck with astonishment at the wonderful beauty displayed on entering the garden. Here, at a glance, the eye embraces three thousand named dahlia plants, in full flower, many of the very latest kinds, from the brilliant scarlet of the fire-ball, through every shade and combination of red, lilac, pink, and white, to the dazzling fairness of Helen of Troy. We understand that gentlemen from England, who have witnessed the most celebrated exhibitions there, have expressed the highest admiration at the unequalled splendour of this, as excelling everything they had seen in that country. Indeed, our climate is so congenial to the habits of the dahlia, and the present season has been so remarkably favourable, that the plant has seldom arrived at greater perfection. It is idle to quarrel with the dahlia for its absence of odour; many flowers are equally deficient in this respect, and the hymeneæ camellia, certainly the most lovely flower in the world, is utterly scentless. We are pleased to see the taste, we might almost say passion, for this fine flower so rapidly extending. A few years ago, and it was scarcely known; but now there are few gardens in New-York or its neighbourhood, or in our beautiful "sister city of the woods," Brooklyn, which cannot boast of its dahlia.

A new opera.—A few days since we attended a private rehearsal of an original opera, called "The Peri, or the Enchanted Fountain," written by S. J. Burr, Esq., and the music composed by Mr. Maeder. The history of it is as follows:—Ponce de Leon, first governor of Porto Rico, sets out in pursuit of an enchanted island, where he has been told by a witch he will find Mathilde, a Spanish maiden he was betrothed to some twenty years previous. He is shipwrecked; but preserved with all his crew by Peris. He finds Mathilde and rescues her from a monster. She is as young as ever, and he becomes young again by drinking the magical waters of the fountain, and the piece ends by a general rejoicing. The principal character (the soprano) is the queen of the Peris. We were delighted with both the words and the music, and have no hesitation in pronouncing the entire production a graceful, light, and successful composition.

Concerts.—During the last fortnight, Mr. Knight has given two successful concerts at the City-Hotel. Mr. Russell's was, notwithstanding the inclemency of the evening, fully attended, as his concerts always are. The grand vocal and instrumental concert given by Mr. Rakemann, at which Mr. Russell and several eminent artists assisted, also attracted a large audience, and the performances of Mr. Rakemann upon the pianoforte were applauded to the echo. The opinion seems to be universal, that Mr. Rakemann is the most accomplished master of the instrument now in America.

Audubon's Gallery.—We are glad to learn that the gallery of drawings opened by our distinguished naturalist and artist, Audubon, at the Lyceum in Broadway, is well and fashionably attended. Audubon is a man of genius, and he has done more for the science of ornithology than any man since the days of Wilson. He deserves well at the hands of his country. We hear that the zoology of America is about to claim his study and attention. No man is better fitted for illustrating this department of natural science.

Wallack's new theatre.—The subscription to the new theatre to be erected on Broadway, between Chamber and Read streets, comes bravely on. There is a fair prospect that a splendid new metropolitan theatre, far surpassing all similar establishments in the country, will be ready for Mr. Wallack and his company by August next. The hard times may protract the commencement of the undertaking a few months, but we have confidence that the enterprise will be successfully carried through before the next theatrical season.

Evening Signal.—This is the title of a new penny paper, superbly printed, which has sprung into existence within the last month, and has already attained a circulation unsurpassed in extent and respectability by that of any daily paper in the city. By the exclusion from its columns of all improper advertisements and offensive reports, it has already found a welcome admission into the parlours of a great proportion of the fashion and intelligence of the city. It is conducted by the original editors of the Tatler and Brother Jonathan.

Park theatre.—Monsieur Alexandre, the "wonder of the world," will commence an engagement at the Park theatre on Monday evening next. If the testimonials of such individuals as the queen dowager of England, Lafayette, Walter Scott, Thomas Moore, Miss Edgeworth, and the Countess Blessington, are to be relied upon, Monsieur Alexandre must be the most astonishing performer that has ever crossed the Atlantic.

The Tatler and Brother Jonathan.—The proprietor of these journals has, since the withdrawal of their late conductors, engaged the services of Messrs. Davies, Otis, Walsh and More, as editors and contributors. With such support, they must continue to maintain their claims upon public attention.

The New World.—An immense weekly sheet, published on Saturdays, containing all the matter of the Evening Signal, and printed in a style of remarkable neatness and elegance. It has been received by the public with an extraordinary degree of favour, and fully merits its success.

Militia fines.—A daily paper has been launching its ridicule at our militia system in an amusing style. Its main objection appears to be to the fines imposed in consequence of any disobedience to militia exactions. Defective as the system may be, it will, we fear, be difficult to contrive a better.

THE ARAB.

ANDANTINO CON ESPRESSIONE.

The noon-tide blaze on the de-sert fell, As the tra-vel-ler reach'd the wis'h'd-for well, But vain was the hope that had cheer'd him on, His hope in the de-sert—the wa-ters—were gone, His hope in the de-sert—the wa-ters—were gone.

SECOND VERSE.

Faint-ing he call'd on the Ho-ly name, And swift o'er the de-sert an A-rab came, And with him he bore of that bless'd thing That fail'd the poor tra-vel-ler at the spring, That

THIRD VERSE

fail'd the poor tra-vel-ler at the spring, 'Drink!' said the A-rab, I must fast, For half of my jour-ney is not yet past, 'Tis far are my home and my chil-dren I see, But the FOURTH VERSE.

crystal trea-sure I'll share with thee, The crystal trea-sure I'll share with thee, 'Nay,' said the wea-ry one, 'let me die, For thou hast e-ven more need than I, And chil-dren that are hast thou

FIFTH VERSE.

watch-ing for thee, And I am a lone-one, none watch for me, And I am a lone-one, none, none watch for me, 'Drink!' said the A-rab, 'my chil-dren shall see Their fa-ther re-tur-n-ing, fear not for me, For HE who has sent me to thee this day, Will watch o-ver me on my de-sert way! Will watch o-ver me on my de-sert way!

MISCELLANY.

LINES FOR MUSIC.—ONE FACE ALONE.

One face alone, one face alone,
These eyes require;
But, when that longed-for sight is shown,
What fatal fire
Shoots through my veins a keen and liquid flame,
That melts each fibre of my wasting frame!

One voice alone, one voice alone,
But, when its meek mellifluous tone
Usurps mine ear,
Those slavish chains about my soul are wound,
Which ne'er till death itself, can be unbound.

One gentle hand, one gentle hand,
I fain would hold;
But, when it seems at my command,
My own grows cold;
Then low to earth I bend in sickly swoon,
As lilies drooping mid the blaze of noon.

STATE OF THE THERMOMETER.—"How does the thermometer stand?" asked a father of his son. "It don't stand at all, sir—it hangs," was the reply. "Well, but I mean how high is it?" "Just about five feet from the floor." "Pooh! you fool—how does the mercury range?" "Up and down—perpendicular."

A GOOD ONE.—"A Mister," said a Johnny Raw, from New-Jersey, who lately visited the Argus office, "don't folks pay for their paper without dunnies? I guess if I was a printer, I'd tickle 'em with an oat straw. Why, my father takes the paper, and I've heard him tell mother he'd just as lief catch the parson as the printer."

HONESTY.—A knavish attorney asked a very worthy gentleman what was honesty? "What is that to you? meddle with those things which concern you."

INCLEDON AND SUETT.—Charles Incledon, who was better known as a vocalist than as a wit, being one day at Tattersall's, Richard Suett, the comedian, who also happened to be there, asked him, "whether he had come to buy a horse?" "Yes," said Charles; "but why are you here, Dickey? Do you think you should know the difference between a horse and an ass?" "O yes," replied the comedian; "if you were among a thousand horses, I should know you immediately."

DALIAS.—Dalias are like the most beautiful women without intellectuality; they strike you with astonishment by their exterior splendor, but are miserably destitute of those properties which distinguish and render agreeable less imposing flowers. Had nature given the fragrance of the rose or stock to the dahlia, it would have been the most magnificent gem of the garden; but, wanting perfume, it is like a fine woman without mind.

LOUIS PHILIPPE.—The king of the French withdraws the annual allowance hitherto paid by his government to the Italian Opera. The present manager's contract expires next year, and so many persons have applied to conduct the theatre at their own risk, that the usual allowance of the whole rent of the theatre will also be discontinued.

WAPERS.—The oldest letter yet found with a red wax was written in 1694, from D. Knap, at St. Lucia, to the government at Bayreuth. Wafers are ascribed, by Lahet, to Genesis economy. In the seventeenth century they were only used by private persons; and public seals commenced only in the eighteenth century.

ARTIFICIAL MEMORY.—A humorous comment on such systems was made by a waiter at an hotel where Femaigle dined after having given his lecture on artificial memory. A few minutes after the professor left the table, the waiter entered with uplifted hands and eyes, exclaiming—"Well, I protest the memory-man has forgotten his umbrella."

SINGULAR ADVERTISEMENT.—A lady advertises for sale, in a southern paper, one baboon, three tabby cats, and a parrot. She states that, being married, she has no further use for them.

THE INDIAN MAIDEN.

"Brave son of a chieftain! beloved Cherokee!
This war-bell of wampum is promised to thee;
Long, long may it flutter and shine on thy breast—
My bravest and brightest, my wisest and best!"

"Tis woven with coral, with beads and with shells,
It shall be on thy heart the most potent of spells,
To save thee from ambush, to shield thee from harm,
To quicken thy sight, and give strength to thine arm.

"Rejoice in battle! what forest or stream
Sees thy heron-plume wave, and thy tomahawk gleam!
Does the Father of Waters sweep on thy sharp prow!
Sure thrasher of dark woods! oh, where art thou now?"

"Dost hunt the fierce bison, or shoot the fleet deer!
O'er the prairie's wide level dost bend thy career!
Or, worn with the heat and the toil of the chase,
Does the mist of the catarract moisten thy face?"

While thus spake the maiden, an eagle who beat
The clouds with his pinions, fell dead at her feet;
And the arrow, which reach'd him, young mounting so free,
Was sped from the bow of the young Cherokee.

FROM A FRAGMENT OF GALLUS.

Thou com'st to me by moon, my love,
And thou art brighter far
Than the new light; and, f by night,
Than Hesper's rising star

Published every Saturday, at No 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. Terms, FIVE DOLLARS per annum, payable, in all cases, in advance. Advertisers must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

G. P. Scott, Printer, corner of John and Gold-streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR. SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NO. 1 BARCLAY-STREET, NEAR BROADWAY. PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

VOLUME SEVENTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1839.

NUMBER NINETEEN.

For the New-York Mirror.

DEATH.

BY CHARLOTTE H. YANDENHOFF.

Why art thou dreaded, monarch of the grave?
When we behold thy unrelenting grasp,
Making the Great one dust—thy seal triumphant
Stamped on pale Beauty's brow,—why do we weep?
When thou art named, why does the Mother turn
That quick and fearful glance on the bright group
Sporting so gaily round her cheerful hearth?
Are not their limbs all full of life and health?
Are not their cheeks as soft moss-roses bright?
Sounds not their merry laugh like pealing bells
Ringing a holiday to those who toil?
Why does she clasp them in her arms, as though
Thy dart could not avail against the shield
Of such a love as hers? Why does she part
The ringlets from their brow, with gaze so fixed,
So searching in their eyes, as though she'd read,
In that clear, stainless page, their fate, and learn
If their sweet voices and their bright orbs could Be stilled or closed by thee?—And what think they,
The little ones? What knows a child of Death?
Oh! nought! Should Death's dark shadow fall between
The young warm heart and joy! The playful ones
Twine their fair arms around the mother's neck,
And raise their shining eyes with love to her:
While hers, the Mother's eyes grow dim, and tears
Fall from them; and she prays that heaven will spare
Her cherubs to her love, nor doom them yet
To fill the dark, cold grave! Why does she so!
Were they not made for Thee? Are not their souls
Sinless? and free from all that might offend
Or bar them from their God?—
Fell monarch of the world! onward thou comest
With rapid strides, thy foot-fall echoes!
Age—youth—thy prey! And thou dost bear us—whither?

That dark uncertainty—that undefined—
That awful Future, which thy hand unveils,
We shrink from more than thee! Thou'rt but the end
Of sorrow—Grief's all-dreamless sleep,—unto
Our mortal eyes! But to the soul thou opest
A state that knows no change—lasting for aye!
A cloudless day—or night that sees no star

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE DEAD GUEST.

BY HEINRICH ZSCHOKKE.

CHAPTER V.

THE dead guest was the only thing talked of at dinner all over town. Curiosity was raised to the utmost, and everybody looked forward anxiously to the evening when a social meeting was to take place at the burgomaster's, when there would be an excellent opportunity to learn everything that had happened from the recorder's lady, who made it one of the duties of her office to have the new news of everything that happened in Herbesheim. Herr Bantes was prevented from joining the circle at once, by a visit from one of his workmen. While they were talking together, a piercing shriek was heard, followed by profound silence.

"Go and see what's the matter, Paul," said Herr Bantes. The workman went, and returned in a few minutes with a discomposed air, and could only whisper, tremblingly, "Some one that wants to see you."

"Come in!" cried the burgomaster, impatiently. Paul opened the door, and a stranger walked in with great deliberation. He was a very tall, spare man, dressed in black, with pleasing features, but deadly pale. A black silk cravat rendered the paleness still more corpse-like. The neatness of his dress, the fineness of his linen, the superb rings that glittered on his fingers, and the ease of all his movements, indicated that the stranger belonged to the upper classes of society.

Herr Bantes stared fixedly at the stranger. He saw the dead guest, in propria persona, before him, but recovered himself as well as he could, and, as he bowed to the stranger with somewhat anxious politeness, told the workman not to leave the room.

"I am happy, Herr Bantes, to have the pleasure of knowing you," said the stranger, slowly and quietly. "I should have had the honor of waiting on you immediately on my arrival, but that I needed rest after my journey, and for the fear of intruding upon you too soon."

"Much obliged, much obliged!" answered the burgomaster, in some confusion. "But"—an involuntary shudder came over him. He could not trust his own eyes. He offered the stranger a chair, wishing to himself all the while that he was a thousand miles off. The stranger bowed deliberately, took a seat, and said: "You do not know me; but you doubtless can guess who I am?"

Herr Bantes felt as though his hair was lifting the very wig off his head. He shook his head in fear, and said, with forced politeness: "I have not the honour of knowing you."

"My name is Hahn, the son of your old friend," rejoined the visitor in a hollow voice, and smiled on the old man in a way that made his blood run cold.

"Have you a letter from your worthy father?" asked Herr Bantes. The other produced a splendid pocket-book, and handed him a letter. It contained only a few lines by way of introduction, with a request to facilitate the bearer in his attempt to obtain the affections of his intended. The hand-writing was something like the old banker's, but it looked forced. Herr Bantes read the letter over and over again, to gain time to consider. He was in a complete dilemma. He could not, as a sensible man, believe for a moment, in spite of his involuntary tremor, that he had the dead guest before him; nor, on the other hand, could he suppose it possible that the son of his old friend should, in face, figure, and dress, be so exactly like the fearful hero of the old tradition. He jumped up—begg'd to be excused—said he must look for his spectacles, as his eyes were a little dim, and left the room, so as to think the matter over with himself. As he left the room, Paul laid hold of the knob of another door, determined not to be left alone in the room. As he did so, the stranger turned his pallid face slowly round on him, and with one bound poor Paul was out of the door and down the stairs: nor would he return till he heard the burgomaster's voice in the parlour again. Herr Bantes had meanwhile been hastily turning over the matter, and adopted a desperate resolution. Doubtful as he was as to the true character of his visitor, he was determined, at any rate, not to deliver over his dear Frederica into the clutches of the evil one. His heart beat quicker as he approached his guest, whom he addressed as follows: "Hear me, my dear sir. I have the highest respect for you personally; but, in the meantime, certain things have happened here—unfortunate events, that could not be avoided. If you had only been good enough to come sooner! In the meantime, an affection has grown up between my daughter and the commandant of the garrison here, betrothal and all that, which I loathed only a few days ago. The captain was a ward of mine. What could I do? Right or wrong, I had to give my consent. I had intended to write the unlucky news to your father, and ask him not to give you the trouble of coming. I am very sorry, I am sure. What will my old friend think of me?"

Herr Bantes could say no more; for his voice failed him for sheer terror. His guest had not only, contrary to his expectations, listened to the announcement with perfect calmness, but his countenance, which had before been calm and grave, brightened up visibly at the words "affection" and "betrothal," as though a maiden whose heart and hand were already pledged to another was just what he wanted. Nor did it escape Herr Bantes, that the pale features speedily resumed their former composure, as though conscious that they betrayed themselves by the expression of pleasure.

"Do not make yourself uneasy," said Herr von Hahn, "neither on my account nor my father's!" Herr Bantes thought to himself: "I know well enough what you are driving at!" but was now doubly anxious to keep the dangerous wooer at a distance from Frederica.

"I ought, in truth," pursued he, "not to allow you to remain in a tavern, and beg of you to take up your quarters in my house. But this business of the captain and my daughter, and all that—you know all about these things—a second wooer in the absence of the first, and all that—and then, you know, in a little town like this, the people talk about everything; and then, my daughter—"

"Pray, don't make any excuses," said the stranger; "I am very well accommodated at the hotel. I understand you. If you would only allow me to wait upon your daughter—"

"But—"

"For I could never reconcile it to myself to have been in Herbesheim, and not to have seen my intended bride."

"Certainly, you—"

"I really must envy the captain. I have heard so much of the extraordinary beauty and amiable qualities of the lady—"

"You are very polite."

"I should certainly have esteemed it a great honour to have been received into your amiable family, and to have become the son of a man of whom my father can never speak without emotion."

"Much obliged—"

"May I ask, at least, to be presented to the lady?"

"I am sorry, very sorry—but she has gone with her mother to a large party—and it is the rule there not to admit a stranger on any pretext."

"It matters little for this evening, as I still feel somewhat fatigued; nor should I wish to see her at a large party, where one is always under more or less restraint. I would prefer seeing her at home."

Herr Bantes bowed in silence.

"Of course I should prefer it, and I presume you will have no objections. I should be still better pleased to have a private interview with her, as I have much to communicate, which—"

The old man was alarmed. He thought to himself, "There he goes, marching straight to his object!" He hemmed and coughed. The stranger paused for an answer, but as none followed, went on. "I hope to make some communications to the lady, which may tend to give her a more correct idea of myself, and perhaps enable me to obtain her good opinion, which is far from being a matter of indifference to me."

Herr Bantes tried to interpose many an if and but to prevent this dangerous tit-a-tit. He talked much, but confusedly. The dead guest either did not or would not understand him, and kept urging his request. Meantime Herr Bantes' situation became more and more painful; for he saw in his mind's eye his lovely daughter deceived by the accursed arts of the pale shape before him, and her pretty head twisted round backwards. The conversation had lasted long, and it was growing dark. As his visitor seemed determined not to go, Herr Bantes jumped up suddenly, and explained, with many regrets, that he must leave him to attend to some pressing business. The stranger took his leave distantly, but asked permission to call again.

Herr Bantes hurried off to the party, but was noticed to be unusually still and thoughtful. The dead guest was the only subject of conversation. Some asserted that he brought with him a huge chest packed full of gold; others, that he had already made the acquaintance of all the betrothed brides of Herbesheim; that he was a very agreeable man, only that there was a little smell of sulphur about him. All this agreed but too well with what he had himself noticed in the visitor who had assumed the shape of the rich banker. As soon as he had returned home with his wife and daughter, he told them of the visit of the dead guest, and that he trusted he had given him his dismissal, once for all. The two ladies were at first surprised, then smiled when they heard the name of the rich wooer; and at last laughed outright when they heard that the old man had formally declared that Frederica was betrothed to the captain.

"Oh, papa, dear papa!" cried Frederica, and embraced him; "oh, I beg, keep your word!"

"What the plague, and all that?" answered the old man; "no fear of that!"

"Will you, even if the dead guest should turn out to be Herr von Hahn, after all?"

"Do you think I've got no eyes? It is not Herr von Hahn. It's an apparition. How in the devil's name could such an idea ever enter young Hahn's head as to dress himself up like the dead guest; a story he has most probably never heard in all his life!"

The ladies could not exactly explain the affair, it is true; still they were more inclined to attribute it to the old gentleman's busy imagination, than to doubt the individuality of Herr von Hahn. This very obstinacy of mother and daughter, who would not take any other view of the matter, agitated the burgomaster the more.

"So it goes always, just so," cried he angrily; "he has got you both half in his meshes already,—has bewitched you already. I am not ordinarily superstitious, and am no credulous old woman, but what I have seen—I have seen. It is a devilish trick, that is enough to make one crazy. Reason can't explain it. But there are many things that reason can't explain. But I will take care you have nothing to do with the fiend, if I have to lock you both up in the cellar!"

"Dear papa!" rejoined his daughter, "you need not take all that trouble. Whether the dead guest is the Herr von Hahn or not, I promise you that I will never love him, and never forget Waldrich. But you must give me your word that you will not turn away my Waldrich, whether this rival of his turns out to be the one or the other."

"No fear of it. I would rather give you away to the meanest beggar in the street—he is a man, at any rate—than to that spirit, that devil."

That night Frederica was lulled to sleep by happy dreams, while her poor father tossed and tumbled in sleepless anxiety. The result of his nightly reflections was, that immediately after breakfast he repaired to the recorder, and requested him to set the police in motion, and have the stranger ordered to leave the city. He told him frankly the whole of their conversation on the preceding afternoon, and that his wife and daughter were already half bewitched by him, inasmuch as they fancied him to be the young banker, while it was evident that that gentleman would not have chosen the figure of the dead guest to go a wooing in, nor if he had wanted to do so, would he have known what it was. His friend shook his head in doubt, and hardly knew what to say, but assured Herr Bantes that something should be done soon, as the whole town was in agitation.

As Herr Bantes was going home, he chanced to look in at a window in the lower story of his house. The window belonged to a pretty little room which had formerly been occupied by Captain Wuldrich. The old man could hardly believe his eyes. There sat the dead guest in earnest, and as it seemed in passionate conversation with Frederica. She smiled kindly on him, and seemed to have nothing to say against it, when he caught her hand and pressed it repeatedly to his lips. At this sight everything seemed to totter before the old man's eyes, or rather he tottered himself. He thought at first he would rush at once into the room and drive the tempter away, but he feared that evil consequences might result for his daughter or himself. He remembered the duel between the viscount and Count von Altenkreuz. He hurried to his wife's chamber, who started with affright at his pale, anxious face. When she learned the reason of his fear, she sought to quiet him, by assuring him that the fancied spectre was a modest and amiable man, with whom she and Frederica had a long conversation.

"I have no doubt, mother, he behaved modestly enough towards an elderly lady like you. But just go and see how far he has got with our daughter already. He is kissing her."

"That is impossible!"

"Yes, yes, my eyes are fools! She is his—she is lost for ever!"

"Why, he only asked permission for a private interview with Frederica. Let us have an end of these idle fancies. How can you, the enlightened man, who mocked at everything, let yourself be deceived so easily, and become so superstitious all at once!"

"Deceived, superstitious? No, no, only prudence, foresight, and all that, against the devil. I command you, once for all, to break off all intercourse with your so-called Herr von Hahn."

His wife seemed embarrassed. "Dear husband," said she at last, "pray think what you are doing. A stranger may have a pale face and wear black, and yet not be a ghost. If you wish it, and your peace of mind is concerned, I will obey you; but consider, we have already invited him to dinner to-day."

"It's enough to drive one mad!" replied her spouse; "to dinner!!! Away with him, I say—I will have nothing to do with him!"

Just then Frederica came in. "Where is Herr von Hahn?" her father asked moodily.

"Gone to his hotel for a moment: he will return soon. He is really a good, noble-minded man!"

"There it is again! She has only talked with him a quarter of an hour, and is already satisfied that he is a good, noble-minded man. Oh, if Waldrich were here! In one word—I will not make or meddle with him. Send him some excuse, manufacture something; say I am taken sick suddenly; we regret very much; can't have the pleasure to-day, and all that."

"But listen, papa: I will tell you what he was talking about. He is really a most excellent man, and you will—"

"Stop! I will not listen. Look here, this is the last word I have to say, whether it is the dead guest that looks like Herr von Hahn, or Herr von Hahn that looks like the dead guest, it is all devilry altogether. If you can persuade this man, this good, noble-minded, excellent man, and all that, to leave Herbesheim to-day and for ever, I give you my word, you shall have your captain. I will write to my old friend at once, and make all things straight, as soon as that creature in black is away. Can you persuade him to do it?"

"Surely," said Frederica, radiant with joy, "he will go: I only allow me to say one word with him in private."

"Never, never! write, write him!"

Frederica had no alternative; so she wrote to the banker, whom she already learned to esteem; apologized for being forced to revoke the invitation to dinner, owing to her father's illness; and begged him, if he felt any esteem or friendship for her, to leave the town at once, as her happiness and the peace of the family depended on his absence. She promised to write him by the next post more at length, and explain the singular reasons of her singular and unpolite but most earnest request.

CHAPTER VI

A servant carried Frederica's note over to the hotel. The fellow was told to open the banker's door; but as he did so, he trembled in every joint, for the tall, pale figure in black walked solemnly towards him, and asked, in a hollow tone, "What do you want?" The shape seemed to him to be ten times as long, pale, and black, as he had ever fancied it.

"Pray, excuse me," he stammered at last, with features expressing the most deadly fear, "my errand was not to you, but to Herr von Hahn."

"I am he."

"Are you really?" said the poor devil, chattering from head to foot, yet unable to move from the spot; "for God's sake, sir, do let me go!"

"I do not keep you here. Who sent you?"

"Fraulein Bantes."

"For what?"

"This letter you were—" With these words, which he did not finish because the stranger had advanced a step nearer to him, he flung the note on the floor, and ran off as fast as he could.

The banker stood inquiring, "Are all the people in this place beside themselves?" read the letter, raised his brows, and walked up and down, whistling.

Meantime some one tapped gently at the door, and in walked the landlord, cap in hand, with a profusion of bows.

"You are come in good time, landlord," said the gentleman in black; "is dinner ready?"

"Our dinner will doubtless be too poor to suit your excellency."

"By no means; your cookery is good. I am a small eater at all times; but that is no reproach to your table."

"They give better dinners at the Angel."

"I don't want to hear anything about angels. I stick to the Black Cross. I never knew so modest a landlord in my life. Pray be covered."

The landlord twirled his cap in his hand, and seemed to have something of weight on his mind, which he did not know how to bring out. The gentleman in black did not notice it at first, but kept walking up and down the room, busied with his own thoughts. Whenever he chanced to come near the landlord, the latter hastily retreated four paces.

"Is there anything else?" asked the gentleman at last.

"Why—yes. I hope, though, your excellency won't be offended at it."

"By no means—out with it!" was the answer, and the stranger stretched out his arm to clasp his host in a friendly way, on the shoulder. But Boniface gave it a different interpretation. He thought perhaps the stranger wanted to make the same experiment on the vertebrae of his neck which he had previously made on those of the three ladies; so he dodged the hand skilfully, and was at the foot of the stairs in three jumps.

Provoking as such behaviour was, Herr von Hahn could not help laughing. He had noticed the same strange fear in all the servants, especially since that morning. "Do they take me for a second Doctor Faustus?" said he to himself.

Then came another knock at the door; it was slowly opened half way, and a military-looking head, with a Roman nose and prodigious moustache, appeared at the opening, and asked: "Am I right—is this Herr von Hahn's?"

"Certainly."

A tall, stout man, in a police uniform, entered the room. "The recorder requests your excellency to make it convenient to wait on him for a few moments."

"Make it convenient? That sounds somewhat official. Where does he live?"

"At the end of the street, sir; the large corner house with the balcony. I will have the honour of showing you the way."

"That is not necessary, my friend. I do not like escorts, either of military or police."

"His honour the recorder gave the order."

"Right, and you obey, without question. You have served, have you not?"

"In the third regiment of Hussars."

"In what affair did you get that honourable scar on your forehead?"

"Hem! your excellency—in an affair with some of my comrades about a pretty girl."

"Your wife, then, will not look on the scar with pleasure, except she herself was the pretty girl in question."

"I have no wife."

"Very well, but you have got a sweetheart; for the man who bears such honourable marks of his devotion to the far sex must always be sensible of their charms. But then your chosen one, now she knows all, hangs back a little, don't she?"

The soldier seemed embarrassed. It amused the questioner to see a confirmation of his random guesses in his confusion, and he went on. "Don't despair. That very scar will prove to your sweetheart what you would dare for one glance of her black eyes, one look of her brown hair."

The police-officer changed colour, and stared wildly at the stranger. "Your excellency," stammered he, "do you know the girl already?"

"Why not? she is really the prettiest girl in the whole town!" answered the other, smiling; for it tickled his fancy to discover the love affairs of the soldier so soon by dint of bold and lucky guesses. It did not tickle the officer, though; especially the roguish smile of the pale deadly countenance seemed to contain something fearful, something of fiendish delight.

"Your excellency knows her, then, already! But how can that be; for you have only been in town one day. I have never taken my eyes off the milliner's front door; or, if I was away, somebody else watched. I am sure you never went in the house once."

"My good fellow, a pretty girl is soon found out, and houses have back doors as well as front ones."

The soldier, who no doubt had reasons of his own for knowing this fact, stood petrified. Herr von Hahn, on the other hand, grew more sportive the more the fellow's confusion increased, and determined to make him a little jealous. "So, then," he went on, "she plays the prude, does she? That unlucky scar!"

"No, sir, no—not the wound. Excuse me, it is yourself!"

"What! I! oh, don't dream of such a thing. Not jealous already, are you? Come, let us understand ourselves, and make an agreement—do you understand?"

"I understand only too well. God deliver me from such a thing!"

"You shall introduce me to your young milliner, and I will reconcile her to the scar."

The soldier shuddered all over; then invited the stranger, in a dry official tone, to follow him to the recorder's.

"I will come; but I forbid your accompanying me through the street."

"My orders are so."

"And I order you the contrary. Go, and say I am coming. If you hesitate one moment, your sweetheart is lost to you for ever!"

"Sir, sir—for the love of heaven!" cried the soldier, in anguish, "I obey, but do, do spare her young blood!"

"I hope you don't fancy I'm going to eat your sweetheart!"

"Give me your word of honour, my lord, that you will spare her life, and I will do whatever you bid me, if it should be to kill myself."

"Be easy; I promise you I will not take her life. But tell me, why do you fear the worst all at once? Who the plague ever wanted to take a pretty woman's life?"

"I have your word, your excellency, and I am satisfied. Besides, why should you want to twist poor Kate's neck. I will go, and you can follow on. Even hell must keep its promises."

He hurried out of the house. Behind him, he heard the stranger laughing heartily. It sounded to him like Satan's. He hurried to the recorder, and reported faithfully all that happened, to his great astonishment.

(To be concluded in our next.)

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

THE INVALID.

BY MRS. CORNWALL BARON WILSON

Nothing is more common than for persons of a naturally robust and healthy temperament of mind and body, and who feel not those "infirmities flesh is heir to"—nothing, I repeat, is more common than for such persons to ridicule the want of that greatest of all earthly blessings in others, health; and to attribute the ailments of those around them to the effect of temper, or what is called "nervous irritability." Instead, therefore, of benefiting more largely by the mercies extended to themselves, and feeling a thankful gratitude for the boon bestowed by their munificent Creator, blessings on them become curses to others, by causing a callousness to the sufferings of their fellow-creatures; and, like Pharaoh of old, they "harden their hearts" against conviction and against belief.

Such, at least, was the effect produced upon Walter Beverley, the hero, if I may so designate him, of the brief yet faithful page in whose life I am about to record; and should there be one among my readers who is conscious of lacking the "milk of human kindness" in his own bosom, may the catastrophe of this little narrative produce that change so devoutly to be wished.

Walter Beverley was a young man, possessed of fine animal spirits, flowing from a constitution which (saving the maladies incident to childhood) had never known a day's wear, either from sickness or sorrow; he seemed, indeed, the favourite of fortune, in many good and noble qualities, his detestation of everything approaching to cowardice and effeminacy in his own sex, was little short of hatred. Even the gentler part of creation, woman, pleased Walter more when the extreme delicacy of her sex was discarded, and none of those pretty yet misplaced graces of timidity, which beauty is apt to assume, were put in practice to attract admirers. A young man moving in the circle Beverley moved in was not likely to be long in finding a wife. Julia St. Pierre, the only daughter of a French refugee, drew her first breath in England, whether her parents had down, with what wealth they could hastily collect, at the breaking out of the revolution. Educated as an English woman, (for she had known no other country,) young, lovely, and accomplished, Julia soon attracted the eyes and fixed the roving heart of Walter, in those circles where "they met;" and though he was very opposite in character, (for hers was "the mild lustre of the early morn, and his the radiance of the risen day,") he soon became her lover—wooded and won—and they were united.

There was a hectic tinge on the face of the fair bride, that to all eyes save those of the delighted husband, seemed the herald of an early grave. That dreful disease, the simoom of our climate, deadly as that of the Eastern desert—since with a like remorselessness it sweeps away all who come within its influence—consumption, had already sown its baneful seeds in her bosom, to spring up ere long, and desolate the soil.

I pass over the early part of their married life; like an English April, it had its showery and its sunshiny, but no clouds of any magnitude rested upon it. Walter was justly proud of his beautiful wife, and delighted to instruct her in the more robust accomplishments of her sex; under his tuition, though naturally timid, she became an expert horsewoman, and the husband was never more in his element: to use a nautical phrase, than when attending in the double vacancy of esquire and tutor, at the bridal ruin of his graceful Julia.

Time rolled on, and olive branches sprang up around their table, but, alas! they did not bring increase of happiness; the wife's duties were now become subservient to those of the mother—nature demanded it—and Julia was obliged to relinquish many of those pleasures, innocent in themselves, which became otherwise when they drew away her attention from her offspring. These little sacrifices on her part were made without a sigh; for a mother can know no happiness like that of which she is the centre at home. But with man it is different; he does not feel the ties of those dear ones to bind him so closely. Walter was not naturally fond of children, and the scenes of domestic life were too tame for his ardent temperament; he loved to mount the wave rather than to glide down the calm smooth stream; and his spirit became stagnant when it was the hour of his trial—now was to be put to the test the oath, "to love and to cherish," which he had sworn to her who had consented to share his destiny at the altar of his God. The health of Mrs. Beverley gradually gave way under the many anxieties from which a mother, let her situation in life be ever so exalted, cannot be exempt. How little in after life do any of us appreciate that unceasing fatigue, that unwary tenderness, which anticipates the steps of time, and furrows the cheek of gentle woman with wrinkles not of years! When it became no longer able, with pleasure to herself, to accompany her husband to those scenes of gayety, or endure the late hours of the fashionable season, in which she had hitherto been his partner, Walter bore the bereavement in sullen silence; or if when increasing disease forced a recognition complaint from the lips of his suffering wife, if a word of gentleness that he heard her did break from him, it was such as blistered, rather than soothed, the wound it fell upon. Soon, however, this gloomy calm, like the silence of nature before the tempest, burst forth in audible wishes that he had not married a woman to fill his house with doctors, and exhaust his purse for fees—they were common salutations on the lips of Beverley. "Julia was only nervous," he would say to his friends—"only nervous, and wanted rousing;" and under the impression the poor sinking invalid was often forced into gayety, under the pretended search after that health which for her was only to be obtained in the quiet shades of retirement, or the holy calm of domestic peace. Often when the unpitied Julia returned from such scenes, and was conscious that the tide of health would never again flow through her wasting veins, would she gaze with fearful eyes on the little flock bounding to meet her, and mentally offer a prayer for their protection, when her maternal arms could no longer be their shield; often, too, while resting on her harp, whose tuncful chords her fingers had ceased to make obedient to their touch, would she weep over her youngest born, the blue-eyed cherub, who, like the personification of Pity's dove, flew to nestle and repose in her wounded bosom.

Gently—as the fading light of the melting rainbow, tint after tint—did her beauty pass, almost unperceived, away. She had long ceased to breathe a murmur; for it was sure to call up a cloud on the brow, or an immably meet on the lip, of the heartless Beverley, who, now that his wife's accomplishments and beauty could no longer minister to his vanity, showed himself the selfish being his own passion had made him. Despite his better reason, he would not be convinced that the hectic flush and bright eye of Julia could betoken aught but health; and, to conciliate his wayward temper, the fevered cheek and wildly-illumined eye often were clothed in smiles, which were now as galling as the scorching heat. "There, now you look something like yourself, Julia," said the selfish Walter one evening, when, in obedience to his wishes, she had placed herself at the harp, which stood beside the sofa, on which her weakness obliged her to recline. "Come, you only want rousing, as I told Dr. Berkly yesterday, when he shook his head and put on a long professional face; illness is all an idea—fancy, making women a trouble to themselves, and a burden to every one about them. It only wants courage and nerve to throw it off, as one changes one's dress; and really, Julia, yours is quite a worn-out garment; I'm tired of seeing it." A melancholy smile was the only answer to this ill-timed pleasantry. "Come," he continued, "play some of those lively airs you used to be so fond of before we were plagued with the crisis; you have worn your very life out. Be off, air, out of the way." It said the unnatural father to the trembling boy who sat at his mother's knee; and, suiting the "action to the word," hurled him with his foot to the other side of the apartment, with a violence that made the floor echo beneath his fall.

The spirit of the mother could not brook this; neglect, reviling, showered upon herself, she had borne calmly without a murmur, but if ever the most timid animal will turn and defend her young when attacked, how much more will not woman dare in defence of her offspring! So it was with the wife of Beverley. Every feeling, the dearest, the most sacred, in her bosom's shrine, had been outraged—outraged by him, too, who, of all others should have respected and upheld them; and, for the first time, words of bitter and reproaching import escaped her lips. Remonstrance only produced the opposite effect intended on an obdurate heart; and Walter Beverley, the husband and father of those he had wronged, quitted his home, to spend elsewhere a gay evening than he might now anticipate within his own walls.

Late was the hour when he returned, under the two-fold influence of wine and passion, those demons ever ready to join compact together, and make common cause against every man, woman, or child. He found his wife in the arms of sleep, and he had down to stifle, in noise and riot, the upbraidings of the "still small voice" that will be heard within us, it was not till the beams of the noon-day sun shone into the chamber that Beverley awoke to consciousness, and to look on the mangled form beside his pillow. Mrs. Beverley was dead! Exhausted by the violence of the evening heart-sick and heart-broken, she had softly kissed her children as they slept, and retired some hours before her husband's return; and alone, in the silence and deep hush of midnight, that awful power who bids "the weary be at rest" had visited her sorrows, and her pure spirit had flown to Him who gave it.

Some moments elapsed ere the horror-struck Walter could fully rouse his bewildered senses to comprehend the fatal truth! He bent his ear to listen—no gentle breathing answered to his hopes, and told him that life was yet an inmate of that fragile tenement; he touched the pale cheek over which the long eyelash hung like a jetty fringe, with a tear still moist upon it. His hand recoiled at the ill thrill which that touch sent through his veins; there is no mistaking the touch of death. To sustain the servants and medical aid was now but the work of a moment; but in vain—the vital spark was quenched for ever. In all the stupor of grief, too agonized, "too deep for tears," the wretched man stood gazing on the form before him. Yes, there she lay; the bride of his choice, the wife of his bosom, the mother of his children; the shadow of beauty yet throwing its twilight loveliness over her features, even as the lunar rainbow retains the outline of the brighter arch of day, but gleams colder and paler beneath the chilly midnight. At that awful moment, what would the husband and father not have given to recall but the last twelve hours of his existence—to have caused the dial of time to go back as it did of yore! How did every unkind word he had uttered, every offence look of which he had been guilty, set themselves in battle array against him, and rise from the cells of his own heart, like the skeptics of terror, to upbraid. The wolf that fed on the life-stream of the Spartan thief, the tooth of the viper, or the three-fingered sting of the scorpion, are nothing contrasted with the agonies of an accusing conscience.

Yet the lesson did now, at last, take effect on the heart of Beverley. A revolution which years could not have accomplished was now the work of one little hour. Prostrate beside his desolated couch, with his children gathered around him, the first prayer Beverley had uttered since he knelt in boyhood at his mother's knee, broke from his humiliated soul, for forgiveness for the past and direction for the future; and there, too, on the solemn shrine, with the weeping pledges of love before him, did he kneel to consecrate his future life to their welfare, and to be henceforth a father in affection as in name. The spirit of her he had injured bent down and hallowed the prayer, and the recording angel, who rejoiceth over the sinner that repenteth, carried the oath to heaven.

Years have flitted by since the period when his history commenced; and in the fondly-attached father, watching and guiding the expanding minds of his affectionate children, no traces can be recognized of the early failings of Walter Beverley.

CONSIDERATE.—On his deathbed a distinguished humorist requested that no one might be invited to his funeral; "because," sobbed out the dying man, "it is a civility I can never repay."

MADAME MARA.

Gertrude Elizabeth Mara was born at Cassel, in the year 1750, and brought by her father, whose name was Schmeling, when quite a child, to London, where she learned to perform on the guitar. Her progress was so rapid, that when in her tenth year, she played before the king with great félicité; but, by the advice of one of the ladies at court, she discontinued that instrument, and was placed under the instruction of the well-known soprano Paradisi, under whose guidance she improved so much, that when only in her fourteenth year she sang before the court with the greatest applause.

After some years, her father returned with her to Cassel, where at that time she did not excite any particular notice; and in the year 1766, she went to Leipzig, where, at the first established concert, she was engaged as first singer, and soon became the object of universal astonishment.

In 1767, she was invited to Dresden, to undertake a character in a piece to be performed in honour of the birth-day of the prince; the dowager princess, Maria Antonia, who was a great amateur of music, first undertaking to instruct her in the action. After this representation, she left Dresden in the beginning of 1768, where she had met with much honour and reward, and returned to Leipzig, where she placed herself under the instruction of M. Hiller, who soon made her a proficient on the harpsichord.

In 1770 she was invited to Potsdam, where Frederick II., whose prepossession in favour of German singers is well known, was induced, by the admiration her talents excited, to invite her to his palace. Being anxious to hear her, though his opinion of her talents was by no means favorable, he ordered the concert to take place while he waited in an adjoining room, so that he could listen to it without being seen. She had not long commenced, when he became so delighted with her singing that he entered the concert-room, and at last took a seat a short distance from her. On the conclusion of the air she was singing, he loudly praised her, and asked if she would venture to sing another air at sight! On her acquiescing, he sought out for her one of the most difficult pieces he could find, which she sang with the greatest facility, as she did all others that he laid before her. She was immediately engaged, at a salary of two hundred dollars; and, in 1771, appeared for the first time at Berlin, in Hasse's Intermezzo, "Primo e Tizio," and with the celebrated Concialini for fame; besides this, under the instruction of Porpora, she was able to execute adagios with powerful feeling; and her action was so good, that she excited universal astonishment.

In 1774 she married Jean Mara, a native of Berlin, who was the celebrated violinist to Prince Henry; but through her union with him she was involved in innumerable difficulties, and through his inconsiderate conduct she incurred the king of Prussia's displeasure, who otherwise would always have countenanced her, on account of her talents. In length the displeasure of the king increased to such a degree, that she was dismissed from her engagement, whereupon they went to Leipzig; and, in 1782, to Vienna; from thence they travelled through Switzerland, and, in 1783, went to Paris, where she was appointed first concert-singer to the queen.

In 1784, she came again to London, where she was received with the greatest enthusiasm, and immediately engaged at the theatre for thirteen nights, at one thousand guineas. At the celebrated Commemoration of Handel, in Westminster Abbey, she appeared as principal singer; and, in the following winter, was engaged at the Opera House.

In 1788, she was invited to Turin, where she stayed only a short time, sang during the carnival, and then returned to England, where she continued for many years to excite the admiration and applause of the British public, without any competitor who could dispute with her the palm of superiority.

At length, however, Mrs. Billington, after many years' absence from the stage, returned from Italy, and by her scientific attainments and astonishing compass of voice, became a formidable rival to her who had reigned supreme as the queen of song; but the acknowledged talents of Mrs. Billington, and a love of novelty, drew nearly the whole of the fashionable world after that lady; as her fame increased, her once powerful rival sank into comparative insignificance; and she who had been the brightest luminary of the musical hemisphere, was eclipsed by the dazzling effulgence of her more fortunate rival. In addition to this, being disgusted by some severe animadversions on a franca with one of her servant-maids, in which she exhibited the character of a violin, she went, in 1802, to Paris, and in the course of the following year visited her native place; she afterwards proceeded to Frankfurt, Weimar, Leipzig, and Berlin, and everywhere encountered her hearers through the brilliancy and magic of her singing. Having travelled through most of the great cities of Germany, she visited St. Petersburg and from thence returned to England.

In 1808 she went to Moscow, where, after the death of her husband, who died that year in retirement at Rotterdam, she was to have married her former companion, Florio. After remaining some time, she returned to England, where she seemed determined to finish her days.

The fame of this great singer was not founded alone on the strength and fulness of her tones, and the extraordinary compass of her voice, which she could extend to three octaves, save one single note, with perfect evenness; but also on the wonderful ease, quickness, and roundness with which she executed the most difficult passages; and lastly, on the simplicity and charming expression of her diction. Her finest effort, and for the execution of which she was celebrated, was the beautiful air in Handel's Messiah, "I know that my Redeemer lieth."

Her musical judgment was extremely good. Being one night at the Lent Oratorios, and hearing one of the female singers execute some of her own favourite songs, she was asked by a lady who sat in the next box, why she did not sing them herself. She answered—"Madam, she dances a tolerably good fandango." Such a reply from any one of the greater hall of our present operatic ladies, had been flippant, pert, and presumptuous; but so chaste, dignified, and sentimental a vocalist as Madame Mara, was entitled to make a remark, that while it could never be applied to herself, so well described the unassuming flatter and flourish by which some of the finest compositions of the finest masters are too often disguised and deteriorated.

FOPPERY.—A person was conversing with a friend on the absurdity of following fashion. "They are really contemptible," said "and I am sure all who see you must think you ridiculous." "I don't value the opinion of the world," answered the irritated puppy. "I laugh at all those who think me ridiculous." "Then you must be the merriest man alive," was the reply.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

LINES BY CAROLINE BOWLES, NOW MRS. ROBERT SOUTHEY.

Suggested by some autumn flowers.

Those few pale autumn flowers,
How beautiful they are!
Than all that went before,
Than all the summer store,
How lovelier far!

And why?—They are the last!
The last! the last! the last!
Oh! by that little word,
How many thoughts are stirred;

That sister of the past!
Pale flowers! Pale, perishing flowers!
Ye're types of precious things;
Types of those better moments,
That fit like life's enjoyments,
On rapid, rapid wings.

Last hours with parting dear ones,
(That time the fastest spends),
Last tears in silence shed,
Last words half-thought, half-
Last looks of dying friends.

Who but would fain compress
A life into a day,
The last day spent with one
Who, e'er the morrow's sun
Must leave us, and for ay!

Oh, precious, precious moments!
Pale flowers! ye're types of those;
The saddest! sweetest! dearest!
Because, like those, the nearest
To an eternal close.

Pale flowers! Pale, perishing flowers!
I woo your gentle breath—
I leave the summer rose
For younger, blither brows;
Tell me no change of death.

OLD AND NEW FASHIONED DANCES.—As to balls themselves thirty years ago, country-dances (now called by way of joke) were the fashion; and fifty years ago, preceded by the minuet, were the dances of the court. A lady and gentleman "walking" a minuet (as it is called) now a day would be considered typical of Adam and Eve before the fall. Here, however, is a double mutation; for the quadrille, which has superseded the country or contre-danse, is but the revival of the cotillon; while the game of quadrille, once all the rage, has been driven from society by that refined edition of "all fours"—"écarté." The waltz, which invaded our shores in war time, and frightened the sober and sedate from their propriety, seems to have been also a mere revivification of a dance described, with singular point and animation, by the old gentlemen in the "Spectator," who says: "I suppose this diversion was first invented to keep up a good understanding between young men and women; but I am sure had you been here, you would have seen great matter for speculation." Lady Blessington, in her interesting and entertaining work, "The Lady in Italy," recently published, informs us that the French mode of dancing is, in many respects, the same as the Italian; and that the fastidious still cast upon the method of performing it in England. As to dancing, generally speaking, it appears to be reduced to a fashion rather than an amusement, for two reasons: one, because if there is room left in a ball-room for dancing, the party is considered dull; and the other, because if there be adequate space, the figures are walked, or rather slept through by the performers, as if the whole affair was a "bore," and that the appearance of being either entertained or excited, was something too shocking to be thought of.

EFFECTS OF MUSIC IN THE CONVERSATION OF SAVAGES.—Nolreg (a Jesuit) had a school, where he instructed the native children, the orphans from Portugal, and the mestizos, or the mixed breed. Reading, writing, and arithmetic were taught them; they were trained to assist at mass, and to sing the church service, and frequently led in procession through the town. This had a great effect, for the natives were passionately fond of music, so passionately, that Nolreg began to hope the fable of Orpheus was a type of his mission, and that by songs he was to convert the pagans of Brazil. This Jesuit usually took with him four or five of these little chorons on his preaching expeditions; when they approached an inhabited place, one carried the crucifix before them, and they began singing, the Litany. The savages, like snakes, were won by the voice of the charmer; they received him joyfully, and when he departed with the same ceremony, the children followed the music. He set the catechism creed, and ordinary prayers, to so-la; and the pleasure of learning to sing was such a temptation, that the little Tupas sometimes ran away from their parents to put themselves under the care of the Jesuit.

PERMANENT VALUE OF KNOWLEDGE.—One of the most agreeable consequences of knowledge, is the respect and importance which it communicates to old age. Men rise in character often as they increase in years; they are venerated from what they have acquired, and pleasing from what they can impart. If they outlive their faculties, the mere frame itself is respected for what it once contained; but women (such is their unfortunate style of education) hazard everything upon one cast of the die; when youth is gone, all is gone. No human creature gives his admiration for nothing; either the eye must be charmed or the understanding gratified. A woman must talk wisely or look well. Every human being must put up with the coldest civility, who has neither the charms of youth nor the wisdom of age. Neither is there the slightest commiseration for decayed accomplishments; no man mourns over the fragments of a dancer, or drops a tear on the relics of musical skill. They are flowers destined to perish; but the decay of great talents is always the subject of solemn pity; and even when their last memorial is over, their ruins and vestiges are regarded with pious affection.—Rev. Sidney Smith.

CONSCIENCE.—If the worm gnaws within, the appearance without is deformity and shame. Let the hypocrite, devoured by conscience, assume whatever artificial appearance he may, of severity, tranquillity, or vague solemnity, his distortion will be ever apparent to the acute observer of nature.

ORIGINAL FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM LONDON.

Tournament—Lord Eglintoun—Marquis of Londonderry—Thames Tunnel Dinner—Theatricals—Ellen Tree—Lady Flora Hastings—the Queen.

THE tournament still comes in for more than, perhaps, a due share of notice, both in the small fashionable, and extensive unfashionable world. It has fairly attained that very rare degree of notoriety—a "nine days' wonder"—a thing but seldom to be looked for in this bustling community, where stirring events in politics, pleasure, or business, tread so quick upon each other's heels. Tournaments have been got up at the theatres, both in burlesque and reality—it is hard to say which is the better burlesque of the two; and "tournament quadrilles,"—that is, the quadrilles danced by the "knights" and "dames" at Eglintoun,—have been published by the music-sellers. The latter will now, of course, be danced all over London, by the spruce "knights of the counter," in conjunction with "pectless," and indeed altogether "titleless" damsels of every degree, from the haughty heiresses of wholesale sugar-bakers and soap-boilers, to the humble daughters of the dealers of those essential articles in retail; and the sirs, so lately composed for the especial use and pleasure of ultra-aristocratic ears, will, in five days, be familiar in the mouths of all porter-pot boys able to whistle. It is all nonsense singing or talking about "exclusiveness" in these "diffusion-of-everything" times. The thing is impossible. Man is an imitative animal everywhere, and nowhere more so than in England; and in all England, London is the place where this faculty is most freely developed. Those who account themselves the haut ton, having the most time upon their hands, originate amusements and frivolities for the destruction of their great enemy—ennui; but they cannot obtain an exclusive patent for them, and these said amusements and frivolities find their way in an incredibly short space of time through every grade of society in the great Babylon, until they finally expire in the precincts of St. Giles, or the kennels of Petticoat-lane. Even the superfluous Almackites cannot prevent "sound" finding its way through their hermetically-sealed doors; and no absolute decree of Lady Patronesses is available in averting the dire infliction of hearing, as they roll along in their carriages, the beauties of Strauss of the evening before vulgarized by hurdy-gurdy, barrel-organ, jew's-harp, or butcher-boy's and coal-heaver's lips. Alas, for the sufferings of greatness! Nothing, therefore, can prevent the "tournament quadrilles" from going the way of all vanity.

The present lord of Eglintoun is of ancient family, being the thirteenth earl of the name. He is a tall, straight, good-looking young man, of seven-and-twenty—no bad figure for a knight in any times, ancient or modern. Independent of being mad after the sports of the olden time, he is a great patron of the modern turf, and has more blood horses running and in training than any nobleman in this horse-racing island. Hitherto he has had his fair share of good-fortune; but, doubtless, the "black-legs" will let him into a secret or two before they have done with him. The natural tendency of these things is Italy and the south of France, where young Englishmen resort, to retrench and brood upon the experience they have bought somewhat dear. Doubtless, Froissart and Sir Walter are in a great measure answerable for his late outbreak. Indeed, who can read hundreds of passages that occur in their works without feeling, as another poet said, "his heart stirred as by the sound of a trumpet." Take one at random, for instance—the meeting between Fair Margaret's lover, Lord Cranstoun—the "Knight of the Crane" of former times—and stout William of Deloraine, where

"The very couraizers seem'd to know
That each was other's mortal foe,
And snorted fire, when wheels' a'round,
To give each knight his vantag-ground."

In rapid round the baron bent;
He sigh'd a sigh and pray'd a prayer;
The prayer was to his patron saint,
The sigh was to his lady's fair.
Stout Deloraine, nor sigh'd nor pray'd,
Nor saint, nor lady call'd to aid;
But he stoop'd his head, and couch'd his spear,
And spur'd his steed to full career:
The meeting of these champions proud
Seem'd like a bursting thunder-cloud!"

Such poetry is enough to make a tailor chivalrous!

And why not a tailor as well as the Marquis of Londonderry?—an ancient gentleman, whose natural "course" is almost run. Chivalry, undoubtedly, loses somewhat of its grace and effect when exhibited in the person of a sexagenarian, carrying his umbrella above his head in a knightly procession, in order to save his person or his clothes! We may sympathize with the outbreaks of a young nobleman like Eglintoun, but when the same propensities come to be exhibited by a "potent, brave, and reverend seignior," like the marquis, it is not a little ludicrous. But the gallant marquis is inaccessible to reproach or ridicule. Even Brougham's sarcasms, (rare mixtures of gall and wormwood,) were thrown away upon him for a whole session of parliament.

Perfect as the late revival was in almost every respect, the ceremony of "the touching of the shield" was altogether left out. This was one of the best of the ordinances of ancient chivalry. It consisted in the several shields being hung up for a certain time within the reach of every one, and any man, no matter how low his degree, who conceived himself aggrieved by the conduct of any knight—or, or damsel, however humble her station, who had received wrong at his hands, stepped forward, if it so pleased them, and "touched the shield." A competent tribunal was instantly formed, and if it could be proved by the party touching the shield, that its owner had behaved in an unknighly manner, or done anything unbecoming a man of honour, he was excluded from the lists. This ceremony was omitted at Eglintoun, perhaps out of consideration for the knights in general, and the "knight of the dragon," the marquis of Waterford, in particular. The marquis's shield might have been touched by a goodly portion of the watchmen and policemen of the United Kingdom, at least: to say nothing of those of the United States and Norway, both of which, I believe, have experienced the uncomfortable results of the marquis's extraordinary propensities.

It has been remarked by foreigners, that, in England, everything is signalized by a dinner. If a man executes any chef d'œuvre in art, or makes a profound discovery in science, his admirers give him a dinner. If a statesman benefits his country by legislation, or a hero saves it by fighting, the reward is the same—a dinner. If Captain Ross sets off for the north pole, a dinner is given to him before he goes; and, as soon as it is heard that his ship is in sight, another is got up to welcome his return. All great enterprises, or commercial speculations, are commenced and ended by the indispensable dinner. It is the ne plus ultra of English enjoyment—the alpha and omega of all they undertake. On some very protracted occasions, it appears, they cannot restrain their impatience for the feast until the work in hand is completed.

A dinner was given, the other day, in rather an extraordinary locality, to celebrate the three-quarter completion of the Thames Tunnel. The parties dined in the Tunnel! About two hundred sat down to dinner, and accommodations were provided for about five hundred more—principally ladies—as spectators! We have heard before of balls having been given in coal-mines, and ladies dancing, in white satin, among the black diamonds, of bottles of champagne inoquaffed above the clouds, but this is, perhaps, the first instance, in the history of the world, of merry-making, on an extensive scale, under water. Think of gentlemen solacing themselves with fish served up in the first style, and uncoked ones swimming above their heads;—of swallowing oysters beneath the natural bed of that animal! Think of a bower for beauty below low-water mark, and of a vocalist warbling "My ain Preside" at the bottom of the Thames! Think of gentlemen becoming elevated in such a situation, and of the chorus of some jolly bacchanalian song reaching the ears of the mystified sailors from under water, as their craft drifted up with the tide! What will shake their faith in mermen or mermaids after this! Jack was always somewhat superstitious, and with a taste for the marvellous, but his legends were, for the most part, confined to foreign shores and seas; but now that he has as "Wapping old stairs," had his ear to the water, and heard the "glasses sparkle on the board" sang beneath it, who shall set bounds to his faith in the supernatural?

The dinner went off in good style. Much wine was drunk, and doubtless not a little love made. Indeed, the temptation to the latter would be great. The Cockneys are fond of novelty, and Mr. Tompkins would be mightily tickled with the idea of wooing the future Mrs. T. under water. A South-sea islander would scarcely be able to come up to such a boast.

In the theatrical world there is not anything worthy of note—Ellen Tree, on her return, made her appearance as the delightful Viola, in the Twelfth Night. Her performance of the character was as charming as ever. Indeed, of late years, no female on the British stage has equalled her in such parts, if we except her sister, the lovely Maria Tree, now the Hon. Mrs. Bradshaw. Ellen Tree has more vivacity and spirit, and perhaps power, than her sister, though she lacks somewhat of the softness and unaffected simplicity which rendered Maria Tree's personations so very untheatrical. As a vocalist, too, Maria Tree, for years, disputed the palm with Miss Paton, now Mrs. Wood, and to its species of enchantment the fair Ellen makes no pretensions. You have, however, fairly spoiled the latter lady. She now refuses all regular engagements, and is determined to be a "bright particular star" for the time to come.

A few flat farces and foolish melo-dramas have been produced, but it would be an abuse of time and space to dwell upon such crudities.

The affair of the late unfortunate Lady Flora Hastings has again been partially revived by the publication of divers letters and documents by the parties more immediately concerned. This ought not to be. No plot against—no malice premeditated towards the departed lady can be proved. There is no doubt the whole affair originated in an unhappy mistake; and no shadow of proof has been brought forward that the parties, who perhaps entertained suspicion too easily, were actuated by unworthy motives. Considering the age and station of Victoria, those ladies of more experience who surrounded her were deeply answerable if even the shadow of a shade of suspicion attached itself to the court of the maiden queen. They were placed in a ticklish situation, and if they erred in the discharge of their unpleasant, but what they doubtless conceived to be their imperative duty, they ought not to be too harshly judged because they were not infallible. The Lady Flora's case and fate unquestionably merit the deepest sympathy; but still, when freely giving that sympathy, there is no occasion to indulge harsh or ungracious feelings towards those who were deceived by appearances. It would just be as reasonable to quarrel with the physical causes which led to the unhappy result. But the less that is said upon such subjects the better. The quantity of sheer twaddle—of poignant sorrow and flaming indignation, that have found their way into the London and other papers on this occasion, have been both repulsive and ridiculous.

There is little else of consequence. The chartists have gone out like the snuff of a candle, instead of swallowing both houses of parliament entire; and the queen, as the old ballads express it, yet "lies her lane." True, "the press" marries her every now and then, to the great edification of the public, but for all that she still continues to walk in "maiden meditation." Whether she be "fancy free" or no is of course best known to herself, though there are many who would be thought to know a great deal better than she does. Doubtless it must amuse her to read in the mendacious prints of the capital the various "full, true, and particular" accounts of her future husbands, given upon "the best authority." C.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

SCRAPS FROM LONG ISLAND.

BY JOHN T. IRVING.

THE present is a matter-of-fact age, when fancy is strangled in her cradle, and nothing but rugged reality permitted to come to maturity. The bright, though useless flowers, which gem with their beauty only the path of existence, are trampled in the dust, whilst those blossoms which bring forth useful fruit alone are cherished. Perhaps it is for the best, but still there is a lingering charm about the dreamy tales of the olden time, when every dark wood had its nymph, every fountain its sprite, and every wild flower of the field its guardian fay, who sipped the dew from its leaves, and sang as it rocked in the evening breeze.

Tales of this kind are gradually yielding to others of a more practical nature; the budding hours of the child are no longer solaced with the idea of ethereal and beautiful beings hovering around his couch, or flitting from leaf to leaf, and from flower to flower, as he rambles in the green fields. His young attention is turned to those things which may be of service to him in after-life; the gliding is stripped from his infancy, and he becomes a man before he is time.

It was a beautiful fancy that first peopled the world with ethereal beings, and placed their homes amid the blossoms of the woods and fields. Often in my rambles, when passing to pluck a flower, has the idea crossed me, that I might be destroying the abode of some sprite, who, though invisible to me, was even then imploring my mercy, and, sparing the flower, I have walked on with a feeling of pleasure, as I heard in fancy her tiny voice warbling out a song of thanks. But now the race of sprites with ban and spell, is fast disappearing the present generation is too knowing to be gulled by tales of witches and fairies walking about in the moonlight, under the form of cats and rabbits; and such is the precocity of the present age, that a veritable ghost story, or a well-authenticated tale of a haunted house, is received with the most decided marks of disbelief. It is, therefore, with a feeling of deprecation for my own unqualified credence, that I venture to offer the following legend of Glen Cove, which was narrated to me one warm summer afternoon, as I lay in a luxuriant grove of locusts overlooking the Long-Island Sound. It is most devoutly credited in the neighbourhood; the localities are familiar to all; and Knot, the oldest negro in the place, swears to its truth. What further proof can be required?

RALPH CRAFT—A LEGEND OF GLEN COVE.

Many years ago, when this notorious Little place still slumbered on under the uninviting appellation of Mosquito Cove, an idler, equally notorious with the town, flourished there under the name of Ralph Craft, from whom, it is rumoured, are descended all of the name who infest the neighbourhood of Glen Cove. Every village has its good-natured vagabond, who hangs about the place, lives heaven knows how, and is hand and glove with all ranks from the negro, who sleeps in the sunshine, to the gentleman who rides in his carriage. This office, for several successive generations, had been in the Craft family; the spirit of vagabondism had descended in their race, pure and unadulterated, from father to son, until the concentrated strength of several generations had centered in Ralph. In truth he was a scape-goat of the purest water, and but for the influence of a termagant wife who bullied him soundly, keeping him in mental subjection, and his comrades in bodily terror, he would have passed through the world with much comfort, though little notoriety. It will generally be found that Fate, with her usual kind discrimination, has taken particular care to throw something in the lot of every man to make him uncomfortable, and I'll warrant me, that a free, jolly-hearted fellow never lived but was bullied, if not cudgelled, by a peppy helmpate. Be that as it may, Ralph found it too true in his case; he was monarch of all he surveyed so long as his face was turned away from his own dwelling; but the moment he crossed its threshold his soul sunk within him, his jests were hushed, his swagger laid aside, his voice divided to something between a whine and a whisper; his step became quiet and stealthy like that of a cat, and he always listened to her lectures as a dutiful and henpecked husband should—in silence; and so great was his tenderness for her feelings, that he had never been known to utter a word against her, except when she was out of hearing. Ralph was not, however, singular in his feeling of awe: everything under her sway partook of the general influence. Even the dingy hill cock, who at a distance swelled and ruffled among the poultry with a very patronizing air, seemed to feel a weight upon his spirits when under her eye; his strut was quickened to a sideling run, his tail was ducked down to dodge a blow, and his vociferous crow was frequently cut short in the middle.

It is but justice to Mrs. Craft, however, to remark, that if good advice could have effected a change in her husband, he would have been a paragon of excellence; for he never entered his dwelling without having his worthlessness held up to his own disapprobation, and he never went to his bed without being shown the folly of his ways, and being fully convinced that he was a disgrace to his wife and her connexions. To all this Ralph had but a single reply—"That his father was a vagabond before him, and that what was bred in the bone never came out at the flesh."

Like many persons of his description, he was something of a sportsman, and frequently whiled away the long sunshiny days of summer in idling about the neighbouring woods with his gun and dog, until every part of them was as familiar, say, more so, than his own dwelling.

It happened one day, that Ralph had been loitering about the village, with a vagabond crew of the same calibre with himself, and, in the excess of his feelings of good-fellowship, had indulged in potatoes of unusual profundity. On returning home, urged on by the unwonted stimulus, he mustered courage to venture upon an expostulation with his helpmate. The result was inevitable; he was thrust neck and heels from the house, and obliged to sue for terms. Fortunately for his cause the domestic larder was empty, and his wife made it a condition of the treaty, that he should forthwith rally out with dog and gun, and replenish it with game. It was also hinted that in case he returned empty-handed, he would find the doors closed against him. Ralph, glad to make his peace on any terms that were not to be enforced by a broomstick, set about his task with alacrity. He replenished his horn, adapted a new flint to his gun, and whistling his dog "Grim" to his side, directed his steps towards Dorsorus Lane. It was still early in the day, and being a tolerable shot, he had no fears for the result of his errand, and was right happy at being obliged to undergo a penance so much in consonance with his own inclinations. On entering Dorsorus Lane, he whistled Grim into the bushes at the roadside, whilst he sauntered along, keeping a watchful eye on the brushwood, and occasionally glancing upward, in hopes of catching sight of a pigeon among the thick foliage overhead. His search was fruitless; he reached the end of the sombre lane without having started anything except a black snake, which glided swiftly across his path and disappeared in the opposite brushwood.

"Comfortable this!" muttered he, as he once more whistled for Grim, and leaning on the end of his gun ran his eye over the landscape. At the foot of the hill on which he stood, lay a small lake, and on the opposite side rose the wood-clad peninsula, now known as Livingston's Island. It was a beautiful and cloudless afternoon; the lake lay in glassy smoothness, reflecting in its tranquil bosom the pines that darkened the island. Not a ripple broke its calmness, save when now and then some fish dashed to the surface in pursuit of an insect, or itself the aim of some more voracious of its tribe, in the hope of escape, darted forth like a spark of silver and fell glittering back in the pure element. Nature, too, was in her rainbow garb, and wore the thousand tints which spoke the waning year, and which decked the forests for a season only to mark more strongly their desolation.

Ralph's mind, however, was engrossed with other objects than the scenery. He ran his eye narrowly along the margin of the lake. Nothing was to be seen except a solitary kingfisher perched upon a rail overhanging the water, and who, to judge from his moody air, had been sent out on the same errand as himself. After a long and unsatisfactory survey, Ralph descended the hill, and as he was growing late, redoubled his speed and exertions. In vain, however, he scoured the borders of the pond, and beat through all the swamps and thickets of the neighbourhood: fate seemed against him, and just as the last rays of the setting sun disappeared from the sleeping waters of the Sound, he stood upon its beach as empty-handed as ever. Flocks of crows, high up in the air, were winging their flight towards a distant forest. Distant cattle were slowly wending their way to the farm-yards of their respective owners; the pale disk of the moon was just peeping above the eastern horizon, and several bats were beginning to flit about in the twilight. Ralph seated himself disconsolately upon a stone, supporting the sides of his head between his hands, with his eyes wistfully fixed upon the heaving Sound as its gentle billows rippled over the pebbles at his feet. Grim, too, seemed to sympathize with him; for whenever Ralph received a rough welcome at home, Grim was sure to partake of the same fare. He seemed aware of the nature of the errand on which they had been sent; he had done his utmost, and now stretched himself panting at the feet of his master.

At a short distance from the spot was a narrow strip of swamp, generally known as Flag Brook, and the idea suddenly occurred to Ralph, that as it was not yet dark, he might meet with something in that quarter. With a great deal of alacrity, and something like hope, he set out, but had not gone far before the twilight deepened, and the thick shadow of the woods which bounded one side of the swamp, made the obscurity equal to that of night. There was no longer any hope, and forcing his way out of the bushes, and throwing his gun upon the ground, Ralph cast himself beside it and began to ruminate upon matters and things at home. In the meantime the moon rose slowly in the heavens, gradually throwing the shadow of the gigantic trees under which he lay, far out in a narrow field between him and the swamp.

"I wish the deuce had that wife of mine!" ejaculated he, as he turned on his elbow and thrust a hand in his breeches pocket: "an empty stomach and hard names! better sleep out all night." As he muttered this, he struck into a thoughtful whistle. Suddenly Grim sprang up, and elevating his nose, commenced sniffing the air. Ralph grasped his gun and started to his feet.

"What the deuce is it! So ho! boy. So ho! boy. Curse the dog. I see nothing. So ho!"

Grim, however, did not advance, and when his master urged him on, he wagged his tail in acknowledgment of his instructions, and looking up in his face uttered a long, low whine. There was something in this that struck Ralph as mysterious, for the dog was generally as keen in the sport as himself; so he leaned forward, straining his eyes, when he caught sight of a rabbit squatting under a bush at a short distance.

"Ah ha, my little fellow, you are mine!" exclaimed he, joyfully. "I'll pass a peaceable night under my own roof yet!"

As he spoke he raised his gun to his cheek, but when in the act of pulling the trigger, it was suddenly struck up, and the shot went pattering through the trees, bringing down a shower of leaves.

"Let that rabbit alone!" exclaimed a rough voice at his elbow; "what business have you poaching on my preserves?"

Ralph turned round, hot with anger, for with the exception of his wife, he feared neither devil nor man. Upon the upper rail of a ragged fence, within a few feet of him, sat a little, squat figure in Dutch smallclothes, of ample dimensions in the skirts, and gathered tightly at the knees, which were garnished with silver buckles. Ralph had hitherto been unaware of his presence; but there he sat, with his legs crossed, a short, gold-headed cane in his hand, and smoking a Dutch pipe, as composedly as if he had been there an hour.

"Let that rabbit alone, I say!" repeated he, with more emphasis.

Ralph was not a little startled at the outlandish cut of the little man; nor did he feel more easy when he encountered the fierce positive eye which rested on him as if to search his secret soul; but rallying his faculties, and assuming a look of bravado, he tucked his arms akimbo, and leaning back with consequential air, demanded of the other, whom he was, and why he had interfered with his sport!

For some time the person thus addressed made no reply, but kept on blowing out clouds of smoke, which, for volume and density, completely amazed Ralph. At length, after some pondering, he looked him full in the eyes, and gravely blowing in his face a puff of smoke that nearly strangled him, he answered in a more pacific tone—

"I am a gentleman generally more talked of than known, Mr. Craft, and one who knows you better than you are aware of, and who, on a pinch, may aid you. But tell me," added he, in a more menacing tone, "what strange freak has sent you hither sporting by moonlight?"

Ralph hesitated for a moment; but he was a man of few secrets. His affairs were the town talk, the temper of his wife was as much the dread of the village as of himself, and it mattered little whether one person, more or less, was initiated in the secret of his troubles. So, without much purley, he frankly disclosed the nature of the errand on which he had been sent, and the necessity for his success.

"Mr. Craft," said the little man, extending one hand gravely forward, whilst he pressed the other upon his heart, "I respect you—I sympathize with you—I will assist you."

Ralph eyed him dubiously. At length he said, "You are a small man, though corpulent."

"But I'm vigorous!" exclaimed the stranger, stretching out one leg, and working his arms and shoulders as if in the act of rowing, for the purpose of showing off his muscle, "vigorous, sir, very vigorous. I can do anything to serve you, and I will! Name your request."

Ralph's eyes sparkled: he looked cautiously about him, made two or three steps forward and looked down the swamp, glanced behind the trees and up among the branches; then coming back, he approached his mouth within two inches of the ear of the other, and asked, with some hesitation, "Do you think you could flog Mrs. Craft?"

"Mrs. Craft! your wife!" exclaimed the other.

"The same," replied Ralph, in a disappointed tone. "She is a tough one. I believe she'd bully Old Nick himself."

"She'd find that difficult!" exclaimed the stranger, drawing a hard breath between his teeth, and tightening his coat about him.

"Not so difficult as you imagine," answered Ralph.

"Sir!" exclaimed the little man, springing from the fence, with his pipe in one hand and his cane in the other, and bridling up to Ralph—"Sir! you are not acquainted with the gentleman of whom you speak!"

"No," replied Ralph, laconically, "but I am with Mrs. Craft." The stranger's cholera seemed rising; he thrust his pipe in his buttonhole, and paced rapidly backward and forward. At length, stopping short, he thrust his cane emphatically in the ground and exclaimed—"I'll do it."

"Mr. Craft," said he, "I have some business to attend to at this hour, but will return in half an hour. If you will wait for me, I may do you a good turn that few others would."

Ralph knew that there was little likelihood of his sleeping beneath his own roof, and being in no very particular hurry, promised His new acquaintance then turned abruptly from him, and walking across the field with a speed which, for one of his appearance, struck Ralph as marvellous, disappeared among the underwood that clustered about the head of Flag Brook, shrouding a huge bed of mud and slime.

"In the mire," thought Ralph; "his short legs won't help him much; but that is no affair of mine."

Ralph's first impulse, after his departure, was to reload his gun and to look round for his dog; but Grim was nowhere to be seen. Supposing, however, that he had set off in pursuit of the rabbit, which had also disappeared, he gave himself no further thought about him, but leaning against the fence, thrust his hands in his pockets and amused himself sometimes by wondering who the stranger could be, sometimes by whistling, or by watching the moon as it sailed through the deep blue arch over his head.

In half an hour, punctual to his word, the stranger was seen coming across the field. He did not move with the elasticity with which he had set out; and upon his near approach, Ralph observed that his coat was nearly torn from his shoulders, his cocked hat was battered and bent in, and there were sundry rents in the nether extremity of his smallclothes. When he came up he panted violently, as if exhausted by great exertion, and as he turned his face in the moonlight, it appeared striped and seamed with scratches, like the bark of a young plum tree. In his hand he held several partridges which he flung towards Ralph.

"I have reflected on your situation, Mr. Craft," said he, respectfully, "and find that you are more to be pitied than blamed. Take these birds, and make your peace with your wife—from my soul I pity you."

"You seem to need that yourself," replied Ralph, compassionately; how came your clothes so tattered, and your face so terribly scratched?"

"In the bushes," answered the other, crabbedly: "here are your birds, take them, and ask me no further questions, for I'm not in the humour to answer them. Go home to your wife. Good night."

As he spoke he turned on his heel, and ascending the hill was lost in a thicket which shrouded Dorsorus Lane.

Ralph watched him until he was out of sight; then taking up his gift he whistled to Grim; but no dog came. Knowing, however, that the animal would be sure to find his way to the village, he set out with a light step. Within a short distance of his dwelling he fell in with the cur, who seemed almost beside himself with joy at their meeting.

Upon entering his kitchen, Ralph was thunderstruck. In the centre stood Mrs. Craft, with a face like a ripened tomato, and a broken broomstick in her hand. Tables, chairs, stools, plates and dishes strewn the floor. Windows were broken: everything bore indication of the utmost confusion; and nearly all the furniture was in a state of dilapidation. Her story was soon told to her husband, and to a group of listening neighbours, who had assembled at the noise of the fracas.

About an hour previous, a corpulent little gentleman, in a cocked hat and loose breeches, with a cane in his hand, and a pipe in his buttonhole, had walked in the kitchen. Seating himself in front of the fire, apparently as much at his ease as if the house belonged to him, he lighted his pipe, and with a few whiffs filled the room with smoke. Mrs. Craft was not the woman to put up with this, and accordingly the intruder was requested to desist. He replied that if the smoke was unpleasant to Mrs. Craft, she was at liberty to quit the house, as he should not cease till his pipe was out. One word brought on another, until at length the matter came to blows, and a battle of that kind, which, by way of distinction, is called "royal," ensued. It was carried on with great vigour on both sides, but ended in the expulsion of the intruder, although nearly all the household furniture was demolished in the struggle. Mrs. Craft was in a violent taking, and was resolutely bent on having the law of the fellow; but, unfortunately for the success of her intention, he was never heard of from that day to this.

From the conversation which had taken place between himself and the little man, Ralph was enabled to give a pretty shrewd guess as to whom he might be. But he kept the secret to himself; for he feared that his character might suffer, were it generally known that he had indulged a sociable chat with a person so notoriously corrupt in his morals. And, moreover, he entertained a lurking feeling of gratitude towards one who had thus valorously enlisted in his behalf, and cared not to see him held up to the ridicule of the world. He kept the secret until his wife was on her death-bed, when by way of comforting her in her last moments, he informed her of the whole of that night's adventure, assuring her that she had gained a victory over no less a person than "Old Nick" himself; and hinting, that as she had overcome him, when he intruded in her kitchen, there was little doubt but that she would be able to give him a hard tussle even in his own domains.

ORIGINAL CRITICISM.

GOETHE'S FAUSTUS.

FOURTH NOTICE.

"Thy close of a weary day, and once more for the solace of my library! It is a bank that never suspends. Come what, come may, it always redeems its promises in sterling coin—unalloyed silver, pure gold. Steamers come and go, but thy stock is always at par. Other crops fail, but thy harvest is ever true to the prospects of its seed-time!" Hand me Faustus!

When we part with our philosopher, he was clothed with his new acquaintance the poodle. Goethe, by the way, is said to have entertained a whimsical aversion to dogs; but this was hardly the inducement to assume the canine shape to Mephistopheles. Thus masquerading as traditional. It is handed down in the books.

On entering his study, Faustus soon finds his companion troublesome; and without pausing over the details of the scene, it is enough to say that the poodle turns out Mephistopheles, in the dress of a travelling scholar. Faustus begs to be better acquainted, and asks of his visitor, somewhat peremptorily, who the deuce he may be. Mephistopheles gives the following account of himself.

I am the Spirit

That evermore deny,—and in denying Evermore am I right—"No!" say I, "No!"
To all projected or produced—what'er
Comes into being merits nothing but Perdition—better then that nothing were Brought into being!—what you men call sun—
Destruction—in short, evil—is my province,
My proper element.

Here, then, is the first great element of the evil spirit—DENIAL! Doubt, distrust, want of faith in God and nature, in man's capacities and in his maker's goodness, these are the devil's first attributes; and in so far as they are shared by man, they assimilate him to the devil's likeness. Pass we over this scene to the next, where the business of the poem begins in earnest; the scene of the compact, where, after the old legend, Faustus sells himself to the spirit of darkness. The devil is no longer a poodle, or the travelling scholar, but comes in a shape which, no doubt, suggested the graphic description in Coleridge's (better known as Parson's) Devil's Walk.

"And how then was the devil dealt?
Oh! he was in his Sunday's best:
His jacket was red and his breeches were blue,
And there was a hole where the tail came through."

But the devil of Faustus has no perceptible tail, and, indeed, no eleven foot. Nothing of the Coleridge costume do we find but the red jacket, and yet before looking up the passage it seemed to us that there was not a little resemblance. It is only in the general flash and jauntiness of the respective styles. Both poets intended to describe him with an air. Listen to Mephistopheles's own account of himself:

From your mind to scatter wholly
The mists of peevish melancholy,
Hither come I now and here
Of a young lord the noble air,
And mask me in his character;
My dress is splendid, you behold,
Blazing with the ruddy gold,
With my stiff silken mantle's pride,
And the long sword hanging by my side,
And o'er my cap the cock's proud feather—
I'm a fine fellow altogether.
And now, my friend, without delay,
Equip yourself in like array,
That, light and free, you thus may see
Life's many pleasures what they be!

A most gay and gentlemanlike devil, and withal a devil of the most seeming benevolence of disposition! Attractive, certainly, if not irresistible; coming as he does with no purpose, under heaven, but to draw the philosopher from the toils of his dusty seclusion, and to show him a little fashionable life. In this stage of the temptation, one would be apt to be on the head of the doctor; wearied as he is, bitterly dissatisfied, and longing restlessly for change—he knows not what or wherefore. The reply of Faustus is one of the most touching and beautiful passages in poetry. It thrills a chord in the universal heart. We copy it, and if any long-eared gentleman should perchance light upon it, who may have heard of Goethe but never read a line of him in the original, or in Anster's noble translation, we commend him, in preference, to seek his intellectual amusement in the echo of his diurnal braying. Dunces there are, who deem these notices "infections"—"current calamities," we suppose, though they purport only to extract the essence of a world-work, that hardly ten score of our countrymen can read familiarly in its native tongue, and which has never been reprinted in any shape on this side the Atlantic. Faustus was not written for dunces; but we are wrong, for the sake of saying so, to detain our readers from the doctor's reply:

Oh! I would feel in such a dress more bitterly
The narrow cramping limits of man's nature!
I am too old to yield myself to pleasure,
Too young to have the appetite departed.
What can earth give me now? "Refrain, refrain!"
This is the everlasting song—the chime
Perpetually jingling in the ears,
And with hoarse accents every hour repeats it.
Each morn, with a dull sense of something dreadful,
I wake, and from my bitter heart could weep
To see another day, which, in its course,
Will not fulfil one wish of mine—not one!
The teasing crowds of small anxieties,
That each day brings, have frittered into dust
All joy, until the very hope of joy
Is something that the heart has ceased to feel;
And life's poor masquerade,—vapid and wayward,
And worthless as it is—breaks in upon
And dissipates the world, which for itself
The lonely man's imagination builds;
And when the night is come, with heavy heart
Must I lie down upon my bed, where rest
Is never granted me, where wild dreams come,
Hideous and scaring. The in-dwelling spirit,
Whose temple is my heart, who rules its powers,
Can stir the bosom to its lowest depths,
But has no power to rile external nature;
And therefore is existence burdensome,
And death desirable, and life detested.

Mephistopheles suggests that in spite of all this, death is no welcome guest; and recalls the occasion when a certain gentleman, after a long soliloquy, with the view of screwing his courage to the sticking point, forbore to quaff a certain dark-brown liquid. Faustus asks if playing the spy is one of the devil's gentlemanly practices; and the devil informs him that some things he knows, but not all. The philosopher rejoins:

And if from harrowing thoughts the rich old chauson
Did win me; and the old remembered words,
And the old music, like a spell recalling
Faded remembrances; if, in the trance,
All that remained of my boy's heart was captive
To the charmed echo of more happy days—
Knew I not,—feel I not it was illusion?
We are but what the senses make of us!
And this, and all illusion do I curse;
All that beguiles as man or boy—that winds
Over the heart its nets, and chains us here,
In thrall down, or voluntary trance;

This magic jugglery, that fools the soul,—
These occult powers that cloud and flatter it!
Oh, cursed first of all be the high thoughts
That man conceives of his own attributes!
And cursed be the shadowy appearances,
The false delusive images of things,
That slave and mock the senses! Cursed be
The hypocrite dreams that soothe us when we think
Of fame—of deathless and enduring names!
Cursed be all that in self-dedication
We call our own,—wife, child, or slave, or plough;
Curse upon Mammon, when with luring gold
He stirs our souls to hardy deeds, or when
He spreads the couch of indolent repose;
A curse upon the sweet grape's balmy juice;
And the passionate joys of love—man's highest joys!
And cursed be all hope and all belief;
And, cursed more than all, man's tame endurance.

Very ripe for the devil, one would say, after reading this summary course. A good time has the tempter taken. Hark to the song of invisible spirits—little ones of darkness, and its good children! It seconds the soliciting of Mephistopheles, and would lure the old man from his solitude and misanthropy to mix with his fellows, and to taste the pleasures of life. The fiend promises to manage matters to his liking, and offers to become his comrade or servant. Faustus asks his terms. He gets the uniform rogue's answer, that they will talk of that hereafter. Not so, thinks Faustus. Knowing the devil to be "very selfish," and not hesitating to tell him as much to his face, he insists on present conditions. The fiend agrees then to bind himself to the bidding and beck of Faustus in this world; with the proviso that when they meet in another place, Faustus shall be his servant. The engagement made, and all pleasures should be his, rare devices of devil's craft, strange scenes and merry ones, and sights new to man's eye. But how can the unsatisfied devil impart joys which he may not realize? "What, poor devil, wilt thou give?" we recur to the prose translation of Hayward. "Was the mind of a man, in its high aspiring, ever comprehended by the like of thee? But if thou hast food which never satisfies; ruddy gold which, volatile, like quicksilver, melts away in the hand; a game, at which one never wins; a maiden who, on my breast, is already ogling my neighbour; the bright, god-like joy of honour, which vanishes like a meteor!—Show me the fruit which rots before it is plucked, and trees which every day grow green anew."

Of such treasures the fiend boasts the possession, and promises that with the lapse of time and the improvement of his taste, the doctor shall enjoy them in peace and comfort. None of this would the doctor. Peace and comfort he reckes not of, hopes not, asks not. If the devil can flatter or delude him into a moment of repose, cheat him with a day's tranquil enjoyment, he is willing that day should be his last—and thus offers his wager. "Done," says the fiend. "And my hand upon it!"—replies the doctor. "Think well of it," rejoins Mephistopheles, and, to guard against accidents, hints that it would be well to pass a line or two in writing for their mutual security.

The beautiful passage which follows is an amplification, rather than a version of the original; but it is amplified without being distended, or losing vigor. We must copy it, for no one will say that it is not of the highest order of poetry:

And dost thou ask a writing, too, poor pedant?
Know you not Man? Man's nature! or Man's word!
Is it not enough that I have spoken it?
My very life,—all that I have and am,
What is it but an echo of my word,
Pledge of the will that gives it utterance?
If words be nothing, what is writing more?
Is the world's course one sea of stormy madness,—
Is thousand strifes, in conflict everlasting,
Hav'ng regardlessly I roll they not on?
Must they not roll!—and can it be that I,
In this perpetual movement, shall not move,
Held back, the slave and prisoner of a promise?
Yet in this fancy all believe alike.
If a delusion, all men are deluded—
And is there one that would be undeluded?
Truth and the feeling of integrity
Are of the heart's own essence—should they call
For sufferings, none repeats the sacrifice.
Oh, happy he whom Truth accompanies
In all his walks—from outward embrace free—
Pure of all soul-dwelling within the heart,
Light to his steps and guidance: oracle
To lead or to mislead none doth he seek;
Consults no casuist but an honest conscience;
Of sacrifices reckes not and repents not.
But a stamped parchment and a formal deed,
With seal and signature, all shams from this
As something that offends and wounds our nature;
It robs, methinks, the words of all their life;
The letter and that only binds us now;
Such virtue, and no other can it have,
As seal and stamp, as lead and wax can give—
But why!—why argue for it or against it!
Is writing more than the unwritten word?
What, evil one, what is it you require?
Bran? marble? parchment? paper!—do you wish
Graver or chisel? or plain pen and ink?
Have cities you please—any or all of them.

The devil cries out against this waste of oratory. He wants but the scratch of his name, and in blood; for blood is a "peculiar juice." The name is signed, and the traditional deed is extant, in which Doctor Faustus enters into the compact with "the demon high Mephistopheles, late chargé d'affaires to the infernal prince of the Orient, but now subject to all my demands."

The old man is now wholly the devil's. The evil spirit that was struggling with a better in his bosom wins the mastery. He becomes the slave of sin. The demon of unrest has triumphed; and the pale student, cursed with unsatisfying knowledge, devotes himself,

Heart, soul and life to rapturous excitement—
Such dizzy, such intoxicating joy,
As, when we stand upon a precipice,
Makes reel the giddy senses and the brain whirl!
From this day forward am I dedicate
To the indulgence of tempestuous passion—
Love agonizing—doling hatred—
Cheering vexation—all that animates
And is our nature; and the heart, serene,
And separated from the toil of knowledge,
Cured of the fever that so long oppressed it,
Shall cease to shut itself against the world
Of pain; what'er is portioned 'mong mankind,
In my own intimate self shall I enjoy,
With my soul grasp at thoughts most high or deep,
Heap on my heart all human joys and woes,
Expand myself until mankind become
A part, as 'twere of my identity.
And they and I at last together perish

Here for the time drop we the curtain. The watch-hand points to the little hours. With how many at this moment is an evil spirit bargaining for their eternal bondage—and the lure dazzling as that which purchased Faustus!

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

THE BRIDE OF THE SUN.

SOME three years ago, there lived at Montmartre, in the private establishment of the kind and indefatigable Doctor Blanche, a woman whose insanity was singular and affecting. She was young, her features were pleasing, and her smile still more so; the only mental disorder she had was the belief that she was betrothed to the sun—he had promised her marriage, she thought, on a bright autumn morning, and her love had covered his radiant visage with clouds to avoid dazzling the eyes of his mistress. Since that time, he had been hers, and she his; she had felt her spouse's burning kiss imprinted on her hand, and she now lived for him alone. The sun was her joy, and her pride, and her glory; poor creature; she rose at the very instant when her best-beloved cast his first rays across the sky, and bailed him with her looks, as the birds do with their songs, the stream with its murmur, the flowers with their perfume. The finer the day, the clearer the sky, the more radiant the whole face of nature, the happier was the poor wretch! Was it not her godlike husband that distributed light, and warmth, and comfort around him? Was he not the monarch of the world, and was he not here! So she watched every change of place or appearance which her divinity presented; she seemed anxious not to lose the feeblest of his rays, and the higher he rose in heaven the more ardent was her poetical enthusiasm. She could hardly be persuaded to take her meals, so full of her passion was she; and to make her eat, it was necessary to tell her that it was her divine spouse who had guided these fruits, ripened the grain and these grapes—so that she had a right to sit down at the table he had himself prepared for her. As night drew near, and the sun was on the point of sinking into the waters of the Seine, his tender spouse became as uneasy as any poor fisherman's wife, whose husband has been absent a couple of months, when she hears the sea roar—"What will become of my husband?" she used to say—"If he only escapes accidents while he is on his journey!" Gradually day would give place to night; then she would clasp her hands, and cry—"Wait for me—wait!" and hurry to rest.

Singular and happy madness! sweet delusion! to feel that one's soul belongs to the sun in heaven—to have no other desire than for an unclouded sky—to fear nothing but the dark clouds that sometimes obscure the face of the great luminary—to be happy wherever all nature is happy! Such was the life of this poor lunatic for ten years. She had her troubles, too, as much as though she had retained her reason; for as soon as winter approached, and she saw the face of her spouse grow pale, like that of a man mortally wounded when she saw his figure hidden behind thick clouds, like a great man whose renown is hidden by envy, she became the most melancholy of women. How long and sad were the short days of winter! The more exalted her bridegroom was, the more did she suffer at seeing him debased, obscured, enshrouded, and helpless. But she was soon to be happy again; yet a little while, and the sun pieces through the thick masses of vapour that conceal his brightness, and reappears in all his grandeur and glory. So, when this poor lunatic found her spouse, at the return of spring, the same as he had been in the foregoing season, and saw the leaves of every tree and bush breaking their prisons to welcome him, joy returned to her spirit—she put on her gayest dresses, and sang her most cheerful hymn: "Rejoice, all ye in heaven and on earth; rejoice, ye stars of the firmament; and rejoice, ye waves of the stream!—ye angels who are above our heads, and ye men who tread the earth beneath your feet, rejoice! for my spouse, the sun, was sick, and has come back in health: he was lost, and now is found!"

This happy delusion, as we have said, lasted ten years, in spite of all the efforts of science. The bride of the sun died some three years ago, and her death was as touching as her life. It was noon of a lovely day; the sun was bright, yet mild, and showered down its purest rays on all creation. His bride, seated on the turf under an aged fruit-tree, watched the movements of her august spouse in the sky. Her heart had never been more filled with love, her glances had never been more tender, her dream had never approached nearer to a reality. They understood each other so well, she and she—she moved so slowly through the sky, doubtless to have the more time to look upon her as she knelt before him. But, oh heavens! all at once the fountain of light and heat stops, and grows dark; all at once it disappears—not as formerly, sinking gradually into the river, after having shaken brilliant gold-dust from his garments; but pauses abruptly, hides his visage, and—as seen by no more. Where is he? "Yes!" she screamed, "my husband is with a rival—he is false to me! he has left me during the day, and will not return again at night!" and the poor creature, who lived only to gaze on him by day, to wait for him at night, to greet him in the morning, to sing his praise in spring, to admire him in summer, and weep for him in winter—the poor creature, seeing him disappear so suddenly, without knowing whether he went, or when he would return, died during the eclipse—died of jealousy, love, and despair.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Shakespeare and his Friends; or, The Golden Age of Merry England. In three volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

The suspension of specie payments in our sister city does not appear to have affected its publishing interests greatly if we may judge from the number of new books which come to us from that quarter. "Shakespeare and his Friends" cannot fail to meet with a hearty welcome from the public. It is a rare and ingenious work, full of admirable pictures of the times, and of characteristic sketches of the great bard. The following extract we offer as a specimen of the style:

Master Shakespeare being left alone, did presently draw up his chair closer to the table on which he had been writing, and did resume his labours with an admirable diligence. Mayhap he was engaged in the inditing of one of those right famous plays which did bring so much honour to his name; but know I not this for a surety; and as a trustworthy chronicler, I will only subscribe to that of which I have perfect knowledge. However, it is certain that he had not been long so engaged, when a third knock was heard at the door, so gentle it was scarcely audible; and although he seemed at first somewhat impatient of interruption, (for no man likes to be much disturbed in his privacy,) when, upon his giving permission to the person to enter, he observed his visitor, he gave him most courteous welcome. He was a youth, aged seventeen, or thereabouts, tall, slim, and elegant, and though clad in homely ruses, there was that in his graceful carriage, and in his mild yet thoughtful countenance, that did signify something of a far higher quality than such poor apparel did denote. But most remarkable was the exceeding modesty of his deportment. He opened and closed the door almost tremblingly, and respectfully taking off his hat, advanced into the room with downcast eyes, to the great marvel of our illustrious poet.

"I took the boldness, Master Shakespeare," said the youth, falteringly, as he kept smoothing his hat with his hand where he stood in the middle of the chamber—"I took the boldness some short time since to send you a tragedy of my poor contrivance; hoping, from what I had heard of your worthy disposition, that you would honour that humble attempt to such an extent as to give it your perusal; and peradventure if such an obscure individual be not thought altogether unworthy of attention from one so excellently gifted as yourself, you will favour me so far as to grant me your opinion of its matter and management."

"That will I, worthy sir, without fail," replied Master Shakespeare, regarding his young visitor with more than ordinary interest. "But you must first acquaint me with your name, and the title of the play you entrusted to my custody; for my reputation, however little deserved it may be, and my influence at the play-house, which is thought to be greater than it is, are the causes of my being continually applied to for a similar purpose."

"The tragedy was called 'Henry and Leicester,' and I signed my name 'Francis,'" murmured the youth.

"Let me beg of you to be seated, worthy Master Francis," exclaimed the other, as he hastily handed him a chair. "I remember it well," he added, as he searched among his papers on the table, "by the token that it did contain many passages that exhibited no mean ability."

The melancholy aspect of the young stranger did brighten up marvellously at the hearing of this commendation, and his eyes looked abundance of thanks. He argued the most favourable conclusion from so promising a commencement, for it is the nature of youth to be sanguine upon very little occasion.

"I have it," said Master Shakespeare, as he laid hold of the manuscript, and, opening it, set himself down in the chair, as if to give it a careful examination: then added, "but in all honesty, I must acknowledge that it hath a total unfitness for representation."

At this the youth's countenance became blanched with a sudden paleness. "It hath a lack of everything which is most necessary for a drama to have, to wit, action, interest, and character;—the which if it have not, were it written by King Solomon himself, or the seven wise masters in conjunction, it would have no chance with our modern audiences. The time of mysteries and moralities hath gone by. People now will not listen to dialogues without an object, and plays without a plot. David hath ceased to abuse Goliath in a set speech an hour long, and Joseph Lingereth no longer to preach a tedious sermon to Potiphar's wife. If a play have not action it must needs have but little interest; for although something may occasionally be done in a narrative form, if the ball be not kept up—that is to say, if the dramatis personæ be doing of nothing—even if the sentences be proverbial of wisdom, then shall the play be a bad play. Again, if the characters who form the plot have no individuality or distinct features, in accordance with nature or probability, though they look like Alexanders and argue like Aristotles, shall the play be a bad play. Your tragedy, Master Francis, hath these particular defects, and I should be hugely deficient in candour, and in no way deserving the confidence you have been pleased to place in me, were I to refrain from telling you that it cannot be acted with any profit either to yourself or others. There is another objection to it—the subject hath already been done by Kit Marlowe."

Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life, a Selection from the papers of the late Arthur Austin. New-York: Robert Carter, 55 Canal-street.

We are glad to see a new edition of this excellent work, by John Wilson, alias Christopher North. We know of no work of fiction more suitable to be placed in the hands of the young and pure-minded. It is beautifully written, and possesses the charms of highly-wrought interest and striking thoughts clothed in a diction at once animated and refined.

United States Military Magazine, and Record of all the Volunteers of the Army and Navy. Philadelphia: Huddy and Duval.

The coloured embellishments to this valuable work are remarkably well executed. The last number contains a view of Camp Washington, near Trenton, New-Jersey, and a soldier in the uniform of the Washington Light Infantry. It has, besides, facsimiles of the handwriting of Major Andre and of Arnold the traitor, with a portrait of himself drawn by the former the day before his execution.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We publish to-day another poem from the pen of Miss Vandenhoff, which will be admired for the grace of its expression and melody of versification.—The thrilling story from the German of the "Dead Guest" will be concluded in our next number. It is one of the most remarkable and exciting legends we have ever perused.—The sketch relating to Trinity Church by our old correspondent, "Laurie Todd," shall appear in our next.—A friend at our elbow assures us that the new work from the press of Messrs. Lea and Blanchard, entitled "Shakespeare and his Friends," is the best work of fiction that has appeared since "Vivian Grey"—"The sunset to Charles Rean," by "Alistair," is doubtless well intended, but it would be more complimentary if it had been better constructed.—Numerous translations from the French and German have been received at our office, which are respectfully declined.—The lines to the Hudson have already appeared in another journal. We agree with our correspondent that they are "capital!"—We must decline the contributions, signed, respectively, "T. C.," "Windburst," "Marion," "Western Bard," "X. E. T.," "Juvenal" and "A Lounger at the Apollo."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1839.

Portrait painting and engraving.—We have seen some exquisite specimens of mezzotint engraving by Mr. Sudd, a young artist, recently from London, which cannot fail to excite the attention of amateurs. The likenesses of James Sheridan Knowles and Henry Clay, originally painted by our young native artist, S. S. Osgood, and now engraved by Mr. Sudd, have the double merit of being faithful portraits and beautiful pictures. The following notice of the joint labours of Messrs. Osgood and Sudd is from a recent number of the London Weekly Dispatch:—"Mr. Osgood, an American artist, of whose works in this country our press has frequently spoken in terms of high praise, completed, just before he left England, a portrait of Sheridan Knowles. The likeness has been well engraved by Sudd, and the public are now in possession of a good resemblance of this very eminent dramatist. Mr. Osgood, during his residence in this country, availed himself of the great advantages which it affords to the study of art in its higher department, and his recent productions were greatly esteemed by the Royal Academy and our amateurs." We learn that Mr. Osgood will pass the coming winter in Charleston, South Carolina. We commend him to the favourable notice of all friends of the art in that city. As a portrait-painter his reputation in London has been very great—and his full-length picture of the celebrated Mrs. Norton, as well as his portraits of Thomas Campbell, Lord Lyndhurst, Charles Dickens, and other distinguished persons, were severally pronounced by the originals the best that had ever been taken of themselves. Mr. Sudd, the engraver, is no less eminent in his profession; and we learn with pleasure that he has been encouraged to settle permanently in this city.

Wooden pavements.—Some of the disadvantages of this new mode of paving begin to manifest themselves. It is found to render our streets quite as unsafe as would a heavy fall of snow, with vehicles passing and re-passing without bells. The space between Blocker and Fourth streets, recently paved in this manner, appears to be peculiarly calculated to outstep pedestrians. It is so smooth, level, and floor-like, that the temptation to a driver to give his horses full rein in skimming over it is very great. Indeed it was no later than last week that we witnessed an accident, which befel a lady, who in crossing this wooden track was struck by the wheel of a light wagon driven by some dashing youth, whereby she was seriously bruised. The considerate young man did not even stop to inquire if the lady were hurt, but drove on as if he had accomplished quite an artist-like feat in running over an unprotected female. Another accident of a far more deplorable character took place some ten days since in Clinton place, where a wooden pavement had been laid down. A little girl was run over by two carts, furiously driven, and instantly killed. The innocent victim was stooping down to pick up some flowers, and as she rose, she was struck by one of the shafts and knocked down; and before the horses could be stopped, both carts had passed over her! These facts are certainly worth considering before the plan of paving with wood is extended.

The author of "Highways and Byways."—The reader may not be aware that the author of this deeply interesting and remarkable work, Mr. Grattan, is now residing in Boston as British Consul. We learn from the papers of that city that a new work from his pen may soon be expected. It will be welcomed by every lover of literature in the land, and we respond to the wish expressed by a contemporary, that our publishers will, in common courtesy, suffer Mr. Grattan to reap the benefit of the sale of his works in the United States, notwithstanding the non-existence of an international copyright law. Mr. Grattan is one of the best writers of fiction of the day; and as a historical novelist, he has not, since the departure of Walter Scott, had his superior. We cannot doubt that the hospitable people of Boston will cherish the distinguished sojourner amongst them with all the attention that is due to an author of his talents and reputation.

Music.—The beautiful air which the Mirror of this week contains is by Mr. Bassini, who has lately established himself in this city—and who proposes giving instruction in singing in the pure and classical Italian style. Mr. Bassini was a scholar of the Royal Conservatory of Music at Naples, and studied for ten years under Crescentini and Zingarelli, two of the most celebrated masters of Italy. Mr. Bassini is capable of giving a high order of musical instruction, and would be an important aid to those who have acquired considerable proficiency, in obtaining a finished method.—Address at Altwill's music store.

Prospects of a new metropolitan theatre.—We learn that the amount subscribed toward the erection of a new metropolitan theatre for James Wallack and his company has been such as to authorize the committee to close their purchase of the site on Broadway, between Chamber and Read streets. This is unquestionably the most appropriate and eligible location for an establishment of this kind in the city. Numerous architectural plans, some of great beauty, have been already handed in to the committee. It is contemplated to have the front on Chamber-street, facing the Park and City-Hall, and commanding an extensive view of Broadway. If the project is successfully carried out, Mr. Wallack will, before next September, find himself at the head of one of the noblest theatrical establishments in the world.

Influence of women.—A writer in the New-York Review, speaking of the Roman women, and their influence during the existence of the kingdom, says; "From the time of the Sabines to Theodora's conquest of Justinian, women seems to have been at the bottom of almost all the memorable events of Roman story. Lucretia, Virginia, Veturia, Fabia the wife of Licinius, who became at her instigation the first plebeian consul, are illustrious examples of this; and whatever may be the changes of manners and opinions, as Hume has well remarked, all nations, with one accord, point, for the ideal of a virtuous matron, to the daughter of Scipio and the mother of the Gracchi." Who, then, will doubt the influence of women!

Water-lilies in the west.—The editor of the Peoria Register speaks with enthusiasm of the magnificent water-lilies, which abound in Illinois. He says they grow in water of various depths, sometimes as deep as ten feet, presenting a smooth leafless stalk, till it arrives at the surface, where there is a large circular leaf, often two feet in diameter, not unlike, and full as large as an old-fashioned pewter platter in the time of our great grandmothers. From the centre of this leaf rises a stalk six or eight inches in height, supporting a splendid flower of a light orange colour—some of the petals of which are three or more inches in length. What a field for the florist in our western prairies and forests!

Tribute to genius.—A statue of Sir Walter Scott by Ritchie, a Scotch sculptor, was set up at Selkirk last September. It is seven and a half feet high, and presents a striking likeness of the poet. Sir Walter is in the costume of the sheriff, in his gown, with a roll of papers in his left hand, his right resting on his trusty staff. On the several sides of the pedestal are his hereditary arms, and the arms of the burgh. On the two compartments are emblematic allusions to the character of the poet and the novelist—a winged harp with the word Waverley under it, and a finely-cut Scotch thistle on another panel.

Nr.'s Mate.—We regret that we have room merely to announce the appearance of this new and admirable romance by Rufus Dawes, Esq. It is founded on a Boston legend, and the narrative is wrought out with remarkable power and ingenuity. The pictures of character are vivid and faithful, and a strict adherence to truth is visible in the local descriptions. As an interesting work of fiction, it is in favour to no American novel that has yet appeared; and, apart from all personal predilections in the author's favour, we sincerely recommend it to all who can appreciate the charms of a pure and vigorous style, or have a taste for the highest order of novel-writing. We shall have more to say of this work next week.

Theatrical attractions in anticipation.—We learn on good authority that Fanny Elster, the celebrated danseuse, and her sister will appear at the Park theatre before the close of the next summer. Fanny Elster is the only rival said to compete with Tagliioni. It is also whispered that Miss Ellen Tree will re-appear at the Park next September, and that she will bring over a new play, by James Spenden Knowles, of a character not inferior to the Hunchback. If all this be true, the prospects of the Park during the coming season are quite brilliant.

Free admissions.—Some complaints have been made against the managers of the Park theatre, in consequence of the new regulation requiring editors, and those having a free admission, to leave their cards with the door-keepers before entering. Now, if any one has reason to complain of this, we think it is the door-keepers, and not the "gentlemen of the press." The regulation is plainly intended as a check upon the admission of persons having no claim to be admitted. The trouble of producing a card is very slight, and, after all, it is no more than a piece of courtesy due to the manager. The custom has prevailed time out of mind at the London theatres.

An august authoress.—A letter from Dresden states that the Princess Amelia of Saxony has lately finished a new comedy in prose, in three acts, entitled Die Stiefelocher, which was performed by amateurs, a month or two ago, at the royal residence of Plinitz, before their majesties, the royal family and the court. The august authoress and Prince John, her brother, sustained the principal parts. We do not doubt that there was a plenty of applause among the courtiers, who composed the audience. There would be no need of hired claqueurs upon such an occasion.

Success of newspapers.—It is a fact, which we do not remember to have seen noticed, that newspapers flourish best in times of great prostration of business and scarcity of money. The "Evening Signal," which was commenced immediately upon the suspension of specie payments by the banks of Philadelphia, has attained a circulation second to that of no daily paper in the city of New-York. Its weekly compend, "the New World," is also proportionately successful, and is now everywhere to be seen.

ROMANZA.

COMPOSED, AND DEDICATED TO GENERAL GEORGE P. MORRIS, BY C. BASSINI, MEMBER OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF NAPLES.

ANDANTINO GRAZIOSO.

CON SEMPLICITÀ.

A te vi - ci - no D'a - mor, d'a - mor mi mo - ro;

Non ho mai be - ne Lon - tan - da - te. Ah! tu con - so - la. Que - sto mio co - re; po - tro' con - for - to A - ver da - te. A te vi - ci - no D'a - mor mi mo - ro, Non ho mai be - ne, non ben, Lon - tan - da - te, da - te, Lon - tan - no, no, Non ho mai be - ne, non ben, Lon - tan, Lon - tan, lon - tan da - te.

mf mf f p pp p mf mf

Sw. Cres. cen. do. For. mf mf

MISCELLANY.

CORRECT SENTIMENTS—The Louisiana, speaking of the ambition on the part of the American ladies when in a foreign land, who vie in magnificence of apparel and ornaments, with the wives and daughters of noblemen, who bask in the sunshine of royalty, says, that it conceives that American men and women would know better taste and command more credit to themselves and their country, by exhibiting abroad, and particularly in the presence of royalty, the plain simplicity of dress and manners, in which they have been educated, and to which they have been accustomed. There is a grandeur in simplicity when no attempt at artificial grandeur can attain. This, however, is a matter of taste, on which it is useless to argue.

POLITICAL DUTIES—Chalmers in his remarks on self-culture, says, that among the best people there are some, who, through disgust with the violence of parties, withdraw themselves from all political action. Such, I conceive, do wrong. God has placed them in no more authorized to shrink from those duties than from those of sons, husbands, or fathers.

BEAUTY OF GERMAN WOMEN—Berlin is considered one of the cities of Germany most celebrated for female beauty. The ladies are, literally speaking, fair, and peculiarly happy in the elegance of their figures. "I saw walk with much feminine grace, and are above all esteemed the most literary, talented, and high-bred of the German women. A letter from there says, 'I had one day the accidental good fortune to see one of these ladies standing opposite to the most faultless and beautiful creation of art which adorns the picture-gallery, and so equal were the rival claims, to admiration of the animate and inanimate beauty, that it would have been difficult to decide on which to bestow the palm, had not the former, possibly imagining the comparison that could not fail to be made, been piqued into assuming her prettiest smile, and the victory was then no longer doubtful.'"

VILLANY AND VIRTUE—Lacan, among many good things, says truly, "Villany that is vigilant, will be an overmatch for Virtue, if she slumber on her post; and hence it is that a bad cause has often triumphed over a good one; for the partisans of the former, knowing that their cause will do nothing for them, have done everything for their cause; whereas the friends of the latter are too apt to expect everything from their cause, and nothing for themselves."

THE AERIAL CONCERT—A distinguished performer, whom we shall call M. B., living in the boulevard St. Denis, lately conceived the strange idea of giving a concert on the roof of his house, in imitation, probably, of the nocturnal performances of his neighbours' cats. Some of the performers placed themselves astride of the crown of the roof, and others in the windows and scuttlies. M. B., who led the orchestra, carried away by the brilliancy of their execution, unluckily forgot the danger of his position, lost his balance and rolled down along the roof. He soon reached the gutters, to which he clung with the strength of despair, but must have fallen, had not a young tenant, who was posted in one of the scuttlies, succeeded in seizing him with a vigorous grasp, and supported him till he could be drawn up by the aid of ropes.

BORROWING—Mother wants to know as how if you'll lend her two sticks of wood? "Yes, there are a couple of logs—but you didn't return the last." "No—and I won't take them 'ere without you sign 'em."

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. Terms, five dollars per annum, payable in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

G. P. Scott, Printer, corner of John and Gold-streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with Accompaniments for the Piano-forte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR. SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NO. 1 BARCLAY-STREET, NEAR BROADWAY. PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

VOLUME SEVENTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1839.

NUMBER TWENTY.

For the New-York Mirror.

THE DYING GIRL TO HER HARP.

BY CHARLOTTE E. VANDENHOFF.

My own loved harp! This heart, though breaking,
To thy music fondly clings;
This hand, though feeble now, is waking
Once again thy fairy strings.

Thy clear chords echo to my fingers'
Lightest touch; thy low tones float
Upon the sunny air, that lingers
Near, to catch each thrilling note.

It is the last I e'er shall waken!
Sleep, sweet music, in thy cell:
Thy chords are severed—I have taken,
Gentle harp, my last farewell!

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE DEAD GUEST.

BY HEINRICH ZSCHOKKE.

CHAPTER VII.

Herr von Hahn took his hat and stick, and walked out. He soon saw that he was in a small town, where a stranger is stared at like a wild animal. Right and left, wherever he walked, hats and caps came off, even before their owners passed him, and every one made a wide circuit to avoid him. The windows that he passed by were closed, but he could see a crowd of curious faces peeping behind every blind. The most provoking of all was when he came near the house he was looking for. Not far from it was an open square, with a fountain in the centre, which discharged its waters through seven pipes into a wide basin. Round the basin were a number of servant girls, all busy, and all chattering; some were cleaning fish, some washing salads, some putting their empty pails under the pipes, and others taking home full ones on their heads. Herr von Hahn stepped aside to ask the way to the house he was looking for of one of these ladies, who were so busy talking that they had not noticed him. As soon as he began to speak, however, and they turned their heads to look at him, good heavens! what shrieking, what confusion! One let her fish fall in the basin, another dropped her salad in the mud, a third let her pail drop, its whole contents coming down over her head and shoulders, and all ran away as fast as they could, except one old woman, whose lower spars were probably out of repair, who clasped the column fast, crossed herself as hard as she could, and stared at him with despair in her looks, while her gray hairs stood straight up on her head—like a cat backed at by a dog, which follows all his movements with back up, hair erect, open mouth, and staring eyes. Herr von Hahn turned away in disgust at their folly, and soon reached the house with the balcony. The recorder, a well-bred little man, received him with much politeness.

"You sent for me," began the stranger, "and in truth I came very readily; for I hope you will be able to solve my doubts. I have been in your town only one day, and have met with more adventures than in all my other travels."

"So I suppose," said the magistrate, smiling. "I have heard of them, and of some really incredible ones. You are Herr von Hahn, son of a banker in the capital; you have connexions with the house of Bantes in this place, and came here because Fraulein Bantes—"

"Perfectly correct. Shall I satisfy you of my identity?" He produced some papers from his pocket-book. The recorder did not deign glancing at them, but returned them in a few moments, with expressions of his perfect satisfaction.

"I have now, sir, told you and proved to you everything as to which you are entitled to information. It is now my turn to ask you to explain all the singularities of your town. Herbesheim is not so far from the rest of the world but that strangers must come here sometimes; how happens it, then, that I—"

"I know what you were about saying, Herr von Hahn. You shall know everything, if you will have the goodness to answer me a couple of questions."

"I am at your service."

"Place my questions for the present, if you please, among the other singularities of the place; you will easily see the reason of them afterwards. Do you always wear black?"

"I am in mourning for an aunt."

"Were you ever here before?"

"Never."

"Had you any acquaintance previously with any of our townspeople, or have you ever happened to hear or read anything of the history of this place?—I mean of old histories, anecdotes, and tales."

"I never knew any person from here, nor anything about the place, except that the house of Bantes was here, and that the daughter was a very amiable young lady, which, I take pleasure in stating, I have found to be the fact."

"Did you ever hear the story of the dead guest of Herbesheim?"

"I repeat it, the history of Herbesheim, especially its ancient history—and I say it to my shame—I am as ignorant of, as of that of Peru or Siam."

"And yet your adventures here are all to be traced directly to it."

"Pray tell me what I have to do with your old stories!"

The magistrate answered with a smile, "People take you for the dead guest, a spirit in one of our popular tales; and, as ridiculous as the fancy of our good townsmen is, I cannot conceal my surprise at the strange likeness you bear to the hero of our story. Taking it for granted that you are ignorant of the tale, I will repeat it as I have heard it from others. It is certainly the first time that an old woman's story has been brought forward so officially." And thereupon he went over the whole legend.

"Now I see it all," said Herr von Hahn, with a laugh, "the fair ladies of your town are afraid of their necks."

"Joking aside, my dear sir, there are still many things I cannot explain. I am willing to ascribe much to chance, but here the chances are so singular, that I cannot help feeling some suspicion of you."

"Why, sir, do you mean to say that you take me for the hero of your story, who visits Herbesheim every hundred years, to murder poor turtle-doves?"

"Certainly not. But did you never hear any of the particulars before? How comes it, for instance, that you chose the first Sunday in Advent for your arrival, and the time when rain and wind were the fiercest?"

"It is indeed a singular accident, and surprises me myself. I can, however, assure you that I am so ignorant of the calendar that I have now the pleasure of learning, for the first time, that I arrived here in advent. I can also safely swear, that I did not command the storm; on the contrary, I would have gladly countermanded it, for I found the bad weather very inconvenient."

"There are some other points as to which I would gladly be better informed, but I will pass them over for the present. You will see that I am fully informed as to all your proceedings, and indeed I may safely say, that the secret police of Herbesheim is not inferior to that in Paris, under the renowned Fouché or Savary. If you did not aim at playing the part of our dead guest, how happens it that you this morning, in a very few minutes, became so intimate with Herr Bantes' daughter, whom you had never seen before; that you—I hardly know how to express it—"

"Do you know that too?" asked Herr von Hahn, and a flush passed over his pale features. He paused awhile, and proceeded: "Really, sir, I begin to stand in greater fear of you, than your good citizens do of my black coat. The walls must have told it, for I was alone with the lady at the time you allude to. Excuse my saying any more. If the walls have informed you of the subject of my conversation, it is needless to mention it; if not, you will suffer me to respect a lady's secret." The magistrate bowed acquiescingly. "To-morrow, I shall leave the town. My business is concluded, and it is really very disagreeable to play the part of the evil one."

And thereupon the conversation changed, and the stranger shortly after took his departure. The magistrate placed himself at the window, to amuse himself with the panic which the appearance of the dreaded personage would produce in the street; but he was not to be seen. On inquiring of the porter, he found that no one had left the house. "That looks a little supernatural, at all events," thought the dignitary. A few minutes afterwards a servant came in, and said the chambermaid was down in the kitchen crying as though her heart would break, and saying that the dead guest was in the parlour with her young mistress, that the lady seemed to be well acquainted with her fearful visitor, that he had made her a present of a splendid pair of bracelets, and was just then whispering in her ear. The magistrate laughed at first, but, the more he thought of the matter, the less inclination he felt to laugh. "What!" thought he, "bracelets! whispering with my Julia! How did he get acquainted with her! If the fellow is not the spirit after all, he behaves playfully like him." In an anxiety he would have been ashamed to acknowledge, he hurried to his daughter's room. There she sat, admiring the superb bracelets.

"What is all this?" was his first question.

"A present for Frederica Bantes from Herr von Hahn," was the answer. "He leaves town early to-morrow morning, and has some reason for not going to her father's again. I'm sure I can't understand—he her lover, and leave so soon! But I am to give it to her for him."

"But when did you get acquainted with him?"

"I was over there this morning when he came in. I trembled from head to foot when I first saw him, for I thought he surely must be the dead guest. But he is a man, and a very amiable one. I happened to meet him as he came out of your room, and he came in to see me."

She told all this so naturally that her father could doubt no longer. However, he ordered the soldier to watch the stranger's movements next morning, to see whether he had actually left the town. Meantime the burgomaster passed a sleepless night. The coincidence was rather too striking after all—especially, as he learned in the evening that Herr von Hahn had actually paid a visit and some compliments to the pretty milliner, under pretext of a trifling purchase. But when day arrived, came his messenger, who reported, that before he reached the hotel, he had heard that the dead guest had disappeared at night, bag and baggage, and no one knew what had become of him. He had not gone in a carriage nor on horseback, nor by post, nor had he gone out of any of the town gates. The landlord and guard went into the room he had occupied. They found everything in order, as though no one had been there, the beds untouched, every chair in its right place, no trunks, no clothes, not even a scrap of paper—not a trace of them to be seen! On the table there lay, however, the amount of the landlord's bill in hard dollars, which he very wisely refused to touch. "Any one else may have the stuff for me," said mine host, "if I put it up in my trunk, it will be sure to turn to rags." So he magnanimously determined to give it to the poor, and to the poor it was accordingly given. The news of the sudden disappearance ran like wildfire through the town. Herr Bantes and his wife heard it as soon as they got up. The former heard it with surprise, yet with full faith; the latter ventured to suggest some modest doubts, to remove which, her husband proposed sending his book-keeper to ascertain the facts. He returned with a full confirmation of the report in all particulars. The old lady, however, would not be convinced. She was firmly persuaded the thing would be explained one day or other, and determined not to lose sight of reason and common sense. All at once her husband sprang up with such paleness and terror in his face, that she was really alarmed; for he could not speak a word for a long time. At last he said faintly, "Mother, if one thing proves true, others may. Do you think that our daughter is asleep yet? I lay awake a long time, yet I did not hear any noise in her room."

"Why, what can you mean? Surely you don't suppose our daughter is—"

"Ah, but if one thing proves true, others may—the idea is horrible. I have not the courage to look. I fear, I fear her head is—"

"What, turned round on her shoulders?"

"Yes, yes," screamed the anxious father, nor would he be comforted till his wife went to their daughter's room, and reported that she was in a sweet sleep. Then he took courage; the young lady was cheered by her mother's departure, and peace and happiness revisited the family.

CONCLUSION.

That very evening they were made still happier, for a carriage was heard to roll through the street, and stop before the house. Frederica was the first to hear it, and to cry "Waldrich!" It was he. All hurried to welcome him home, and Herr Bantes as joyfully as any of them. Of course there were a thousand questions to be asked and answered, till the old man put a stop to the talking and placed the captain on his usual seat by his side. Then the noise began again. "Only think, my dear fellow," cried Herr Bantes, "only think, we have had that devilish spirit, that dead guest and all that, here in town, here in this very house. Yes, and what do you think, he had picked out his three brides too, in one day; there was first Frederica, then Julia, the recorder's daughter, and lastly, Kate, that lives at the milliner's. We were all afraid, like little children, and all that."

The captain laughed loud as he replied, "Yes, I dined with him to day at the post-house: I suppose it is Herr von Hahn you mean?" The old man grinned, as if vexed. "Herr von Hahn is neither here nor there; no matter who he was, he was the dead guest over again, and he shall never have my daughter, even if he should turn out to be the banker's son, and all that. If he was, so much the worse for him, for he looked exactly like the hero of your story."

"Ah!" replied the captain, "the fault is not his. On that evening when I told the story, and had to describe the appearance of the dead guest, I could not in my hurry think of any other figure to sketch him after than that of Herr von Hahn. That gentleman was especially odious to me at that time, and therefore occurred to me most naturally when I was ordered to Herbesheim with my company. When we were a few miles from the capital, I stopped to dine at a tavern, the King of Portugal, I think. Among the guests at the table d'hôte, I particularly noticed Herr von Hahn's long body, which towered a whole head above all other mortals, and also his black hair, dead pale face and black dress. I learned that he was the son of the famous banker of that name. He was altogether indifferent to me at the time, but I never forgot his figure, and still less at a time when he had ceased to be indifferent to me, because—will you allow me to say so?—he was suing for your daughter's hand."

"Thunder and lightning!" roared Herr Bantes, "so it was all the fancy of a rival, and nothing more! To think that that never entered any of our heads, not even the wise old burgomaster's! We old folks are always old fools, after all. But, captain, you have made a good deal of mischief. The young banker must be terribly angry, and call me an old woman, and all that."

"Oh, by no means!" was the answer, "on the contrary, he is very well satisfied with the turn things have taken. He sends his most friendly regards to all your family. When we first met at table to-day, we were tolerably distant. He was silent and reserved, although he did not know me; and I, because I did know him, and supposed he was coming here a wooing. In exchanging some few words of civility with him, he happened to mention that he was going home from Herbesheim, and I felt a natural curiosity to learn more. I could not help saying, that I was well acquainted in that place, and commanded the garriçon there. 'Aha!' cried he at once, 'then you are my fortunate rival, to whom I am really very much indebted for his good fortune.' So we made acquaintance, and frankness was the order of the day at once. He told me, to my great surprise I confess, that Frederick had said we were already engaged, and begged him not to make us both unhappy, and that he kissed her hand, and told her that he had come a wooing in obedience to his father's wishes, but in the hope of not succeeding, because he was secretly in love with the daughter of a professor in the capital, who unfortunately possessed little wealth except that of her mind, which union the old banker looked on with aversion. He added that the old man had commanded him to give up all thoughts of his portionless mistress, but that the young one had sworn to be true to her till death, and to marry her at the first opportunity."

"How!" cried the old man, "did you hear all this from him, daughter? Why, you have been making a fool of me! Why did you not tell me this?"

"Think a moment, dear father, and do not find fault with your daughter," was Frederick's answer. "Don't you remember, when I began to praise Herr von Hahn, and was going to tell you what he had said, how angry you got, and bid me hold my tongue, and promised to find me another lover in his place, if I would obey you implicitly?"

"Ah, there is nothing easier than obeying implicitly, when we have anything to gain by it!"

"And don't you remember you were going to put mamma and me in the cellar?"

"Hush, hush, about that! So, captain, your friend was not angry at us, it seems, but didn't he think we had all gone crazy together?"

"Something of the kind, certainly. He thought the behaviour of the people very strange at first, but when the recorder explained the old legend to him, and informed him that people did him the unmerited honour of taking him for a defunct cavalier of the seventeenth century, he was amused at the idea, and took a pleasure in increasing the alarm he had so innocently occasioned. I was honest enough to confess my share in the matter as soon as we could speak for laughing. It was not unnatural that his figure should have fitted before my imagination while I was telling the story, but I should as soon have dreamed of the sky's falling, as of any such results from it. Herr von Hahn laughed as heartily as I did, and told me the tricks he had played to keep up the illusion. He paid a visit to the affianced bride of a soldier of the police, and to frighten his landlord, told her he should start in the morning, and then had his baggage taken away at night by his servant, and walked by moonlight to the next post-house. In a word, no two mortals ever echoed 'the unextinguishable laughter that shook Olympus' more loudly than we did. We took leave of each other over a bottle of champagne, the best friends in the world, at a much later hour than we expected when we set down to dinner."

Father Bantes smiled at the story from time to time, but uneasily. Pleasure and vexation contended for the mastery in him, and it was some time before he spoke. At last he began, "See there, children, what a host of follies superstition brings in its train. Even I, old philosopher as I am, put on my fool's cap with the rest. I ought to be ashamed of myself, but begin to think it silly for any one to be ashamed of his poor human nature, and all that. But let us proceed to business. Do you know, captain, that I have disposed of you. I have made you over to Frederick there, to bribe her to rid me of the dead guest. Don't be offended at me for taking such a liberty with you in your absence; I thought myself justified, as your former guardian. There, Frederick, take him, and be happy together!"

Both fell upon his neck.

"Stop!" cried he, "Waldrich, off with the uniform!"

"Off it shall come!" replied the captain, trembling with joyful emotion.

"And resign your commission, for Frederick lives with us here, and I did not give her to you, but you to her."

"I will resign it to-morrow!"

"Children!" said the old man, looking round him delightedly, "your joy makes me thirsty. Mother, bring in the punch!"

AN OLD SWAN.—In one of the London dailies is a long obituary notice of a famous swan, at the great age of seventy years. The animal was bred at Buckingham-palace, but had lately been a tenant of the canal enclosed in St. James's-park.

SELECT DRAMATIC SCENES.

THE STOLEN KISS.

BY MISS MARY R. MITFORD.

SCENE.—the interior of a Scottish cottage in a summer afternoon.
AGNES—sitting with a start from a deep slumber—a spinning-wheel before her.

So! Mother, didst thou call? Did I not hear
A voice, a step! Sure I have slept! Methought
That Lewis, too, was here. 'Tis but a dream,
One of those visions which possess the dream
Like firm realities. A senseless vision!
This sultry summer air, and westerling sun
Hotter than noontide, which lulls into rest
Light whirling insects and gay chirping birds,
Joined to the drowsy motion of the wheel,
Monotonous instrument of quiet toil,
Rocked me to slumber like a cradled babe.
Now to my work again!—mother will chide
To find the flax unspun. Now to my work!

[In seating herself again at her wheel, she glances on the flower-pot on the window.]

Ah, me! some one hath plucked from out the jar
My roses, my twin roses! the moss bud
Intensely fragrant, and that whitest rose
And purest which unfolds its spotless breast
Like the queen lily to the sun. What foot
Hath stolen to this lone chamber! What bold hand Hath stretched across me as I slept! So only
The roses could be won. Not my dear mother,
She had aroused the sleeper. Charles, perchance,
My unfriest brother!—Nay, that merry boy
Had ne'er restrained the loud and frequent gush
Of laughter, which springs up from his light heart
Like mists from the lake through. Young Lewis!—No!
Oh, no! Not Lewis! How could he win here
Despite the guardian eye of my so fond Yet watchful mother! No. And wherefore come
When I have been as strange as though—No! no!
Not Lewis! Yet last night he somewhat spake
Of a rich kinsman, whose wealth he was
And how he bid him woo, and wished him wed;
And then—but I was coy, was very coy—
And yet methought even now,—but 'twas a dream:
A silly dream! A false, bewildering dream!
I'll to my sober toil, and chase these visions.

[She sits to the wheel, and sings.]

Turn, busy wheel; turn, busy wheel,
And pile upon the circling reel
A thread as fine and free
As that the meek artful weaves
In autumn mornings, 'midst the leaves
Of yon old apple tree,
The moss-grown apple tree,
The dewy, filmy apple tree.
Turn, busy wheel; turn, swiftly round
And blend with my wild song thy sound
Of peaceful industry;
Such sound as loads the summer breeze,
When gathering the sweet store, the bees
Crowd yon broad linden tree,
The bright, green linden tree,
The flowery, shadowy linden tree.

AGNES.—Ha! art thou there! My mother
Will hear the merry tread, the clink of arms,
And deem that I—

LEWIS.—Sweet Agnes—

AGNES.—Hush! she'll know

That voice of thine. Speak softly, man,—or rather Depart at once. If she should hear—

LEWIS.—What then?

AGNES.—She'll chide.

LEWIS.—And wherefore, sweet? I come

On no ill errand. What should make her wrath!
AGNES.—I know not; but depart. Thou knowest well
Young gallants come not hither. Wend thy way,
Good Lewis! Force me not, in mine own house,
To seem unwill. Go! She hath full oft Forbidden and she is right. Away! Thou know'st
That she will chide.

LEWIS.—Not now. I've seen her, Agnes;
My wealthy kinsman, he hath seen her too;
And she consents; and thou art mine.

AGNES.—Indeed!

Thou art confident, methinks. How know'st thou, sir,
That I am thine? Say that my mother yield
Her scruples to thy kinsman's gold—what pledge
Have I e'er given?

LEWIS.—Thou hast been coy, Agnes,
Than the high dames of old romance, who held
Their hearts a ten year's siege; hast shrunk away
Even from my touch; hast shunned my speech, hast turned
With sweet confusion from my ardent gaze;
Yet, all unwittingly of thee, I hold
A sacred pledge. See here!

[Producing two roses from his bosom.]

AGNES.—My roses! Well!

LEWIS.—The very flowers of love!

AGNES.—The flowers of love!

Why thou thyself art wild and fanciful

As ever Paladin or dame of old

To deem that a free maiden may be won

Even in the stealing of a flower. Fie! fie!

I deemed thee wiser.

LEWIS.—Listen, maiden mine!

Turn not away, but listen. Dost remember

Last Lammas tide, when midst a merry group

At Donald Graham's the forfeit game went round,

And thou hadst pledged thy silver brooch; the bright

And massive silver brooch, that Isabel,
Who cried the forfeit then, the frank and blunt
Dame Isabel, proclaimed that whose owned
The trinket in her hand should bid a kiss
From James Kinloch! Dost remember!

AGNES.—Yes—

No—yes—I dimly do remember me

Of what thou tell'st

LEWIS.—Well, and the forfeit drawn

Was thine, the silver brooch. Dost thou remember?

AGNES.—I do.

LEWIS.—And thou didst straightway rise,

And with the frown of outraged modesty

Bending thy virgin brow, a frown that lent

New nobleness to beauty, bade her keep

The bauble, and walketh forth. Dost remember?

Isabel laughed, and Kinloch loudly urged

His precious privilege; till thou didst pause,

Waving them from thee with such awful charm,

Yet gentle, as in that old masque divine

The lady who defied his rascal crew

And vanquished Comus. Then—forget not this,

Beseech thee, sweetest!—thou didst strongly vow

Who touched thy lip, might claim thy hand (so sacred Seemed that mute pledge to thy young purity.)

And calmly turned thee homeward, unperceived

By aught save fond respect. Hast thou forgotten?

AGNES.—No. But the roses?

LEWIS.—Well! to-day I came

With my kind kinsman to thy house. My Agnes,

Thou hast been coy—but, so far, only coy

As maids may seem who love; I found a hope

Even in thy shyness, sweet! and when thy mother

To our frank proffer, yielded frank consent,

I flew to seek thee.

AGNES.—Well!

LEWIS.—And found thee here

Asleep; thy fair head, all for thee declined

Toward one fair shoulder; thy small pretty feet

Resting upon the silent wheel; the thread

Listlessly hanging from thy listless hands;

And over all such softness, such repose,

Such innocence, such beauty! In the casement

A jar of freshest flowers mixed their sweet breath

With one far sweeter,—and I leant behind thee,

And stole—

AGNES.—The roses!

LEWIS.—Ay, but not alone

The roses. Tush! that was an after thought,—

A token. From those rosy lips I stole

A balmy—dost thou doubt me, Agnes? Say,

Shall I repeat the theft, and show thee—

AGNES.—No!

No, no!

LEWIS.—Well, then, thou dost confess the pledge

Is won!

AGNES.—Ay, ay.

LEWIS.—And thou dost not repent thee

Of that same forfeit play! Thou dost not wish

The words unsaid!

AGNES.—No.

LEWIS.—Nor these tokens flowers

Unstolen!

AGNES.—No, no.

LEWIS.—Now blessings on thee, love!

My frank and noble love! And triple blessings

On that sweet theft of mine!

LEGENDS OF THE RHINE.

THE MILLER'S MAID.

THERE is a lonely mill close beside the little hamlet of Uldorf, near the Rhine shore, between the villages of Hersel and Uisel, on the left bank below Bonn. This mill is said to have been the scene of the following story.

It was on a Sunday morning, "ages long ago," that the miller of this mill, and his whole family, went forth to hear the holy mass at the nearest church, in the village of Hersel. The mill, which was also his residence, was left in charge of a servant-girl named Hannechen, or Jenny, a stout-hearted lass, who had long lived with him in that capacity. An infant child, of an age unfit for church, was left in her charge likewise.

The girl was busily employed in preparing dinner for the return of her master and his family, when he should enter all of a sudden but an old sweetheart of hers, named Heinrich Bötteler. He was an idle, graceless fellow, whom the miller had forbidden his house, but whom Jenny, with the amiable perversity peculiar to her sex, only liked, perhaps, all the better because others gave him no countenance. She was glad to see him, and she told him so too; and although in the midst of her work, she not only got him something to eat at once, but also found time to sit down with him and have a gossip, while he despatched the food she set before him. As he ate, however, he let fall his knife.

"Pick that up, my lass," said he, in a joking way, to the good-natured girl.

"Nay, Heinrich," she replied, "your back should be more supple than mine, for you have less work to make it stiff. I labour all day long, and you do nothing. But, never mind! 'twould go hard with me as I refused to do more than that for you, had though you be."

This was spoken half sportively, and half in good earnest; for, kind-hearted as the girl was, and much as she liked the scapegrace, she was too honest and industrious herself to encourage and approve of idleness, and a suspicious course of life in any one else, however dear to her. She stooped down, accordingly, to pick up the knife. As she was in the act of rising, however, the treacherous villain drew a dagger from under his coat, and caught her by the nape of the neck, gripping her throat firmly with his fingers to prevent her screaming the while.

"Now, lass," he said, swearing out a bad oath at the same time, "where is your master's money! I'll have that or your life; so take your choice."

The terrified girl would fain have parleyed with the ruffian, but he would hear nothing she could say.

"Master's money or your life, lass!" was all the answer he vouchsafed to her entreaties and adjurations. "Choose at once," was the only alternative he offered her: "the grave or the gold." She saw that there was no hope of mercy at his hands; and, as she saw it, her native resolution awoke in her bosom. Like the generally of her gentle sex, she was timid at trifles; a scratch was a subject of fear to her; a drop of blood caused her to faint; an unwanted sound filled her soul with fear in the night. But when her energies were aroused by any adequate cause, she proved, as her sex have ever done, that in courage, in endurance, in presence of mind, and in resources of emergency, she far surpassed the bravest and coolest men.

"Well, well, Heinrich!" she said, resignedly, "what is to be, must be. But if you take the money, I shall even go along with you. This will be no home for me any more. But ease your gripe of my neck a little—don't squeeze so hard; I can't move, you hug me so tight; and if I can't strain, you cannot get the money—that's clear, you know. Besides, time presses; and if it be done at all, it must be done quickly, as the family will shortly be back from Hersel."

The ruffian relaxed his gripe, and finally let go his hold. Her reasons were all cogent with his cupidity.

"Come," she said—"quick, quick!—no delay: the money is in master's bedroom."

She tripped up stairs, gaily as a lark; he followed closely at her heels. She led the way into her master's bedroom, and pointed out the coffer in which his money was secured.

"Here," she said, reaching him an axe which lay in a corner of the room, "this will wrench it open at once: and while you are trying it out, I shall just step up stairs to my own apartment, and get a few things ready for our flight, as well as my own little savings for the last five years."

The ruffian was thrown off his guard by her openness and apparent anxiety to accompany him. Like all egotists, he deceived himself, when self-deceit was most certain to be his destruction.

"Go, lass," was all he said; "but be not long. This job will be done in a twinkling."

She disappeared at the words. He immediately broke open the chest, and was soon engaged in rummaging its contents. As he was thus employed, however, absorbed in the contemplation of his prey, and eagerly occupied in securing it on his person, the door opened, and a girl stole down the stairs on tiptoe. Creeping softly along the passages, she speedily gained the door of the chamber unseen by him, and likewise unobserved. It was but the work of a moment for her to turn the key in the wards and lock him in. This done, she rushed forth to the outer door of the mill, and gave the alarm.

"Fly, fly!" she shrieked to the child, her master's little boy, an infant five years old, the only being within sight or sound of her. "Fly, fly to thy father! fly on your life! Tell him we shall all be murdered, or he baste not back. Fly, fly!"

The child, who was at play before the door, at once obeyed the energetic command of the brave girl, and sped as fast as his tiny legs could carry him on the road by which he knew his parents would return from church. Hanchen cheered him onward, and inspired his little heart as he ran.

"Bless thee, boy—bless thee!" she exclaimed, in the gladness of her heart; "an master arrives in time, I will offer up a taper on the altar of our blessed lady of Kreutzberg, by Bonn."

She sat down on the stone bench by the mill-door to ease her over-excited spirit; and she wept, as she sat, at the thought of her happy deliverance.

"Thank God!" she ejaculated, "thank God for this escape! Oh, the devil villain!—and I so fond of him, too!"

A shrill whistle, from the grated window of the chamber in which she had shut up the ruffian Heinrich, caught her ear, and made her start at once to her feet.

"Diether! Diether!" she heard him shout, "catch the child, and come hither! I am fast. Come hither! Bring the boy here, and kill the girl!"

She glanced hastily up at the casement from which the imprisoned villain's shrill beckoned to come one in the distance, and then, then for the thousandth time, after her infant emissary. The little messenger held on his way unharmed, however; and she thought to herself that the alarm was a false one, raised to excite her fear, and overcome her resolution. Just, however, as the child reached a hollow spot in the next field—the channel of a natural drain, then dry with the heats of summer—she saw several ruffians start up from the bushes, and, catching him in his arms, hasten towards the mill, in accordance with the directions of his accomplice.

In a moment she perceived her danger, and in a moment more she formed her future plan of proceeding. Retreating into the mill, she double-locked and bolted the door—the only apparent entrance to the edifice, every other means of obvious access to the interior being barred by means of strong iron-gratings fixed against all the windows; and then took her post at an upper casement, determined to await patiently either her master's return, and her consequent deliverance from that dangerous position, or her own death, if it were inevitable.

"Navee," said she to herself, "never shall I leave my master's house a prey to such villains, or permit his property to be carried off before my eyes by them, while I have life and strength to defend it."

She had barely time to secure herself within, when the ruffian from without, holding the hapless child in one hand, and a long sharp knife in the other, assailed the door with kicks, and curses and imprecations of the most dreadful character.

"Confound thee," he cried, applying the foulest epithets of which the free-speaking Teutonic languages are so copious; "open the door, or I'll break it in on ye."

"If you can you may," was all the noble girl replied. "God is greater than you, and in him I put my trust."

"Out the brat's throat!" roared the imprisoned ruffian above; "that will bring her reason."

Stout-hearted as poor Hanchen was, she quailed at this cruel suggestion. For a moment her resolution wavered; but it was only for a moment. She saw that her own death was certain if she admitted the assailant, and she knew that her master would be robbed. She had no time to lose, even the life of the infant would be spared by her compliance. It was to risk all against nothing. Like a discreet girl, she consequently held fast in her resolve to abide as she was while life remained, or until assistance should reach her.

"An ye open not the door," shouted the villain from without, accompanying his words with the vilest abuse, and the fiercest imprecations, "I'll hack this whelp's limbs to pieces with my knife, and then burn the mill over your head. 'Twill be a merry blaze, I trow."

"I put my trust in God," replied the dauntless girl; "never shall ye set your foot within these walls whilst I have life to prevent ye."

The ruffian laid the infant for a moment on the sward as he sought for combustibles wherewith to execute his latter threat. In this search he espied, perhaps, the only possible clandestine entrance to the building. It was a large aperture in the wall, communicating with the great wheel and the outer machinery of the mill, and was a point entirely unguarded, for the reason that the stiale occupants had never supposed it feasible for any one to seek admission through such a dangerous inlet. Elated with his discovery, the ruffian returned to the infant, and, tying the hands and feet of the child, threw it on the ground even as a butcher will fling a lamb destined for the slaughter, to await his time for slaying. He then stole back to the aperture, by which he hoped to effect an entrance. All this was unseen by the dauntless girl within.

In the meanwhile her mind was busied with a thousand cogitations. She clearly perceived that no means would be left untried to effect an entrance, and she knew that on the exclusion of her foe depended her own existence. A thought struck her.

"It is Sunday," said she to herself; "the mill never works on the Sabbath; suppose I set the mill a-going now! It can be seen afar off, and haply my master, or some of his neighbors, wondering at the sight, may haste hither to know the cause. A lucky thought," she exclaimed; "'tis God sent it to me!"

No sooner said than done. Being all her life accustomed to mill gear, it was but the work of a moment for her to set the machinery in motion. A brisk breeze which sprang up, as it were by the special interposition of Providence, at once set the sails flying. The arms of the huge engine whirled round with fearful rapidity; the great wheel slowly revolved on its axle; the smaller gear turned, and creaked, and groaned, according as they came into action: the mill was in full operation.

It was in that very instant that the ruffian Diether had succeeded in squeezing himself through the aperture in the wall, and getting safely lodged in the interior of the great drum-wheel. His dismay, however, was indescribable when he began to be whirled about with its rotation, and found that all his efforts to put a stop to the powerful machinery which set it in motion, or to extricate himself from his perilous situation, were fruitless. His eyes were most appalling; his shrieks were truly fearful; his curses and imprecations were horrible to hear. Hanchen hastened to the spot, and saw him caught, like a reptile as he was, in his own trap. It need not be added, that she did not liberate him. She knew that he would be more frightened than hurt, if he kept within his rotary prison; and she knew also, that unless he attempted to escape, there was no danger of his falling out of it, even though he were insensible and inanimate all the while. In the meantime, the wheel went round and round with its steady unceasing motion; and round and round went the ruffian along with it, steadily and unceasingly too. In vain did he promise the stout-hearted girl to work her no harm; in vain did he implore her to pity on his helpless condition; in vain did he pray to all the powers of heaven, and adjure all the powers of hell to his aid. She would not hear nor heed him; and, unheeded and unheeded of them likewise, muttering curses, he was whirled round and round in the unwhirling wheel, until, at last, feeling and perception failed him, and he saw and heard no more. He fell, senseless, on the bottom of the engine, but even there his inanimate body continued to be whirled round, and round, and round, as before; the brave girl not daring to stop to appearances in connexion with such a villain, and being, therefore, afraid to suspend the working of the machinery, or stop the mill-gear and tackle from running at their fullest speed.

A loud knocking at the door was shortly after heard, and she hastened thither. It was her master and his family, accompanied by several of their neighbors. The unaccustomed appearance of the mill-sails in full swing on the Sunday, had, as she anticipated, attracted their attention, and they had hastened home from church for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of the phenomenon. The father bore his little boy in his arms; he had cut the cords wherewith the child was tied, but he was unable to obtain an account of the extraordinary circumstances that had occurred from the frightened innocent.

Hanchen, in a few words, told all; and then the spirit which had sustained her so long and so well while the emergency lasted, forsook her at once as it passed away. She fell senseless into the arms of the miller's eldest son, and was with difficulty recovered.

The machinery of the mill was at once stopped, and the inanimate ruffian dragged forth from the great wheel. The other ruffian was brought down from his prison. Both were then bound, and sent off to Bonn under a strong escort; and, in due course, came under the hands of the town executioner.

It was not long till Hanchen became a bride. The bridegroom was the miller's son, who had loved her long and well, but with a passion previously unrequited. They lived thenceforward happily together for many years, and died at a good old age, surrounded by a flourishing family. To the latest hour of her life, this brave-hearted woman would shudder as she told the tale of her danger, and her deliverance.

STIMULANTS OF GREAT MEN.—It is interesting to notice the different articles which have been taken by eminent men, as stimulants to the mental faculties. It is interesting, as showing how diametrically on opposite means may produce the same effect in various systems; and it is interesting as showing how much the mind sympathizes with the body. Haller drank plentifully of cold water when he wished for great activity of the brain; Fox, for the same purpose, used brandy. The stimulant of Newton and Hobbes were the fumes of tobacco; those of Pope and Fontenelle, strong coffee. Dr. Johnson, at one period of his life, was a worse wine drinker; but in the latter part of it, found strong tea a good substitute. Don Juan is said to have been written under the influence of gin and water, and it is reported that a certain legal lord, of great learning and talent, pines himself hard with port when he wishes to shine.

Paris tells us, that when Mr. Dunlap wished to make an extraordinary display of eloquence, he always put a blister on his chest a few hours before he was to speak, in order that it might irritate the brain by sympathy during his speech.

The following beautiful passage is taken from Euripides:

"While o'er the battlements Capeneus sprang,
Jove struck him with his thunder, and the earth
Resounded with the crack; meanwhile making
Soot all his quiver; from off his head he leapt
His limbs were far sander burnt, his hair
Flew to Olympus, to the ground his blood,
His hands and feet whirled like Ixion's wheel,
And to the earth his flaming body fell."

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE SABBATH MORN.—BY CHARLES SWAIN.

Hour of the Sabbath—soul-awakening morn,
Thou mirror of the mystery above!
Oh, sainted day! on prophet pinions borne,
How waits the heart thy solemn rest to prove;
How longs the soul with Deity to move,
And drink thy deathless waters!—and to feel
Thy beauty—and thy wisdom—and thy love—
Sublimely o'er the soaring spirit steal,
Till ope the heavenly gates Jehovah to reveal!—

Whist, mounting and expanding the Mind's wings
Thus like a seraph's reach eternal day,
Futurity its starry mantle flings
And shrinks the past an atom in its ray!
So mighty—so magnificent—the way
Which leads to God!—so endless—so sublime!
The skies grow dark, vast grandeur falls away
Before the wordless glory of that clime
Which feeds with light the suns and thousand worlds of Time!

Light of the Sabbath—soul-awakening morn!
Take me, Religion, on thy holy quest!
Lead me 'mid desert hills, the wild and lone,
To mark the lowly shepherd hail his guest
And bless the voice which ever leaves him blest!
Makes his rude cot an altar to God's praise!
Where 'neath a mother's pious bosom press,
His child, with little hands, and upward gaze,
Pleads for its parents' health, and happy length of days!

Sun of the Sabbath—lead me to the vale
Whose verdant arms enfold you village fair!
Afar from towns where passions stern prevail,
Afar from commerce and her sons of care—
Guide me where maidens young for church prepare
In cottage grace—and garments Sunday-white!
With reverent step, and mild submissive air,
Or let me hear their tuneful lips unite
To hail with humble hearts the Sabbath's sacred light!

Oh, sight the loveliest human eyes e'er found!
To view two sisters o'er the same page bend,
Their love-ye arms each other's waist around—
Their soft, bright hair in careless ringlets blend—
Their mingling brows like incense sweetly send Over God's book—His angel book of Truth!
Their hearts, minds, feelings, all emotions lend
A vision of that paradise of youth
Ere Adam's beauteous form dropped 'neath the serpent's tooth!

Morning of worship!—with thy beams arise
Devotions sanctified by memories dear!
With thee the hymns of nations wake the skies!
The broken prayer—the sinner's contrite tear!
Hail, blessed morn, that brings the day's end near!
Bids kindred meet the hallowed page around!
Pours comfort in the friendless widow's ear,
For who the wild birds feed whilst winter frowns,
Will succour her poor babes when she sleeps in the ground!

Some hand, she prays, an INFANT SCHOOL may raise!
And learn—oh, task divine!—their lips to bless!
Teach him that loves the Book of Christ conveys,
For their consolation in distress!
And He—the father of the fatherless—
The sheltering wing of the poor orphan dove—
God,—more than words may show—or thought express,—
Shall aid them with his own almighty love!
For angels plead for these—the motherless!—above!
Hail Sabbath hour—hail comfort and guide!
Hour when the wanders home a blessing sends;
Hour when the seaman o'er the surges weils,
To every kindred roof his heart extends!
Hour when to all that mourn thy peace descends!
When e'en the captive's bonds less sternly lower—
Hour when the Cross of Christ all life defends—
Hour of Salvation!—God's redeeming love!
Eternity is thine!—and heaven-exalting power!

STREAM OF SIN.—As in religion, so in the course and practice of men's lives, the stream of sin runs from one age to another, and every age makes it greater, adding somewhat to what it receives, as rivers grow in their course by the accession of brooks that fall into them; and every man when he is born, falls like a drop into this main stream of corruption, and so is carried down it, and by the reason of its strength, and his own nature, he accordingly dissolves into, and runs along with it.

APHORISM. The appearance of vice is always more easily assumed by the virtuous than the appearance of virtue by the vicious; as it is evidently much easier to become bad when we are good than good when we are bad. Understanding, sensibility, talents, genius, virtue, or religion, may with much greater facility be lost than acquired. The best may descend as low as they please, but the worst cannot ascend to the height they might wish.

THE CELEBRATED JAILER OF BONAPARTE.—The remains of Sir Hudson Lowe, whose coercive treatment of the late emperor of the French excited such a sensation throughout Europe, and for which he was publicly horsewhipped, were recently landed from a foreign steamer at London-bygone wharf, in a puncheon of spirits, from which they were taken and placed in a shell.

VIRTUE AND VICE.—The destinies of a nation depend less on the greatness of the few than the virtues or vices of the many. Eminent individuals cast, further the features of her glory or shame; but the realities of her wealth or her deep in the mass. The curling tops of the lofty waves are the crest of the ocean, but from its depths flows the overpowering strength of its tides.

REVERTED TALENTS.—Education, says Dr. Channing, is now chiefly a stimulus to learning, and thus men acquire power without the principles which alone make it a good. Talent is worshipped; but if divorced from rectitude, it will prove more of a demon than a god.

EXPLOREMENT OF TIME.—The Chancellor Agassiz wrote a work on jurisprudence, in five volumes, in the quarter of an hour each day his wife kept him waiting for dinner.

For the New York Mirror.

LINES TO A LOST FRIEND.

SOLEMN and slow the summer now is leaving
The fair, bright earth, where she has long been seen,
And Winter in you fleecy clouds is weaving
His frosty web to shroud her mantle green;
Coldly the winds are through the forest flying,
Stripping the branches as they humbly bend,
And autumn comes in "russet mantle" sighing,
But wherefore com'st thou not, my gentle friend?
From out thy breast a stream of love is gushing,
Which fain would meet and bubble o'er thine heart;
Stronger it grows, like mountain cat'ract rushing,
To think that we shall meet no more to part!
Come thou, for whom this weary heart is longing,
And gladden once again this lonely breast:
Come like the spring—like summer birds when thronging,
Each to his native home—his vacant nest.
Alas! thou comest not to him who weeping,
Waiteth with anxious ear to hear thy tread;
Despair, even as a poison'd vine is creeping
About my heart, to tell me thou art dead!
Say, do the soft and mellow sunbeams shining
From distant skies, rest on thy lowly grave?
Or is the green and shining sea-weed twining
About thy form, in ocean's hiding wave!
I may not know if thou the loved and cherish'd
Art still on earth to bless once more my sight,
Or whether thou by death's chill hand hast perish'd,
And closed thine eyes in thine unbreathing night;
But ah! there is another sphere where sorrow
Comes not with heart-wringing tears the eye to wet;
Where joy's enlivening presence knows no morrow,
Where hope still whispers, I shall see thee yet! R. S. C.

METROPOLITAN SKETCHES.

BY JAMES ALDRICH.

—“The Roman and the Lombard line—
One coloured best and one did best design.
Raphael's, like Homer's, was the nobler part;
But Titian's painting looked like Virgil's art.”—Dryden.

ONK day, subsequent to the declaration of independence, all lovers of the palette and pencil—all amateurs in lights and shades—in perspective and foreshortening, who were then resident in New-York, were startled by reading in the newspapers, and on the walls and pumps, that on the following evening there would be submitted to public sale by Moses Levy, (a distinguished cognoscenti), a rare and invaluable collection of oil paintings by the old masters. Flattering ourselves with the belief that we had some taste for paintings, and desirous also, perhaps, of awakening this belief in others, we went to Mr. Levy's auction-room at an early hour, and secured an elevated and conspicuous situation. Mr. Levy, at the moment of our arriving, was busily engaged in rubbing the pictures with a wetted sponge, whilst another person was writing something upon the backs of them. Before examining a picture, we procured a catalogue, and read, with a reverential feeling, the names of Raphael, Michael Angelo, Claude, Titian, Domimichino, etc., the authors of the paintings then about to be offered under the hammer. Having perused the catalogue, we awoke from a pleasing reverie produced by those great names, and looked at the pictures. “Have we been dreaming?” or has fancy so highly coloured the ideal pictures as to make the real appear mean and insignificant? were the questions we propounded to ourselves; for we saw before us nothing but the rudest and roughest specimens of the art, contemptible in everything but design; in short, we saw a collection of miserable copies, of copies of good pictures, the primary efforts, doubtless, of some low Dutch school, which, after lumbering up some academy in Antwerp for many years, had, in all probability, been bought on speculation by some Yankee trader who might then have been present to prompt the eloquent auctioneer, and laugh in his sleeve at the critical taste of the company.

The room was now well filled, and Mr. Levy mounted upon a chair, said, “Gentlemen, the paintings we offer you to-night is a very fine collection, the finest ever seen on this hemisphere or South America. They belonged to an English nobleman who lost all his property by the vice of gambling. I shall sell them in the order in which they appear on the catalogue—terms is cash on delivery to all, and no uncurrent money taken. Gentlemen will oblige me very much by not smoking, as it clouds the atmosphere and diminishes the effect of the light on the painting. Number one is the first—please look at your catalogues, gentlemen, as I sell. Number one is a landscape by Salvator Rosa, and a very fine one it is; how much is bid? Gentlemen, don't nobody want a Salvatore! Who starts it at something handsome?”

“Five shillings,” said a little man in green spectacles
“Thank you, sir,” said Mr. Levy: “five shillings, five shillings, five shillings; and no more bid! five shillings, once, twice, three times! It's yours, sir; name, if you please!”

“Mr. Varnish,” cried the purchaser.
“Mr. Varnish takes number one, at five shillings,” said Mr. Levy to the clerk; then, turning to the purchaser he added, “and a very cheap picture it is, too, let me tell you, Mr. Varnish.”

“Make a capital fire-board for you, Mr. Varnish,” said a wag in the back part of the room; “if you have not introduced grates into your house.”

“Silence!” cried Mr. Levy; “them that comes here to talk had better go, and make room for the lovers of the divine art. Number two—gentlemen, look at your catalogues—is a virgin and child, by Carlo Dolce; how much is bid for the virgin and child?—they are a gem, and no doubt good likenesses; who says twenty dollars to start it?”

“One dollar,” cried a goggle-eyed man, with an imitation cameo breast-pin, as large as an ancient warrior's shield, hanging in his shirt-bosom.

“Shame, gentlemen!” said Mr. Levy, “if my friend, Mr. Paff, sees here, you would not get that picture for an hundred dollars. One dollar, one dollar, going—”

“An eighth,” said some one in the crowd.
“I don't take eighths, you must advance,” said Mr. Levy. “One dollar, one dollar—oh, gentlemen, it's a shame to let such a picture go for such a price; why the virgin is worth more than that, to say nothing about the child!—one dollar—going—once, twice, gone! Who's the happy man?”

“Smith,” cried the purchaser.
“Mr. Smith, your bill will be ready at nine o'clock in the morning,” said Mr. Levy. “The next is number three; hold that up to the light, Patrick; a venus, gentlemen, by Canova; aint it, Patrick? look on the back.”

“Michael Angell,” said Patrick.
“Ah! gentlemen, by Angell—a very excellent painter. How much for the venus? You'll bid on this, Mr. Benedict; she's a beauty. How much is bid? Gentlemen, the genuineness of these pictures is indisputable; for the names of the masters is written on the backs of all of them. How much is bid for the venus? I can't dwell.”

“Ten dollars.”
“Thank you, sir; ten dollars, ten dollars—and by a man of taste, too.”

“Fifteen.”
“Fifteen, fifteen dollars—going—once, twice, gone! It's yours, Mr. Speer. (To the clerk)—Put down the venus to Mr. Crayon Speer, fifteen dollars; cheap as blackberries.”

Courteous reader, we could go on with a true description of the sale of every one of those rare pictures, as strongly impressed in our memory with the recollections of that evening's auction; but, out of respect to thy patience, we forbear. We observed that, with one exception, the paintings sold as those by Michael Angelo brought higher prices than any others. We were unable to account for this, as it is well known that the oil-pictures by that great master, or rather those attributed to him, are mean and pitiful.

The Fates at Florence, and the Witches in Cardinal Fieschi's collection at Rome, are not worthy of the company they keep. Expressing our surprise of the high estimation in which he seemed to be held by Mr. Levy's customers, a friend attributed the partiality shown to M. Angelo to a mistake on the part of the audience, in supposing the pictures to have been painted by Mike Angell, an artist who, at the time of which we write, executed the transparencies exhibited, during elections, at Tammany-hall.

“Fifteen, fifteen dollars—going—once, twice, gone! It's yours, Mr. Speer. (To the clerk)—Put down the venus to Mr. Crayon Speer, fifteen dollars; cheap as blackberries.”

Courteous reader, we could go on with a true description of the sale of every one of those rare pictures, as strongly impressed in our memory with the recollections of that evening's auction; but, out of respect to thy patience, we forbear. We observed that, with one exception, the paintings sold as those by Michael Angelo brought higher prices than any others. We were unable to account for this, as it is well known that the oil-pictures by that great master, or rather those attributed to him, are mean and pitiful.

The Fates at Florence, and the Witches in Cardinal Fieschi's collection at Rome, are not worthy of the company they keep. Expressing our surprise of the high estimation in which he seemed to be held by Mr. Levy's customers, a friend attributed the partiality shown to M. Angelo to a mistake on the part of the audience, in supposing the pictures to have been painted by Mike Angell, an artist who, at the time of which we write, executed the transparencies exhibited, during elections, at Tammany-hall.

“Fifteen, fifteen dollars—going—once, twice, gone! It's yours, Mr. Speer. (To the clerk)—Put down the venus to Mr. Crayon Speer, fifteen dollars; cheap as blackberries.”

Courteous reader, we could go on with a true description of the sale of every one of those rare pictures, as strongly impressed in our memory with the recollections of that evening's auction; but, out of respect to thy patience, we forbear. We observed that, with one exception, the paintings sold as those by Michael Angelo brought higher prices than any others. We were unable to account for this, as it is well known that the oil-pictures by that great master, or rather those attributed to him, are mean and pitiful.

The Fates at Florence, and the Witches in Cardinal Fieschi's collection at Rome, are not worthy of the company they keep. Expressing our surprise of the high estimation in which he seemed to be held by Mr. Levy's customers, a friend attributed the partiality shown to M. Angelo to a mistake on the part of the audience, in supposing the pictures to have been painted by Mike Angell, an artist who, at the time of which we write, executed the transparencies exhibited, during elections, at Tammany-hall.

“Fifteen, fifteen dollars—going—once, twice, gone! It's yours, Mr. Speer. (To the clerk)—Put down the venus to Mr. Crayon Speer, fifteen dollars; cheap as blackberries.”

Courteous reader, we could go on with a true description of the sale of every one of those rare pictures, as strongly impressed in our memory with the recollections of that evening's auction; but, out of respect to thy patience, we forbear. We observed that, with one exception, the paintings sold as those by Michael Angelo brought higher prices than any others. We were unable to account for this, as it is well known that the oil-pictures by that great master, or rather those attributed to him, are mean and pitiful.

The Fates at Florence, and the Witches in Cardinal Fieschi's collection at Rome, are not worthy of the company they keep. Expressing our surprise of the high estimation in which he seemed to be held by Mr. Levy's customers, a friend attributed the partiality shown to M. Angelo to a mistake on the part of the audience, in supposing the pictures to have been painted by Mike Angell, an artist who, at the time of which we write, executed the transparencies exhibited, during elections, at Tammany-hall.

“Fifteen, fifteen dollars—going—once, twice, gone! It's yours, Mr. Speer. (To the clerk)—Put down the venus to Mr. Crayon Speer, fifteen dollars; cheap as blackberries.”

Courteous reader, we could go on with a true description of the sale of every one of those rare pictures, as strongly impressed in our memory with the recollections of that evening's auction; but, out of respect to thy patience, we forbear. We observed that, with one exception, the paintings sold as those by Michael Angelo brought higher prices than any others. We were unable to account for this, as it is well known that the oil-pictures by that great master, or rather those attributed to him, are mean and pitiful.

The Fates at Florence, and the Witches in Cardinal Fieschi's collection at Rome, are not worthy of the company they keep. Expressing our surprise of the high estimation in which he seemed to be held by Mr. Levy's customers, a friend attributed the partiality shown to M. Angelo to a mistake on the part of the audience, in supposing the pictures to have been painted by Mike Angell, an artist who, at the time of which we write, executed the transparencies exhibited, during elections, at Tammany-hall.

“Fifteen, fifteen dollars—going—once, twice, gone! It's yours, Mr. Speer. (To the clerk)—Put down the venus to Mr. Crayon Speer, fifteen dollars; cheap as blackberries.”

Courteous reader, we could go on with a true description of the sale of every one of those rare pictures, as strongly impressed in our memory with the recollections of that evening's auction; but, out of respect to thy patience, we forbear. We observed that, with one exception, the paintings sold as those by Michael Angelo brought higher prices than any others. We were unable to account for this, as it is well known that the oil-pictures by that great master, or rather those attributed to him, are mean and pitiful.

The Fates at Florence, and the Witches in Cardinal Fieschi's collection at Rome, are not worthy of the company they keep. Expressing our surprise of the high estimation in which he seemed to be held by Mr. Levy's customers, a friend attributed the partiality shown to M. Angelo to a mistake on the part of the audience, in supposing the pictures to have been painted by Mike Angell, an artist who, at the time of which we write, executed the transparencies exhibited, during elections, at Tammany-hall.

“Fifteen, fifteen dollars—going—once, twice, gone! It's yours, Mr. Speer. (To the clerk)—Put down the venus to Mr. Crayon Speer, fifteen dollars; cheap as blackberries.”

Courteous reader, we could go on with a true description of the sale of every one of those rare pictures, as strongly impressed in our memory with the recollections of that evening's auction; but, out of respect to thy patience, we forbear. We observed that, with one exception, the paintings sold as those by Michael Angelo brought higher prices than any others. We were unable to account for this, as it is well known that the oil-pictures by that great master, or rather those attributed to him, are mean and pitiful.

The Fates at Florence, and the Witches in Cardinal Fieschi's collection at Rome, are not worthy of the company they keep. Expressing our surprise of the high estimation in which he seemed to be held by Mr. Levy's customers, a friend attributed the partiality shown to M. Angelo to a mistake on the part of the audience, in supposing the pictures to have been painted by Mike Angell, an artist who, at the time of which we write, executed the transparencies exhibited, during elections, at Tammany-hall.

“Fifteen, fifteen dollars—going—once, twice, gone! It's yours, Mr. Speer. (To the clerk)—Put down the venus to Mr. Crayon Speer, fifteen dollars; cheap as blackberries.”

Courteous reader, we could go on with a true description of the sale of every one of those rare pictures, as strongly impressed in our memory with the recollections of that evening's auction; but, out of respect to thy patience, we forbear. We observed that, with one exception, the paintings sold as those by Michael Angelo brought higher prices than any others. We were unable to account for this, as it is well known that the oil-pictures by that great master, or rather those attributed to him, are mean and pitiful.

The Fates at Florence, and the Witches in Cardinal Fieschi's collection at Rome, are not worthy of the company they keep. Expressing our surprise of the high estimation in which he seemed to be held by Mr. Levy's customers, a friend attributed the partiality shown to M. Angelo to a mistake on the part of the audience, in supposing the pictures to have been painted by Mike Angell, an artist who, at the time of which we write, executed the transparencies exhibited, during elections, at Tammany-hall.

“Fifteen, fifteen dollars—going—once, twice, gone! It's yours, Mr. Speer. (To the clerk)—Put down the venus to Mr. Crayon Speer, fifteen dollars; cheap as blackberries.”

Courteous reader, we could go on with a true description of the sale of every one of those rare pictures, as strongly impressed in our memory with the recollections of that evening's auction; but, out of respect to thy patience, we forbear. We observed that, with one exception, the paintings sold as those by Michael Angelo brought higher prices than any others. We were unable to account for this, as it is well known that the oil-pictures by that great master, or rather those attributed to him, are mean and pitiful.

articles presented by William and Mary, and Queen Anne; and others with the initials G. R., but from which of the first three Georges, I have not learned—probably some from each. There are also a few articles from private donors, and among these, two plates presented by a lady on Christmas day, 1718.

But old Trinity is gone! With her and with the hand-writings on her walls, my earliest and fondest associations are blended; but she will rise more glorious than before, an emblem of the resurrection of thousands who worshipped there, and whose bones lie mouldering in her clay. From the best information I am able to obtain, upwards of four hundred thousand have been deposited in the Trinity Church burying-ground since its first erection in 1697.

Now, Mr. Editor, if you think these facts worth a place in your Mirror, and are not afraid of its occupying too much space, the following touching lines, cut from the New-York American, will make an excellent finish to my story.

TRINITY CHURCH

Farewell! farewell! they're falling fast,
Pillar and arch, and architect;
You aged pile, to me the last
Solo record of the by-gone past,
Is speeding to its grave:
And thoughts from memory's fountain flow,
(As one by one, like wedded hearts,
Each rude and mouldering stone departs.)
Of boyhood's happiness and woe,—
Its sunshine, and its shade:
And though each ray of early gladness,
Comes mingled with the hues of sadness,
I would not bid them fade;
They come, as come the stars at night,—
Like fountains gushing into light,
And close around my heart they twine,
Like ivy round the mountain pine!
Yes, they are gone—the sunlight smiles
All day upon its foot-worn aisles.
Those foot-worn aisles! where oft have trod
The humble worshippers of God,
In times long past, when Freedom first
From all the land in glory burst!
The heroic few! from him, whose sword
Was wielded in his country's cause,
To him who battled with his word,
The bold expounder of her rights:
And they are gone—gone like the lone
Forgotten echoes of their tread;
And from their niches now are gone,
The sculptured records of the dead!
As now I gaze, my heart is stir'd
With music of another sphere:
A low, sweet chime, which once was heard,
Comes like the note of some wild bird
Upon my listening ear,—
Recalling many a happy hour,
Reviving many a wither'd flower,
Whose bloom and beauty long have laid
Within my sad heart's silent shade.
Life's morning flowers! that bud and blow,
And wither, ere the sun hath kiss'd
The dew-drops from their breasts of snow,
Or dried the landscape's veil of mist!
Yes! when that sweetly-mingled chime
Stole on my ear in boyhood's time,
My glad heart drank the thrilling joy,
Undreaming of its future pains!—
As spell-bound as the Theban boy
List'ning to Memnon's fabled strains!
Farewell, old fame! and though unsung
By bards, thy many glories fall,
Though bubbling fane hath never rung
Thy praises on its echoing bell—
Who that hath seen, can e'er forget
Thy gray old spire?—who that hath knelt
Within thy sacred aisles, nor felt
Religion's self grow sweeter yet!
Yes! though the decking hand of Time
Glory to Greece's fanes hath given,
That, from her old heroic clime,
Point proudly to their native heaven;
Though Rome hath many a ruin'd pile
To speak the glory of her land,
And fair, by Egypt's sacred Nile,
Her mould'ring monuments may stand,—
The joy that swells the gaze's heart,
The pride that sparkles in his eye,
When pondering on these piles, where Art
In crumbling majesty doth lie,
Ne'er blended with them keener joy,
Than mine, when but a thoughtless boy,
I gazed with awe-struck, wondering eye,
On thy old spire, my Trinity!
And thou shalt live like words of truth.—
Like golden monuments of youth!
As on the lake's unrippled breast
The mirror'd mountain lies at rest,
So thou shalt lie, till life depart,
Mirror'd for ages upon my heart!

ADVICE AND CAUTION.—When old persons inveigh against the vanity and nonsense of the world, in order to check the wishes and curiosity of young persons from making their experiments also, they remind me of the indifference with which a man hands a newspaper to his neighbour, after an hour's enjoyment of it, saying—“there's nothing in it, sir.” Shakespeare speaks more philosophically on this subject:

—“For now no less I loathe
The light and careless jivens that it breeds,
Than settled age has aback—
Imparting health and good advice.”

LUXURY OF TRAVELLING.—On the R.R. and Fredericksburgh railroad, berths have been fitted up in the cars, so that passengers can repose as comfortably as if in their own chambers. What next?

ADVICE AND CAUTION.—When old persons inveigh against the vanity and nonsense of the world, in order to check the wishes and curiosity of young persons from making their experiments also, they remind me of the indifference with which a man hands a newspaper to his neighbour, after an hour's enjoyment of it, saying—“there's nothing in it, sir.” Shakespeare speaks more philosophically on this subject:

—“For now no less I loathe
The light and careless jivens that it breeds,
Than settled age has aback—
Imparting health and good advice.”

LUXURY OF TRAVELLING.—On the R.R. and Fredericksburgh railroad, berths have been fitted up in the cars, so that passengers can repose as comfortably as if in their own chambers. What next?

ADVICE AND CAUTION.—When old persons inveigh against the vanity and nonsense of the world, in order to check the wishes and curiosity of young persons from making their experiments also, they remind me of the indifference with which a man hands a newspaper to his neighbour, after an hour's enjoyment of it, saying—“there's nothing in it, sir.” Shakespeare speaks more philosophically on this subject:

—“For now no less I loathe
The light and careless jivens that it breeds,
Than settled age has aback—
Imparting health and good advice.”

LUXURY OF TRAVELLING.—On the R.R. and Fredericksburgh railroad, berths have been fitted up in the cars, so that passengers can repose as comfortably as if in their own chambers. What next?

ADVICE AND CAUTION.—When old persons inveigh against the vanity and nonsense of the world, in order to check the wishes and curiosity of young persons from making their experiments also, they remind me of the indifference with which a man hands a newspaper to his neighbour, after an hour's enjoyment of it, saying—“there's nothing in it, sir.” Shakespeare speaks more philosophically on this subject:

—“For now no less I loathe
The light and careless jivens that it breeds,
Than settled age has aback—
Imparting health and good advice.”

LUXURY OF TRAVELLING.—On the R.R. and Fredericksburgh railroad, berths have been fitted up in the cars, so that passengers can repose as comfortably as if in their own chambers. What next?

ADVICE AND CAUTION.—When old persons inveigh against the vanity and nonsense of the world, in order to check the wishes and curiosity of young persons from making their experiments also, they remind me of the indifference with which a man hands a newspaper to his neighbour, after an hour's enjoyment of it, saying—“there's nothing in it, sir.” Shakespeare speaks more philosophically on this subject:

—“For now no less I loathe
The light and careless jivens that it breeds,
Than settled age has aback—
Imparting health and good advice.”

LUXURY OF TRAVELLING.—On the R.R. and Fredericksburgh railroad, berths have been fitted up in the cars, so that passengers can repose as comfortably as if in their own chambers. What next?

ADVICE AND CAUTION.—When old persons inveigh against the vanity and nonsense of the world, in order to check the wishes and curiosity of young persons from making their experiments also, they remind me of the indifference with which a man hands a newspaper to his neighbour, after an hour's enjoyment of it, saying—“there's nothing in it, sir.” Shakespeare speaks more philosophically on this subject:

—“For now no less I loathe
The light and careless jivens that it breeds,
Than settled age has aback—
Imparting health and good advice.”

SELECTIONS FROM NEW WORKS.

NIX'S MATE.

WHEN we heard that Rufus Dawes was engaged upon a novel, we were sure, from the dramatic power evinced in his tragedy of "Athens," that it would be one of extraordinary interest, displaying inventive faculties of the highest order, and a mastery and affluence of language seldom equalled. We have not been disappointed. "Nix's Mate" is a production which will be permanently incorporated in the American standard library of fiction.

An analysis of a novel can never adequately convey a proper idea of its merits, and we have no taste for such barren outlines. We must refer the reader to the book itself. It is rich in revolutionary incident, character, and the fidelity of its historical allusions and descriptions. By Bostonians it will be highly relished, if for these qualities only. But the work is characterized by still higher attributes. It is deeply philosophical in its tone and spirit, at the same time that the vividness of its scenes and the animation of the style keep the curiosity sustained and heightened to the close. In a word, "Nix's Mate" is the work of a man of true genius, and as such it will be welcomed by all the lovers of a pure and elevated literature. We give a brief extract from "Nix's Mate," which is not an unfavourable specimen of the style.

THE ENCHANTRESS.

After walking for a few minutes, they came to the rocky cavern where the enchantress dwelt. They descended over rough stones and gravel close to the water's edge.

"See where Nameoke dwells!" she exclaimed, "a brave dweller, where she sleeps and is lulled by the lapping of the waters; but we must have a light."

With one stroke of her magic she caused the fire to stream from a huge fragment of flint upon a handful of dry moss, and throwing on this pieces of wood that had floated from some wreck, in an inconceivably short time a fire flamed up through the cavern, and sent across the water toward the vessel a brilliant sheet of light.

As the flame arose a current of cold air swept through the fissure, and a hundred different sea-birds went flapping and screaming to the night, and a dozen bats came diving against the fire, attracted by its dazzling splendour.

"Nameoke is not alone!" said the sibyl, "hear how the fowls scream at her coming—hark! 'tis the roaring of the sea-monsters, the fire has aroused them from their slumbers." The enchantress now took an iron pot from beneath some seaweed, and dipping up salt water with a shell, poured it thereon. She then cast into the same handfuls of dried herbs, the Heliotrope, Virga-Pastoris, Centaurea, Nepta Verberna, Ross Serpentina, and other magical plants, to which she added Aloes and bits of Sandalwood. She then climbed within the fissure of the cavern, and brought down a couple of star-fish, which she cast into the pot, murmuring over it a charm in the Arabian dialect approved by Albulmash.

Instantly a peculiar red flame shot forth, and then, a dense smoke smothering it, rose and filled the cavern. Nameoke now murmured a brief incantation, and the smoke again drove away and left the fire flaming as before.

She now strained the decoction through a silver sieve, and pouring a part into a goblet of the same metal, threw what remained into the sea.

"Now drink from this, exclaimed the enchantress, and it will render you invisible to all who wish charms for evil, and then come, with Nameoke, and she will show you things equally novel and wonderful!"

"Charming Nameoke!" cried the ardent voluptuary, "I have drunk so deeply from the magic of thy beauty, that further sorcery would kill me. Come to my arms," he cried, clasping her violently; "come to my arms, beautiful Nameoke, and make me the happiest of mortals!"

"Felon!" said the enchantress, in a tone that surprised him even more than the utterance of his name, "drive away that viper from your bosom, or it will sting you to death. I know you well, and those with whom you are living. Begone from me, unless you can be a man and not a fiend!"

"Is it any crime to adore one so beautiful?" exclaimed Felton; "is there anything more innocent than love?"

"There is love in the heavens and love in the hells," replied the enchantress; "would Felton see the difference between them?"

"Love knows no difference," said the mariner, his visage reddening with excitement, and his eyes glistening on the imperial beauty, with the fire of the black snake when he would charm it and to its destruction; "Love knows no difference, Nameoke; it must be the same whether it lives—whether in a palace or in a rocky cavern, whether in your fabled heaven or in your hell."

"Nameoke will show you then the difference," exclaimed the sibyl, "and when you know how far they are from being the same, perhaps you may fly from the love that curses, and leave her and your evil courses, unless you wish to die in their delirium. This talisman will draw away the veil that hangs between the natural and the spiritual: take it!"

So saying, she suspended a mystic charm about his neck, while she threw wood of the aloes, crocus and balsam into the fire, and at the same time smote the rocky cavern with her magic: when immediately a peal of thunder burst above their heads with the uproar of an earthquake, and, as if a thousand groups had been smitten at once, the cavern split asunder, and Felton found himself with Nameoke in the midst of sylvan scenery, more magnificent and lovely than the imagination of poet ever conceived in dreams of Arabian intoxication.

They were walking hand in hand in a garden, where apparently nature and not art strove for mastery; for though flowers of innumerable genera and species were blooming in every direction, and in the exactest order, there was a wildness in the arrangement which was the result of perfect contrivance. In all directions there were walks of natural mosaic, where countless stones of every imaginable shade were blended in beautiful forms; and with such skill had the artist designed them, that pictures of the most exquisite loveliness varied like moving kaleidoscopes, and seemed to carry out the very happiness of the gazer into bodily creations; over these walks, trees of infinite variety, in blossom, in leaf, and hanging heavily with delicious fruits, arched in fantastic garlands, and swung gracefully and woefully in the air. At the termination of some of the alleys stretched immense lawns, bordered by gently undulating uplands, and swelling higher and higher in the distance, till hills were overtopped by hills more lofty and still more lofty, and at length terminated by majestic mountains, that sent their towering pinnacles among the clouds, and rested in perpetual sunshine.

The intermediate spaces were seen meandering rivers, that, winding among the swelling waves of greenery, broke out at intervals like sparkling crystal, where swans were sailing two and two, and plashing in the wider and nearer lake-like harbour that reflected from its unrippled surface the whole landscape and the sky around them; thus deepened toward the zenith, from the brightest ultramarine to the celestial sapphire. In all directions fountains of clearest water burst forth in forms that mocked all human contrivance, and painted on the heavens such glorious rainbows, that the heart overflowed with gladness while the eye rested upon them. Here and there were children engaged in innocent delights; some of them sitting on banks of flowers, and weaving garlands for each other's heads; others sporting with lambs of brilliant whiteness, and bounding with them over the waving hills of close herbage, laughing and shouting, and clapping their hands, the very pictures of careless enjoyment.

The enchantress watched the mariner, who gazed around with a pale and haggard countenance. Surprise was depicted in his features, but gladness was a stranger to their expression.

"This is a paradise of beauty and innocence," exclaimed the enchantress; "how does it suit the rover of the seas?"

"I see no beauty here," exclaimed Felton, "it is more insipid and irksome than a dead clun."

"But look upon the skies," said the enchantress, "Nameoke would live there for ever; look upon the landscape, see how the lights and shades blend harmoniously around us; can anything be more lovely than these walks and arbours? See there, how the shadows from those beautiful clouds chase each other over the fields and are now lost in that dark forest; and these fountains breaking up in so many directions! Nameoke will tell you what they mean. They are the correspondences of divine truth, and they all come from one source. The reservoirs among those distant mountains, and they fall into the earth and fertilize the ground, and take a thousand different directions, that they may scatter blessings in their path. See how they break up again, and lift themselves toward their heaven, and rise to their source proclaiming truth in their operations; how beautifully they paint hope among their rainbows!"

"I see the skies and the clouds, the shadows and the landscapes, the fountains and the rainbows," exclaimed Felton, listlessly; "but I see nothing to give me any pleasure—come, let us go away!"

"Stay awhile," said the sibyl, "Nameoke has not shown you all. Cast your eyes through those smaller mountains, where toward the east they break into a vista, and on one more lofty and magnificent than the rest rises toward the heaven; do you see the one Nameoke means?"

"I see a mountain higher than the others," replied the mariner.

"And do you see anything uncommon about its appearance?"

"I see a bright light streaming from the side, like a small cloud blushing in the sunset."

"Nameoke would have you watch it narrowly," said the enchantress.

As she spoke, it came rapidly onward toward the place where they were standing; and as it approached, a strong light streamed up from a centre of intense brightness surrounded by a circular iris of transcendent glory. As it approached, the day seemed to dawn anew, and the birds among the branches of the fruit-trees sang aloud with the brightness of morning. The clouds, which were hanging about the sky in thick masses, and showing their fine tents by every variety of contrast, now put on the richest dresses of crimson and gold, while the air seemed at once to be laden with the fragrance of water-lilies and zephyrs.

Presently the seeming blaze of radiance assumed another appearance. There was a chariot of mother of pearl, wreathed into a more graceful form than a sea-shell, and shining with enamel, in which diamonds and chrysolites circled it in many beautiful bands, and which was drawn by four white horses abreast, whose manes and tails flowed like masses of silver hair, and whose hoofs were such as never were before seen by mortal eye. The horses were then modelled. As they tramped through the atmosphere, it seemed as if they threw up clouds of gold and diamond dust, which the winds scattered behind them in glittering profusion; while the Iris deepened its colours, and from the midst of it appeared a man more glorious than the Apollo of antiquity, in the lustre and beauty of early youth, with his head bound by a wreath of myrtle. His face shone brighter than the sun, but so mildly in its lustre, that to gaze on it was peace and tranquillity; and his hair flowed over his shoulders like tresses of shadowing topaz. Presently the chariot reached the ground, and as it touched the earth, the trees stood down their blossoms, and the vines waved their graceful festoons, and the birds sang melodiously that it seemed as if an atmosphere of love were the breath that gave life to everything present.

On a sudden, the young man who sat in the chariot appeared as two, a bride and a bridegroom. His form and features were unchanged, but there sat by his side a female, whose loveliness was so surpassing all imagination, that it were mockery to attempt its description. Her attention seemed wholly occupied with her partner, and she gazed on him with such gentle and delicate affection, that she appeared to be the embodied form of one delicious emotion, which was that of a first and only love. He gazed on her with reciprocal fondness, and seemed like personified thought dwelling enamoured on the ideal object of its adoration. They were goodness and truth living in inseparable communion.

The young man now gave his hand to the female, and they both sprang lightly to the ground; and as they walked in one of the arbours like two angels in the paradise of marriage, music, from an undiscovered source, swelled sweetly and softly among the foliage; while the fragrance of the water-lilies and verberna gave place to that of the garden-blossom and the lime.

The enchantress turned from gazing on those celestial objects to watch the mariner; but his eyes were fixed on the earth. There was gladness everywhere but in his own bosom, and the cloud that shadowed his heart cast its gloom upon his pallid countenance.

"Take me," exclaimed he, "in pity take me from this place, which is more horrible to me than the grave."

As he spoke, she smote the ground with her magic, and in the midst of deafening thunder they were once again by the seaside in the cave.

The sea-breeze sighed fitfully, swept coldly through the fissures of the rocks, and fanned the cheek of Felton, who, on reviving, found Nameoke feeding again the flame that was nearly extinguished. "Are you awake?" inquired the maiden.

"Yes!" replied the mariner; "but I have had a disagreeable dream."

"Nameoke would have the dream instructive," said the enchantress, with a look of melancholy; "return now to thy vessel yonder, and think no more of love, which flames only to destroy."

"Never!" exclaimed the mariner, more impassionately than ever; "the insipidity of such love as comes to us in dreams of flowers and romance will never do for Felton. Nameoke, you must be mine to-night, or I perish!"

"Stay!" cried the enchantress, "did not Nameoke say that she had seen the star of love in gloom, and the cynosure dropping blood from the bear? Did not Nameoke say that the moon might rise this night drenched in the white-man's blood?"

"You are wild, beautiful creature," cried the enamoured mariner, "but your surpassing beauty inflames the more for your very extravagance. By the mad dogs of hell, you shall be mine this moment!"

"Hold!" shrieked the sibyl, as the rude touch of the sailor would have profaned her person! "hold, for the love of heaven. There is one chance for Felton yet, before the moon shall bathe within his blood—Appear!"

As she spoke, she threw a portion of galbanus, dark sandalus and resin on the fire, and amidst the most deafening clangor that roared from beneath the sea, the cavern of the enchantress was rent from its base, and she stood with the mariner in the shades of the damned.

They were standing in one of a long, interminable succession of caverns that were vaulted by black and smoky rocks, where bats of all horrible forms were fluttering to and fro, and lizards and centipedes were crawling amidst the damp, dripping walls. There was a table spread in the centre of this apartment, with a crimson cloth, and was lighted by flambeaux of pitch; a number of guests were seated at it, carousing from large goblets, their heads bound with poppy and mandragora, their faces red and glistening with excitement. There were men and women in that company, seated alternately; and the women were in half undress, and were kept from falling to the ground by the arms of the men, so drunken were they with the drink; but every now and then a centipede dropped from the wall into a goblet, and the man and woman who drank from it fell together under the table, with a scream of delight went up from the company, and seized the ripples on the walls.

The enchantress shuddered as she gazed on the scene, and the heavy dew stood upon her forehead, when she turned away sick at heart, for a smile of delight was gleaming from the face of her companion.

"This is rare sport," said he in a whisper, his heart beating violently with emotion; let us join them, Nameoke!"

"Wait awhile," responded Nameoke, "let us see more before we do that. Follow me!"

They passed the hall of the drinkers, and came where there were sounds of music and dancing. Here were crowds of both sexes half naked, with their arms encircling each other, and wheeling round the room in the delirium of the waltz; their faces wore an expression of longing, mingled with morbid desire, and their limbs could hardly support their bloated bodies. Some of them were emaciated and haggard; but they all had garlands on their heads, which had been drenched in alcohol, and they were now faded and dry. On one side of the cavern, which was like the other in most respects, but was lighted by lamps of skulls, was a number of persons, who dealt out drink to the dancers, which was cold and black, and seemed to refresh those who drank it, for they lay down on couches and appeared to fall asleep.

"Let us join these people, charming Nameoke!" exclaimed the heated Felton, "let us drink and waltz together;" and he would have thrown off his clothes for the pastime, but she checked him.

"Stay a moment," said she, touching his arm; "follow me yet a little further!"

They turned now into a hall, the odour of which was horrible. The faint light which served it, came only from the phosphorescence of putrifying bodies. Thousands of coffins were piled up along the walls, and pyramids of skulls and bones of men were heaped up without number. There was a solitary couch in the room, but it was without an occupant.

"Come," said the enchantress, "we have seen enough—let us depart—it is time for us to begone."

"Not without one hour of love with my Nameoke—see, our bridal bed is ready!" exclaimed the infuriated man.

And he seized her in his arms, and would have thrown her on the couch in the midst of all the horrors of the grave.

"Enough!" screamed the enchantress, and she smote the solid rock as she spoke amidst the wallings and blasphemous of a million dissolute spirits; and the same terrific sounds brought her with her companion once more where the sea-breeze was moaning in her cave.

Felton passed his hand across his eyes, as if to relieve himself from a sudden attack of blindness, and exclaimed—

"You shall not escape me so easily, fascinating enchantress; your charms and your sorceries only inflame me the more. By the powers of evil, you shall be mine this moment!"

"Stay!" cried the enchantress, while her eyes gleamed with wildness; for the love of heaven, stay. Felton, you have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled.

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter on his forehead like a thunderbolt. He fell like an axe before the altar; and as his body rolled to the mouth of the cave, the round red moon came up from out the water, and the prophecy of Nameoke was fulfilled."

"You have heard me utter

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

CRITICS AND CRITICISM.

BY L. F. TASSIERO.

THE first great requisite of a critic is knowledge—not of Greek, Latin, Hebrew, High Dutch, History, Politics, Geology, Pantology, or anything of that kind—but it is necessary that he should have a perfect knowledge of the religious and political creed of all authors, a knowledge of their rank in society, and of what hour they die at, if at all. It is impossible, in the nature of things, that a man who dines at three o'clock should have so great a knowledge of humanity and mathematics, as he who dines at seven: yet some of these ignorant people write books, which, to the uninitiated, look as if it really contained something worth reading, but it is mere fudge—they are written by the incompetent, and nobody knows their incompetency but the critic, who has ascertained at what time the writers dine, and in what style they live, and who knows what is the religious and political creed they profess. What can be the use of a critic who only forms a judgment of a book from the book itself. Every reader can do that for himself. But many readers live in the country, and in remote suburbs, who know nothing of what is going on in that little circle called the great world; and these simple people would be entertained with an entertaining book, or instructed by an instructive one, without once thinking who was the author. In consequence of this weak and foolish propensity to like what they like, and to be amused with what is amusing, the people of America have frequently suffered their taste to be sadly corrupted; and they have suffered books to become standard works, which ought, years ago, to have been consigned to the cinders—cooks and trunk-makers. All this has arisen from people judging for themselves, instead of taking knowing critics for their guide. For instance, during the last century, when criticism in England was at a very low ebb, and scarcely understood as a science—when editors of magazines and reviews did not care a straw for a publisher's name—there was a book published called the Vicar of Wakefield. People liked it, because they liked it; there was not a word in it from beginning to end about silver forks, and for anything that appears on the face of the work, it cannot be known that Oliver Goldsmith was even aware of the existence of silver forks. Furthermore, the book was essentially and absolutely vulgar; say, vulgar! That one word alone would have crushed and annihilated the work in the present refined and advanced state of criticism. Oh! gentlemen, reader, avoid vulgarity as you would avoid a pestilence, and if ever you meet with a book in which the author speaks with contempt of molasses, or ducks and green peas, close the book on the instant—burn it—never mention that you have read it. You may read blackguardism and slang as much as you please—you must not be disgusted with the brutality of highwaymen and pickpockets—you must take no offence at what savours of the brothel and gaming-table; all this is pleasant relief to the insipidity of the drawing-room; and there cannot be a finer school of philosophy than a den of thieves.

The value of criticism then is, that it points out to ordinary readers that which they cannot find out by their own sagacity. We do not want critics to tell us what is amusing, everybody can do that; we do not want critics to tell us where to laugh or cry, nature will do that for us; but we want critics to tell us what is the pink and perfection of fashionable life. It would be a monstrous bore to read a tailor's catalogue or a cook's bill of fare; but when we are informed by competent critics that such things belong to, and form the substance of fashionable life, then they are delightful in the extreme. There is nothing very philosophic or interesting in tripe and cow-hell, but when we are critically informed that tripe and cow-hell, form part of the secret of that mystical cave of Trophonius, called Fashionable Life, then we can peruse with unmingled pleasure two volumes post octavo, all about tripe and cow-hell. The real business of the critic is to find out, when an author has written two such volumes, whether he is really familiar with tripe and cow-hell, or whether he treats of them only from the reports of others.

Next to knowledge, a critic ought to possess a great deal of contempt—judgment of honesty, contempt of his own character, of the world's judgment, and of human feelings. He ought to hold honesty in great contempt, and if by any accident his employer should tell him to praise a good book, he had better let it alone altogether, for fear of spoiling his hand. In the art of criticism there is the dishonesty of praise, and the dishonesty of blame, which ought to be thoroughly understood by the critic. There is no man living capable of writing a book so purely and so well, which a disciplined critic may not cruelly demolish, and ingeniously ridicule; and, in like manner, there is no critic who is properly skilled in his business, who cannot find in the stupidest book that ever was written, something to praise, provided the book be published by the proper book-seller. A thorough-paced critic ought not to care a straw for his own character; he should have no hesitation in pronouncing an opinion of a book in direct hostility to his own judgment; and he should be prepared to back his opinion with bluster and swagger. If the world should contradict him, he has nothing to do but contradict the world, and to tell it to its face that it is mightily pleased with the works that it neglects, and that it never reads those books which are in everybody's hands. But the perfection of criticism is to hold human feelings in supreme contempt. All feeling ought to be sacrificed to the laudable and glorious object of writing. It is a fact well known to the skilful and scientific, that if all books had a fair sale according to their real merits, there would be no chance of one publisher keeping others out of the market; therefore, to make room for the books of one or two publishers, it is necessary to keep down and suppress, as much as possible, all books published by any but the favoured houses; and this is perhaps the best and surest method; for to attack a book sagely, shows that there is something in it worthy of notice—to neglect it altogether looks spiteful—but to give it a careless notice, as if it were neither good, bad, nor indifferent, is the surest way to smother it.—New-York Sun.

CONVENIENT CRITICISM.—Shordan had a very convenient formula as a reply to the new publications that were constantly sent to him viz.: "Dear sir—I have received your exquisite work, and I have no doubt I shall be highly delighted after I have read it."

ADVENTURE ON THE CLYDE.

AFTER an agreeable residence of a few weeks on the sea-shore near Gourcock, which may be styled the Margate or Ramsgate of Glasgow, I went one day on board a steamer to re-ascend the Clyde. The weather was fine, and the deck of the boat was crowded with passengers of all kinds, from the portly manufacturer to the thin, nervous, capital, returning like myself from a little pleasurable rustication to the poor shattered invalid, whom the beautiful day and the low fere had tempted to take a sail down the river and back again. Many were the vessels passing to and fro, that day, on the Clyde; but one only of these drew any particular attention from our company. This was a large Irish whaler, which shot past us just as we were opposite to Dumbarton, being probably on its way to Belfast or Dublin. Perhaps it was the number of genuine and unmistakable Milesians on the deck, all returning, ragged as they came, to their native soil, that made myself and others fix our gaze for a minute or two on this vessel. While doing so, we heard a loud cry uttered by some one on board, and saw a great bustle take place on the deck, all the passengers running to one side. Almost immediately the steam was let off, and the vessel brought to a stop. Our captain, on seeing these movements, said: "Surely there is some one overboard!" But the distance was every moment increasing, and we failed to satisfy ourselves that such was the cause of the stir. In a little while, the passengers, one after another, turned longingly and indifferently away, and the Irish steamer was soon aloof out of sight and out of mind.

Our own vessel moved on. We passed the terminus of the Roman wall and site of Henry Bell's well-deserved monument. A fiddle, tolerably well played, was struck up by a musician unobtrusively distinguished in the crowd of passengers. As we were approaching Eskine ferry, a female voice was heard exclaiming: "My bairn! my bairn! Where is my bairn!" and, on turning round, I found that the words proceeded from a young woman of six or seven and twenty, who bore one child in her arms, and led another in her hand. Her countenance was turned anxiously and imploringly to the captain, as she uttered the words just mentioned. The captain was close behind me. "My good woman," said he, "don't distress yourself. If you have missed one of your children, it cannot be far away." "Oh, sir," returned the mother, "I missed it but yesterday; but I looked everywhere about the deck before I spoke. Oh, where is my bairn!" The passengers had assembled around the spot, and the poor woman's appealing eyes were cast on the crowd, as she vent to utter her last exclamation. "Some of the men may have taken the child below for amusement," said the captain, soothingly, and away he went to ascertain the truth of his own conjecture. The young wife followed him. The result, however, was, that the child could not be seen or heard of in the ship. The captain began to look gloomy, and the company on board the steamer were again a buzz of sympathizing conjecture. Conjecture once more was busy, though it could only tend to one single point—that the child was overboard. But how it had got overboard was the question. Being but five years of age, (the eldest of three who had been with the mother,) he could scarcely be supposed to have climbed the side of the vessel, even if he had been desirous of looking over into the water. How, then, could the thing have happened?

One man only could throw a single ray of even conjectural light on the fate of the child. This passenger stated, that while he had been seated by the side of the vessel occupied in reading, and in such a position that his eye could see the water nearly to the side of the boat, he saw a paper or rag on the water; but, though he seemed to him a piece of paper or rag on the water, but, through the motion of the vessel, the object had been but an instant before his sight, and could scarcely be said to have occupied his thoughts for a second's duration, if at all. Shortly afterwards, he observed another circumstance, which he did not then suppose to have any connection with what he had previously seen. This was the open state of the gangway door, or that portion of the bulkhead which is so constructed as to open for the admission of passengers and goods. On observing it open, he had risen to shut it, but thought no more of the matter. Both incidents were so trifling that he could not say at what period of the voyage they had taken place. The passengers and captain proceeded to the gangway door which was examined, and it was found that the door was open beneath the staple, and the staple itself, were so much worn away as to cause the door to burst open to the outside, on the instant that any force was applied to it from the deck or inside. Every face looked sad, and yet satisfied, at this discovery. Here was, in all human probability, the place and the cause of the child's unhappy disappearance; and the object seen on the water by the reading passenger confirmed the supposition. We remember feeling pleased with the conduct of an Englishman present on the occasion. With the straightforward and fearless candour of his country, he openly administered a severe reprimand to the captain for his carelessness in permitting the gangway door to remain in such a condition. "It is nothing less," said the rebuker, "than a direct trap for children!" Where can they think themselves safe, when agitated by natural fears at finding themselves for the first time in a ship, if not when they seat themselves on deck, and leave for firm support against the vessel's sides! This child has entertained the thought, and has fallen a victim to it!

Who can describe the state of the poor mother all this while? When the vessel was first related, had been made, hope seemed to take flight for the first time. Her exclamations were to the heart of all on board. She was the wife of an humble tradesman in Glasgow, and her children having been attacked by an epidemic, she had been sent by her husband to take a trip down the Clyde and up again, in order to spend their convalescence. "Oh! what will their father had it was his constant cry, have given me the right to bring home but two?" What will his father say! The prospective distress of her husband seemed to pain her more than anything else; yet, ever and anon, all feelings but the mother's departed, and she shed the agonizing tears of a "Rachel weeping for her children." While gazing now and then at her grief-stricken countenance, which was naturally a comely and interesting one, every person on board that vessel won't be surprised to find how often they have been able to alleviate her distress: and when the boat landed at the Broomielaw, many were eager to assist her on her course homewards. But she was accompanied by a friend of her own sex, who precluded the necessity of any such aid. With this woman, then, she went on her way to the house which, for the first time, probably, she felt reluctant to visit. What were the feelings of the father on hearing of the accident, can only be imagined.

I afterwards learned that the distress of the honest pair lasted but one night. Joy came to them with the morning and the Greenock coach; for in that vehicle, before breakfast-time, arrived the missing boy. As conjectured, he had fallen backwards through the treacherous gangway door, and been precipitated into the water. The receding tide had carried him rapidly down the river for a short space. Luckily he was observed from the Irish steamer, the captain of which instantly stopped to pick him up. This was the cause of the bustle we had observed in that vessel, and I now wondered that no one had thought of the possibility of such being the case when the mother was waiting for a lost son. By using the proper exertions, life had been restored to the poor child, and when they reached Greenock the parties on board left him to be sent back to his parents, each contributing a trifle to pay the necessary expenses. I could not help thinking it almost worth while to have a son thus endangered, and suffering the acutest pain on his account for a night, in order to draw forth so much good feeling from one's fellow-creatures, and experience so joyful a relief from temporary sorrow.

THE SPANIEL OF DARMSTADT.

A new phenomenon has recently appeared in the musical world. Marvels of this kind are not uncommon, in the shape of a little biped urchin, not yet out of petticoats, who executes variations upon the fourth string, and writes fugues without knowing a note of music. But this new phenomenon is of an entirely different order, being a modest quadruped of the canine race. Dogs have been occasionally observed, both in modern and past days, to show an extreme sensibility to music. On some of them, fine music has been known to produce an apparent painful effect, causing them gradually to become restless, to moan piteously, and, finally, to fly from the spot, with every sign of suffering and distress. Others have been seen to sit and listen to music with seeming delight, and even to go every Sunday to church, with the obvious purpose of enjoying the solemn and powerful strains of the organ. All these displays, however, of musical tendencies on the part of the canine race, are as nothing in comparison with the following, which a recent German paper gives an account of, for the amusement of the world of harmony.

Frederick S—, a musical amateur of Darmstadt, in the grand duchy of Hesse, possesses a female spaniel, which has become a strange source of terror to all the mediocre musicians of the place and its vicinity. Having acquired a competency by commercial industry, Mr. S— has retired from business, and devoted himself, heart and soul, to the study and enjoyment of his favourite science. Every member of his little household was by degrees involved more or less in the same occupation, and even the housemaid could in time bear a part in a chorus, or decipher a melody of Schubert. One individual alone in the family seemed to resist this musical enchantment; this was a small spaniel, the sole specimen of the canine race in the mansion. Mr. S— felt the impossibility of instilling the theory of sounds into the head of Poodle, but he firmly resolved to make the animal bear some part of other in the general domestic concert, and by perseverance, and the adoption of ingenious means, he attained his object. Every time that a false note escaped either from instrument or voice—as often as any blunder, of whatever kind, was committed by the members of the musical family, (and such blunders were sometimes committed intentionally,) down came the master's cane on the back of the unfortunate poodle, till she howled and growled again. By and by, simple menaces with the stick were substituted for blows, and at a still more advanced period of this extraordinary training, a mere glance of Mr. S—'s eyes was sufficient to make the animal howl to admiration. In the end, Poodle became so thoroughly acquainted with, and attentive to false notes and other musical barbarisms, that the slightest mistake of the kind was infallibly signalled by a yell from her, forming the most expressive commentary upon the misperformance.

When extended trials were made of the animal's acquirements, there were never found to fail, and Poodle became, what she still is, the most famous, impartial, and conscientious connoisseur in the duchy of Hesse. But, as may be imagined, her musical appreciation is entirely negative; if you sing with expression, and play with ability, she will remain cold and impassible. But let your execution exhibit the slightest defect, and you will have her instantly showing her teeth, winking her tail, yelping, barking, and growling. At the present time, there is not a concert or an opera at Darmstadt to which Mr. Frederick S— and his wonderful dog are not invited, or, at least, the dog. The voice of the prima donna, the instruments of the band, whether violin, clarinet, hautboys, or bugle—all of them must excite their parts in perfect harmony, otherwise Poodle looks at its master, erects its ears, shows its grinders, and howls outright. Old and new pieces, known or unknown to the dog, produce on it the same effect.

It must not be supposed that the discrimination of the creature is confined to the mere execution of musical compositions. Whatever may have been the case at the outset of its training, its present and perfected intelligence extends even to the secrets of composition. Thus, if a vicious modulation, or a false relation of parts, occurs in a piece of music, the animal shows symptoms of uneasy hesitation, and if the error be continued, will infallibly give the grand condemnatory howl! In short, Poodle is one of the terror of all the middling composers of Darmstadt, and a perfect nightmare to the imagination of all poor singers and players. Sometimes Mr. S— and his friends take a pleasure in annoying the canine critic, by emitting all sorts of discordant sounds from inside and out of voice. On such occasions the creature loses all self-control, its eyes shoot forth fiery flashes, and long and frightful howls respond to the immoludious concert of the mischievous bipeds. But the latter must be careful not to go too far; for when the dog's patience is tried to excess, it becomes altogether wild, and flies fiercely at the tormentors and their masters.

This dog's ease is a very curious one, and the attendant phenomena not very easy of explanation. From the animal's power of discerning the correctness of musical composition, as well as of execution, one would be inclined to imagine that Mr. S—, in training his dog, had only called into play faculties existing (but latent) before, and that dogs have in them the natural germs of all musical ear. This seems more likely to be the case, than that the animal's perfect musical taste was wholly an acquisition, resulting from the training. However this may be, the Darmstadt dog is certainly a marvelous creature, and we are surprised that, in these exhibiting times, its powers have not been displayed on a wider stage. The operatic establishments of London and Paris might be greatly the better, perhaps, of a visit from the critical Poodle.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Youth's Keeneyk." A Christmas and New-Year's Gift for Young People. Boston: Ous, Brothers and Co.

A NEAR little work is this, but mostly made up of selections from English annuals. We would rather have seen something original. The plates have rather an "old, familiar" appearance. The poem by Mr. Laman Blanchard, entitled "The Mother's Hope," will be found a beautiful thing.

"The Lady's Annual Register, and Household's Almanac" for 1840. By Caroline Gilman. Boston: Ous, Brothers and Co.

Here is a specimen of the useful and the elegant combined—beautiful poetry with recipes for curing pork and hams—neat engravings, and a monthly garden calendar! "Mrs. Gilman is a lady of fine talents, and can amply dignify any subject which she chooses to touch. From the amusing little items with which the work abounds we select the following:

HORRORS OF MOVING.—"I have such a horror of moving that I would not take a benediction from the King if I was not indulged with nonresidence. What a dislocation of comfort is comprised in that word moving! Such a heap of little nasty things, after you think all is got into the cart; old dredging-boxes, without brushes, gallipots, vials, things that it is impossible the most necessitous persons can ever want; but which the women, who preside on these occasions, will not leave behind if it was to save your soul; they'd keep the cart ten minutes to stow in dirty pipes and broken matches, to show their economy. Then you can find nothing you want for many days after you get into your new lodgings. You must comb your hair with your fingers, wash your hands without soap, go about in dirty gaiters. Was I Diogenes, I would not move out of a kitchen into a boghoad, though the first had nothing but small beer in it, and the second reeked claret."

THE LAST YANKEE STORY.—A lady passing through New-Hampshire observed the following notice on a board: "Horses taken into grass. Long tails three shillings and sixpence, short tails two shillings." The lady asked the owner of the land the reason for the difference of price. He answered, "you see, ma'am, the long tails can brush away the flies; but the short ones are so tormented by them that they can hardly eat at all."

HARD BARGAINING.—A countryman in one of the western states, with a load of meal, drove up to a lady's door, when the following brief conversation took place:—"Do you want to buy any meal, ma'am?" "What do you ask me for a bushel?" "Two cents, ma'am—prime!" "O I can get it for a fig." (In a despairing voice) "Dear lady I will you take a bushel for nothing?" "Is it sifted?"

FEMALE MOSQUITOES.—It is a curious fact in natural history that it is only female and not male mosquitoes which are the tormentors of mankind. As nature deluges in contrasts, may she not have meant to exhibit one kind of females in opposition to another?

THE STAGE.

AN exceedingly clever actress is Mrs. FITZWILLIAM in a style of acting in which success is rare and difficult; a style that depends for its interest and effect solely on that vivacious naturalness which is always captivating, and but seldom attained. There is a laughing, gay, buoyant spirit about this actress, which lends a charm to every character that she personates. She has unusual versatility, sings well, plays on the harp, guitar and piano, and is in all respects a most attractive and agreeable lady. The little farce of The Widow Wiggins affords ample opportunities for the display of all her powers. It was written for her, we believe, by Buckstone, and is admirably got up.

The old comedy of The Country Girl has been revived at the Park, during Mrs. Fitzwilliam's engagement. In its present shape it is an adaptation by Garrick of Wycherley's Country Wife; made very popular by Mrs. Jordan's celebrated personation of Peggy, the character that has since been appropriated by Mrs. Fitzwilliam. The situations of the play are dramatic and effective; and the plot is well developed. The conversation is lively and spirited, without abounding in brilliant conceits of wit. There is a good, hearty nature about it, however, which gives life and interest to the dialogue.

Wycherley is best known as the author of the Plain Dealer. He flourished among the wits of the loose court of Charles I., and was a particular favourite of the merry monarch. A lover of the Duchess of Cleveland, and a friend of Villiers, he was a man of gallantry and fashion. His dramatic pieces were four in number, only one of which, in the change of fashions and manners, possesses of the stage, and that in the revised drama of Garrick. In his old age, Wycherley was the friend and correspondent of Pope; and the letters that passed between them indicate the mutual respect entertained by them for each other's genius and literary merit. We like to see the revival on our stage of these old domestic plays, when they are purified and adapted to our modern tastes. They link us with the men and manners of past generations.

In The Will, Mrs. Fitzwilliam played Albina, a part admirably well adapted to her. This is one of Reynolds's many comedies, and one of the best of them. It is throughout a production of the tamest mediocrity. The dialogue is stupid, the incidents are stale, and the plot is ridiculous; but in spite of all this, it is capable of being made by clever acting a very tolerable dramatic exhibition. It was exceedingly well cast at the Park. Placide's Sir Solomon Cymc was capital. Richings did the tutor to the life; but the whole drunken scene is revolting to the last degree, however well it may be carried through. In this Richings was more natural than nature itself; one could almost have believed that he was as tipsy as he pretended. Nothing could have been more like the real thing. The Will was first acted about forty years ago. It still keeps possession of the stage; but Reynolds is not one of the immortals, and his numerous litter of comedies will soon be quietly gathered in the wallet of the old gentleman, who goes about seeking alms for oblivion.

TO READER: AND CORRESPONDENTS.

Our Texan correspondent is respectfully informed, that we cannot avail ourselves of his manuscript.—Another poem by Mrs. Fendickoff graces our paper to day. It shows poetical ability of no common character. We perceive that her contributions are everywhere copied.—"Y's" attack on the Temperance performances at the National are too violent and personal.—The letter from Boston in relation to the Rev. Mr. P., is unfitted for our columns.—The lines written during "the late epidemic autumnal weather, are not worthy of the subject.—Our Cincinnati correspondent, "O. T.," writes very pretty verses, but is unfortunate in the choice of his subjects. Try again.—We have received a critique upon Charles Keen in reply to a commendatory notice, which appeared in our columns some weeks since. We disagree entirely with "Cibber" in his opinions.—Our obligations are due to the author of the beautiful lines upon Trinity Church.—"A sail to Hoboken" is lively and well done, but marred by some defects, which must exclude it.—Another number of "Faust" in our next.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1839.

Editorial.—Some comments of an ungacious character have appeared in two or three of the Philadelphia papers, in consequence of an editorial allusion, in the last plate number of the New-York Mirror, to an original poem by the proprietor of this journal. The intimation that the author of the poem referred to had the remotest agency in inducing the allusion, is totally unfounded. He did not see or hear of it until it appeared in print—and then was the first to object to its appearance. We saw no impropriety in it, however, and decided not to stop the press to strike it out. The departments of the editor and proprietor of this paper are distinct;—and this fact has been repeatedly stated to the public, in advertisements and prospectuses, during the last two years. Had we thought any misapprehension existed on this point, we should certainly have been more cautious in affording to any one the shadow of an apology for the charge of self-laudation brought, unreflectingly we are willing to believe, against an honourable man. One word more, while we are upon this subject, in relation to the offence taken by the Philadelphia Herald and Sentinel at the circumstance of receiving, with the plate number of the Mirror, a circular from the proprietor, calling attention to the costly embellishment, with which it was enriched. Such has been the custom with publishers time out of mind, and we cannot, for the life of us, see why it is not "a fair business transaction." At a period of unequalled financial depression, a very expensive engraving is given to the readers of a periodical work. The object is of course to increase its claims upon public attention as an elegant journal of literature and the fine arts; for, nothing but a liberal public subscription could warrant so great an outlay. A circular is sent with the plate, calling the attention of editors to its merits. What is there in this to elicit animadversion and rebuke? Why has not the proprietor of a journal the same privilege to do this, that a merchant or a mechanic may have to circulate his advertisements and cards? We trust, that upon a review of these circumstances, the presses which have assailed the course of the proprietor of the Mirror, will see reason to revoke their unfriendly judgments.

Autographs and albums.—It is one of the natural penalties of fame and notoriety to be assailed with demands for autographs, or at least with requests to write in albums. The following, as we learn from the Baltimore Post, was written by Daniel Webster in a lady's album on being requested to inscribe his name. It is a little enigmatical:

"That name is blest whose face receives
Its record on these stainless leaves;
But would the owner's name impart.
To write that record on her heart.
The autograph a page would hold
As pure as this, but not so cold."

Sir Richard Phillips claims to be the first collector of autographs, and it is certain that he was early in possession of reams of these precious relics, each arranged by the alphabetical name of the writer. He was so well aware of their value, at a time when they were little thought of by others, that he has been heard to say he would as soon part with a tooth as a letter of Colley Cibber's; and that he expected a grant of land in America for a manuscript of Washington's. William Upcott has been styled the emperor of autographs, and his labours have been executed in a truly imperial style. He has had printed for distribution among his friends and for public bodies, a magnificent catalogue on royal quarto, containing thirty-two thousand items, and he has spared no expense in the binding, or in the portraits, by which they are illustrated. This collection is wholly autograph; but, at the same time, it contains much that is curious and original in antiquity, history, topography, and state affairs.

Mr. Espy, the storm prophet.—On the twenty-first of October, Mr. Espy made an announcement in Philadelphia of a storm, as having then been going on for thirty-six hours in the south-west, although at the time the weather, where Mr. Espy was, was clear and serene. The perfect accuracy of the statement will appear from an extract from a letter dated Wilmington, North Carolina, October twenty-second, which says:—"Our river has been so low for three months past, that nothing could come to market; but for the last four days we have had a continued rain, and our streams are all up." What a walking barometer must Mr. Espy be!

Raphael's fresco paintings.—The pope, says a writer from Rome, has just caused the fresco paintings of Raphael in the Vatican, to be restored. They had not been cleaned since 1703, and were almost entirely concealed from the eye by a thick coating of dust. They have now recovered their original freshness and splendour.

Female school at Rahway.—We learn from the United States Gazette, that the well-known instructress, Mrs. Lincoln Phelps, opened on the sixth of this month an institute for young ladies at Rahway, New-Jersey. We have much confidence in the assurance of a correspondent, who says—"This lady is favourably known to the literary and scientific world by her published works on Female Education, and on various branches of Natural Science, which have earned her a reputation to which few of her sex aspire, while an intimate acquaintance with the discipline and course of study observed in the well-known Troy Seminary, founded by her sister, Mrs. Willard, of which Mrs. Phelps acted as vice-principal during the absence of Mrs. W. in France, will assure the patrons of a raised grade of female education of her capacity and practical ability as a chief instructress. The other ladies to be concerned in the Rahway Institute will bring high endowments, both of mind and character, to sustain their principal in her arduous and responsible undertaking; and parents may rely that daughters educated under the direction of Mrs. Phelps will be mature scholars, and accomplished ladies, imbued with sound moral principles, and well fitted to enter upon the discharge of their duties in life, be that sphere whatsoever their rank or their duty may call them."

Apollo Gallery.—One of the best exhibitions of American paintings ever presented to the public is now open at the Apollo Gallery. It contains some specimens of extraordinary merit. Miller's Rocky Mountain scene, representing an immense assemblage of Indians of the Snake tribe, is truly a remarkable production. Hubert's "King Philip" is also marked by genius of a high order; it is somewhat in the style of Retsch. There is a large landscape, by Doughty, entitled "The Indian Summer," which is extremely beautiful; it has been much praised and admired in London. Cole's "Sunset Scene" is admirable; and there are several little gems by Chapman, executed in a masterly style. The portraits are not, for the most part, remarkable; but there are some exceptions to this remark, to which we shall hereafter allude. Osgood's "Liberation of the Captives," numbered one hundred and thirty, is one of the most beautiful things in the collection; it should be placed in a more favourable light. Mr. Rosseter, a young artist of Troy, has several portraits in the collection, highly creditable to his talents. There are a number of busts in the room, by American artists, worthy of examination. We shall take a less cursory view of this exhibition next week.

Noah Webster.—This veteran in American literature, as has been well remarked, seems to be laying aside his armour, or rather after the manner of the ancient heroes, suspending it in our temples of science. May he long enjoy the green old age in which he at present rests from his labours. He has given to the library of Yale College, his Alma Mater, a number of rare and valuable books, Saxon, Russ, and Ethiopic. He has made a donation of classical and other books to the library of Middlebury College, of which one of his sons-in-law was professor; among these is an elegant edition of Pliny's works, in folio, which belonged to Lord Hardwicke. He has given a number of valuable books to the library of Amherst College in Massachusetts, of which he was one of the founders. He has made a donation of miscellaneous works to the Proprietor's Library in Hartford, the original seat of his ancestors, the first of whom was one of the founders of the colony of Connecticut. These books are now transferred to the library of the Young Men's Institute. He has also made a donation of books to trustees in West Hartford, the place of his nativity, for the purpose of beginning a social library. These are made the basis of such an institution as the donors intended.

Alleghania.—We perceive that a number of respectable journals throughout the country have seconded Washington Irving's proposal that the name of Alleghania should be applied to this country, instead of the clumsy, indefinite, and unmanageable title of "The United States of North America." It is for the poets of the country to effect this reform. Let them branch out as "Alleghanians"—invoke the land of their birth as "Alleghania"—stick to it through thick and thin—and, our word for it, twenty years will not pass before the name will be transferred to our maps and geographies as designatory of the vast extent of territory now embraced within our limits.

The Dead Guest.—We decline the application of J. . . . This powerfully written and intensely interesting story, which has created so great a sensation among the readers of the Mirror, is our exclusive property, and we solemnly protest against its being republished either in the form of a volume, or transferred from these columns, without due acknowledgment. If Mr. J. has a desire to publish the tale, let him translate it, as we have done, and not endeavour to avail himself of literary wares, which should be held more sacred from the circumstance, that we did not consider it necessary to secure a copyright in the first instance.

Paul Pry.—We inadvertently omitted to give credit to an article which we copied, some weeks since, from this clever little weekly sheet. It was entitled, if we remember aright, "Manufacture of a modern melodrama," and we cheerfully take occasion to make amends for our neglect, as well as to commend to the public the by no means intrusive "sayings and doings" of Paul Pry. Mr. Corbin is the highly competent editor, and we wish him ample success.

Female kindness.—Ledyard, the traveller, gave it as his opinion, that women are ever kind, whether in the most enlightened or the most savage condition. Mr. Matthew, a clergyman sent out to Terra del Fuego, by the English Church Missionary Society, for the purpose of endeavouring to convert the natives to christianity, has borne additional testimony to the kindness of the female heart.

THE VETERAN.

A BALLAD—THE POETRY BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY—THE MUSIC BY JOSEPH PHILIP KNIGHT.

RATHER SLOW, BUT WITH EXPRESSION.

It was a Sab-bath morn, The bell had chim'd for church, And the young and gay were ga-ther-ing A-round the rus-tic porch, There an a-ged man, In a sol-dier's garb was he, And gaz-ing the group, he cried, "Do none re-mem-ber me?"

SECOND VERSE.

The veteran forgot
His friends were changed or gone;
The many forms around him there,
As children he had known;
He pointed to the spot
Where his dwelling used to be,
Then told his name, and smiling said,
"You now remember me?"

THIRD VERSE.

Alas! none knew him there!
He pointed to a stone,
On which the name he breathed was traced,
A name to them unknown;
And then the old man wept.
"I am friendless now," cried he;
"Where I had many friends in youth,
Not one remembers me!"

MISCELLANY.

LET SMILES AND BRIGHT EYES BEAM ON ME.

Let smiles and bright eyes beam on me,
To glad my fleeting hours;
I love thee as a honey-bee
Loves the bright, blushing flowers.
Nay, let no pouting curl thy lip,
No tear-drops dim thine eyes;
But from the morn of life we'll sip
Joy's sun-beams as they rise.

This world would be a mournful one,
If doubts, and fears, and sighs
Were giving us their lingering tone
To cloud our starry skies.
So smile, dear girl, and let us say,
When time has cul'd the flowers,
Our life was as a summer's day,
Pass'd with the laughing hours.

J. ST. H. M.

A MARRIAGE AT FIRST SIGHT.—The Milledgeville Journal states that a marriage took place recently in that city, under the following circumstances:—"A lady from an adjoining county made her appearance in the morning in our city, for the purpose of selling chickens, butter, and eggs, when she was accosted by a jolly swain, brim-full of love, with the pleasing interrogatory—"Dear madam, will you marry me?" Astonished, but not displeased, the fair lady blushing answered in the affirmative. A license was immediately procured, a parson or justice employed, and the happy couple were buckled to each other for life."

POOR DELIVERY.—A waggish fellow, somewhat troubled with an impediment in his speech, whose quips and quibbles have been heard and relished by many of us, while one day sitting at a public table, had occasion to use a pepper-box. After shaking it with all due vehemence, and turning it in various ways, he found that the crushed peppercorns were in nowise inclined to come forth. "T-t-th-this p-pe-pepper-box," he exclaimed with a facetious grin, "is so some-something li-ike myself." "Why so?" interrogated a neighbour. "P-poor-poor delivery," was the reply.

A MELANCHOLY FACT.—"The Canons of Good Breeding" says: "To get money from a man who owes you and won't pay it, is a nice matter, and certainly a very important one." A melancholy fact, certainly, as we all know.

SHAM DEAFNESS.—A marine, while serving on board a ship of war, complained from time to time to the surgeon that he was gradually losing the sense of hearing, and at the end of several months asserted that he was completely deaf. It being, however, presumed that the alleged infirmity was feigned, and as he could not be made to perform his duty, he was brought to the gangway and flogged; but previously to his being paraded for punishment, and during its infliction, he was informed that he should be pardoned if he would admit the fraud and return to his duty. Every means that promised to be successful in surprising him into showing that he possessed the sense of hearing, was resorted to, but without success, firing a pistol close to his ear, suddenly rousing him during sleep, and endeavouring to alarm him, elicited nothing satisfactory. The officers at Haslar-hospital, to which he had been sent, resolved to punish him a second time. Dr. Lind, who was then physician to the hospital, begged that punishment might be deferred, with the view of gaining time to try by another experiment whether the man was an impostor or not. His request was granted. The doctor chose a favourable opportunity, and coming unperceived behind him, one day, he put his hand on the man's shoulder, and said, in an ordinary tone of voice: "I am happy to tell you that you are invalided at last." "Am I?" replied the overjoyed marine. The imposture being thus rendered evident, he was forthwith punished and sent on board ship.

KILL OR CURE.—A doctor was employed by a poor man to attend his wife, who was dangerously ill. The doctor gave a hint that he had fears of not being paid. "I have five pounds," said the man to the doctor, "and if you kill or cure, you shall have them." The woman died in the doctor's hand, and after a reasonable time he called for his five pounds. The man asked the doctor if he killed his wife! "No." "Did you cure?" "No." "Then," said the poor man, "you have no legal demand."

SINGULAR PROBLEM.—There was a singular problem among the Stoics, which ran to this purpose: "When a man says, 'I lie, does he lie, or does he not? If he lies, he speaks the truth; if he speaks the truth, he lies.'" Many were the books written upon this wonderful problem. Chrysippus favoured the world with no less than six; and Philetus studied himself to death in his vain endeavours to solve it.

A WATER SPANIEL.—A young gentleman near Manchester having a fine water spaniel, in order to exhibit his prowess to some sportsmen, threw a stone into a pond; the dog plunged in after it, and brought up a green bag containing a fine violin and bow. An Irishman cried out, "throw another stone; who knows but that the dog may bring up the fiddler himself! and then we can have a jig on the spot."

NAME FOR THE OCEAN.—Scaliger said that he once heard a man who saw the ocean for the first time, pronounce it "a pretty thing."

PAUL DE KOCK.—A new novel by Paul de Kock creates a more powerful sensation than the speech of the king himself; and, on the day of publication, not a diligence, not a mail, not a public conveyance leaves the French metropolis without bearing to the country librarians of all parts a package of the anxiously-awaited volumes. There is not a circulating library throughout France that does not possess one or more complete sets of his works; there is not a news-room where, among the few dozens of standard books which grace the little shelf in the corner, the novels of Paul de Kock are not to be found. His popularity extends to the meanest and most distant cottage in the empire; there exists not a labourer who tills the land, in the remotest province, that has not heard of Paul de Kock, and laughed at the village pedant's recital of the best episode in his last work. Mount the imperial of the diligence, and the conductor will talk to you of Paul de Kock. Converse with the filles des comptoirs in a café, and she will ask you to lend her his lately-published novel. Hire a cabriolet de place, and the driver will tell you that he has just perused Paul de Kock's new work. Chatter with your porter's wife when she brings you your newspaper in the morning, and she will call your attention to the critique of Paul de Kock's book in the Feuilleton. Speak to your cook relative to your dinner having been late the day before, and she will throw the blame on Paul de Kock. Ask your friend why he broke his appointment, and the reply will be the same. In fine, M. Charles Paul de Kock engrosses public attention as much as the prices of the funds, the measures of the ministers, or the war in Spain. He is a "Monsieur Tonson," whose existence is interminable.

STREAM COMMUNICATION.—The extraordinary fact was happily commented on by Governor Everett, in his speech at the opening of the Boston and Springfield Railroad, that when the line of steamers shall be established between Boston and Liverpool, there will be a continuous length of artificial communication, almost wholly by steam, from the western shores of Lake Michigan to the eastern coasts of British India—a distance of one hundred and sixty degrees of longitude, including very nearly half the circuit of the globe, and the whole of its civilized portion.

WIVES IN ENGLAND.—A man was placed at the bar of the police office in Glasgow, a short time since, on a charge of striking a lady with a stick on the head, and damaging her bonnet. The prisoner pleaded in excuse that he thought it was his own wife whom he had struck. The prosecutor said she would be satisfied if the damage to her bonnet was made good, but the case was delayed for further consideration.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, near the corner of Broadway. Terms, FIVE DOLLARS per annum, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

George P. Scott, Printer, corner of Gold and John-streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with Accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR. SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NO. 1 BARGLAY-STREET, NEAR BROADWAY. [PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.]

VOLUME SEVENTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1839.

NUMBER TWENTY-TWO.

ORIGINAL SPORTING SKETCHES.

HARKAWAY.

The following humorous sketch will be relished particularly by the lovers of the turf, and, at the same time, be very acceptable to the general reader. It is from the pen of Mr. Mills, the author of "The Queen's Stag-hounds," "The Favourite Maid of Honour," and other light and amusing papers, which have been communicated to the Mirror, and extensively copied, not only in this country but in Great Britain. "The Exquisite at Cover" is extracted from a work now in preparation, called "Harkaway, or Brushes of the Flood and Field," which we feel confident will be exceedingly popular with the admirers of the chase, and with the public at large.

THE EXQUISITE AT COVER.

Huntsman, bring
Thy eager pack, and trail him to his couch.
Hark! the loud real cry, the clamorous joy,
The gallant chiding, lead the trembling air."

"Hark in, hark in!" shouted the huntsman, as the eager pack rushed into a promising, thick-set cover.

"Gracious me! what exceeding hensem animals, to be sure," exclaimed a perfect young-lady cavalier, looking at the hounds through a suspended eye-glass. "I had no idea the thing was half so picturesque."

"Now, ev, foxes have ears, recollect," remarked the huntsman in a reproving voice.

"Is it possible? I never saw a specimen; but still—" "I wish you would be still, sir. How the dense can a 'warmint' break with your clapper ringing like any old woman's!"

The highly indignant huntsman was regarded with a profound stare of astonishment from the glass of the hero, Mr. Charles Olivier. He had not the slightest conception that breathing the lowest whisper was contrary to the strict rules of hunting when the hounds were in cover—that a sneeze was unpardonable, and that a cough at once men-ed choking. Mr. Olivier wondered what on earth he had done to excite the portrayed anger of the huntsman. "Gracious me! what did I say to excite that horrid vandal?" mentally asked Mr. Olivier, and he was screwing up his lips to whistle an opera tune, when a musical cry from a hound, ringing through the wood, announced that sly Reynard was a-foot.

"Hark to Rattle—hark to Ringwood, Fearless, Warbler—hark to Warbler!" hallooed the huntsman, as one after the other joined, better-skelter, in the music of the chase. The impatient sportsmen, with palpitating hearts, surrounded the cover, holding tightened reins upon their ardent horses. All were watching for the glorious "break," with "Tally-ho!" ready to burst from every longing tongue. The horses, with pricked ears and glaring eye-balls, pawed the ground and champed their bits with anticipation of delight.

The personification of tailors', hatters', and perfumers' advertisements, Mr. Charles Olivier, seeing his friend Colonel Scourfield within a few yards, castier his graceful gallantry towards him.

"Ah! my dear colonel, how de doo!" inquired Mr. Olivier, checking his smiling bag. "I never saw this animal called a fox. By what means shall I be enabled to distinguish it?"

"By his brush," briefly responded the colonel, with a smile. "Brush!" pray what is a brush?"

"A tail, my dear fellow—a tail, resembling your well-trimmed whiskers round a broom-handle."

"How very odd!"

"You cannot mistake him; but surely you have no intention of following the hunt in that gear!" said the colonel, laughing.

"Gracious! No. The truth is, I was obliged to say last night that I had never seen a thing of this kind. It appeared Goth-like, and so I determined to venture this morning, and examine what is called, I believe, the throw-off; but I've no intention of being thrown off. Dear me! No. I abominate danger in all shapes," replied Mr. Olivier, elegantly kissing his white glove to his friend, and cantering away. He had proceeded but a few yards, when he returned, and said: "If I should see the animal, what shall I say, colonel?"

"Not a word, if in cover."

"And if the creature comes out?"

"Halloo 'Tally-ho,' as loud as you can," replied the colonel, turning his horse's head away from Mr. Olivier, leaving him alone to ponder upon his instructed duties.

The dress of Mr. Olivier had anything but the appearance of a fox-hunter's; a superfluous black coat and prunella pumps not being generally donned for the casualties of the dashing chase. His steed was slight-limbed, showy, and high-spirited, but suited only to carry a lady—or Mr. Charles Olivier, who was unaccustomed to flying gates, or scrambles through prickly hedges.

The hounds continued to drive the fox from one corner of the cover to the other, without effecting the desired exit. Reynard had no inclination to quit his quarters, although his enemies were in such unenviable proximity. Every now and then he would come to the verge of the wood and take a survey; but, disliking the appearance of the surrounding pink coats, in he popped again; much to the annoyance of many who flattered themselves that now "break" he must, and the view halloo ready to escape died into a grumble of suppressed disappointment.

Every hound now pressed close to the fox, and it was certain that out he must come, or submit to the degrading fate of being "chopped"—killed upon his own hearth, without a meritorious struggle for life.

"Tilly-hoo-o-o-o, Tilly-hoo-o-o-o-o-o!" to the astonishment of all, came evidently for a broad "Tally-ho!" from some novice with the view halloo.

"For'ard, for'ard, for'ard!" shouted the huntsman, galloping towards the spot, with a few of the hounds, from whence the sound came.

"Come away, come away!" bawled the whipper-in, cracking his whip for the remainder to leave the cover and join the huntsman.

The horn winded a cheering "Hark-forward!"—horses reared and danced with delight. "Hold hard," everybody said—"Let them get at it."

"Now for luck, and no checks," said one.

"He'll go for Sydenham cariss," said another.

"Not he. The wind's wrong," suggested a third.

"A cool hundred that he makes for Ealing," a fourth offered to bet.

The huntsman arrived at the place where "Tilly-hoo-o-o" proceeded from, and there sat Mr. Charles Olivier, perseveringly chanting "Tilly-hoo." An observation about "a post sometimes points out the road," undoubtedly came from the lips of the old huntsman as he saw the source from whence it came. Rising in his stirrups, he took off his cap and cheered the hounds to pick up the scent.

Wagging their tails, they snuffed the earth with distended nostrils, but no response was given. They ran to and fro, each endeavouring "to snatch the track, and lead the willing pack," but all to no purpose.

"Where did he break, sir?" inquired the huntsman, puzzled by the hounds being at fault.

"Gracious me! Close where you stand, the animal jumped out," replied Mr. Charles Olivier, with a confidential air.

Again the hounds were tried, but in vain. No scent could be found.

"It's very astonishing," soliloquized Mr. Olivier.

"No fox has been here, I'll swear!" said the huntsman in a voice of unqualified rage.

"My good fellow, I must request you not to impeach my veracity," replied Mr. Charles Olivier indignantly.

"There's no hound in the pack of that name," said the huntsman, purposely miscomprehending the observation.

"Point out the exact spot, Olivier," said Colonel Scourfield.

"Gracious me! Why there the creature is now."

"Where—where—where?" was shouted in every direction.

Mr. Charles Olivier placed his glass quietly to his right eye, and pointing to the topmost branch of a lofty elm, said:

"There it is—I knew him by his tail."

Who shall describe the horror, the astonishment, and disgust of all, upon obeying the direction of the pointed finger, at seeing a squirrel, with his bushy tail curled over his head, peeping at the scene below with indubitable pleasure "at being above all danger."

Laughs, groans, and hisses proceeded from every quarter. Mr. Charles Olivier began to suspect that he had committed some mistake; but, conceiving it politic to appear cool and collected under any accidents, or awkwardness, he, with admirable sang froid, continued to look at the "animal," and occasionally observe that he "recognised him by his tail."

"Go home and shave young poodles," said the old huntsman, compelled to give vent to his wrath.

"I'd be glad to know whether your ma knows ye're out?" inquired the whipper-in, with a laugh which caused a decided sensation in the nervous system of Mr. Olivier.

"Flog him off!" "Duck him in a horse-pond!" "Go home!" "Get your nurse to come with you next time!" Such were the various little pleasant suggestions from this enraged sportsman, at being subjected to the grievous disappointment occasioned by Mr. Charles Olivier's ignorance of natural history.

With fears, which were very excusable under the circumstances, the mistaken innocent felt that he was one too many. In carrying a goose the ill-shaped bird had glided into the lap of the fairest creature in the world, Mr. Charles Olivier could have imitated that refined personage who said, upon an occasion of the kind, "Madam, I'll trouble you for that goose." He could even have added: "Pray don't apologise; such trifles will occur." However collected he would have been under such a trying ordeal, Mr. Olivier could not appear so comfortable under the present. "Flogging!"

and "horse-pond" possessed so much of the nerve-agitating system, that, with chattering teeth, he looked beseechingly and requested "to be heard."

"Hear him, hear him," cried the majority, laughing. "No, no. Duck him—duck him!" shouted others, among whom the huntsman's voice was the loudest.

As the reporters say, after a noisy squabble in the house, "order was restored," and Mr. Olivier thus commenced:

"Gentlemen, I certainly have mistaken an ennel, which I learn to be a squirrel, for a fox."

Rears of laughter.

"I confess my error."

Cries of "No you don't."

"Gentlemen, upon my honour I do," replied the speaker, placing his hand upon his heart.

"A voice shouted 'Tilly-hoo.'"

"I asked my friend, Colonel Scourfield, how I should know the fox—that is, by what feature? and he said—"

"What did I say?" sharply interrupted his friend, disliking the appeal.

"By his tail, my dear colonel, you certainly said," replied Mr. Olivier with praiseworthy decision.

Bursts of laughter.

"As if a fox had a tail," said the old huntsman.

"I presume, by that observation, that the animal is without a tail. That is no fault of mine. I was informed by the colonel that the creature had a brush—"

The huntsman cried: "So he has."

"That the brush expressed tail—"

Cries of "Monkeys have tails; so have puppies; unfurl your own."

"I shall not notice the last observations, however personal their allusion," continued the self-vindicator. "The colonel also stated that I could not but know the animal, although I informed him that I had no idea of the creature's form; for his brush or tail, which appear to be synonymous, bore a strong resemblance to one's whiskers round a broom-handle—"

Rears of continued laughter.

"Now, gentlemen, you must admit a strong resemblance exists between that little creature's bushy tail and my whiskers, both in shape and colour," said Mr. Charles Olivier with a triumphant smile, pointing to the exalted squirrel.

After loud mirth for some minutes, it was unanimously decided that the speaker had satisfactorily justified himself. The sportsmen good-humouredly shook Mr. Olivier by the hand, rather too roughly, perhaps, for his delicate fingers, and some said with courtesy that they'd "hack him against the parson for an argument."

"Try-back, try-back," hallooed the huntsman, and away the hounds went to pick up the lost scent. "Hark back, Musical—hark back, I tell ye!"—off galloped the old favourite leader to obey the mandate. In a few moments "Tally-ho" rang from a corner of the cover, from which burst a splendid fox, closely followed by the crying Musical.

"For'ard, hark for'ard—hark to Musical!" shouted the huntsman. The horn was blown; the whipper-in hurried on with the tail hounds, and, in an instant, on rushed the pursuing and pursued—the many for sport, the one for life.

"Gracious me! Be quiet," said Mr. Charles Olivier to his courier as the animal caught some of the enthusiasm of the sport. "Heavens, don't! I certainly—shall—not be able to hold him." Our hero was correct in this opinion; for his horse pulled upon his hands, unused to exertion, go violently that, after a few useless struggles, he followed his own inclination by galloping after the others, to the great discomfiture of his rider.

"What shall I do—what shall I do? He surely will not attempt to leap that wall!" exclaimed Charles Olivier as they neared one of tolerable altitude. Still the resolute horse approached it with a determined manner. "Heavens! I certainly shall be off!" said the rider, clinging to the pommel of the saddle with pertinacity; "I certainly shall." They were within a few strides of the wall, when the horse's ideas corresponded with his master's, that he should not attempt it. Throwing himself suddenly upon his hocks, the careful animal succeeded in preventing any accident to himself by stopping on the right side of the barrier. This quick decision, however, did not hinder Mr. Charles Olivier from enjoying a leap. The impetus had the effect of sending him in a straight line over the horse's ears—clean over the wall, like the stick of a rocket, head-foremost into a duck-pond on the opposite side.

Crash, splash went the luckless horseman—Quack, quack, quack screamed the ducks. "Gracious me!" bubbled from the lips of Mr. Charles Olivier, as he crawled from the water and the mire—

"I—I—I never will see another fox-hunt as long as I breathe."

We have reason to believe that our "Exquisite at Cover" sincerely meant what he said, and as religiously kept his resolution.

No more with him did hound or horse display,
Rejoicing, at the loud, bold "Harkaway."

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

THE GREEK MAIDEN.

At the commencement of the massacre upon the island of Scio, Ellen, a beautiful girl of Callamassia, (town in Scio,) fled with her father's family to the mountains, where they lay concealed beneath a rock surrounded with shrubbery. They supported themselves with grass and snails, which they collected by night. After two weeks, their confinement and spare diet began to prey upon their health. They at length ventured to go abroad and procure more substantial nourishment. They had not proceeded far before they were surprised by a party of Turks in ambush. The father and mother of Ellen were immediately killed in her arms. She and her sister were spared for their beauty; but as the hostile band was too numerous, they could not agree to whose lot the captives should fall. Her sister was cut in pieces, but Ellen herself was retained alive by the Bouloukbas or chieftain, who gave to each of his men two dollars to prevent further disturbance.

Ellen was led by the Bouloukbas to a konak in the city of Scio, where she was obliged to perform the duties of a slave. Her master was so brutal that she mediated a scheme to regain her freedom. One night she left his residence and fled to the English consulate, the doors of which were closed. Not succeeding in gaining admittance, she climbed into one of the orange trees in the garden and remained there till morning; when the Bouloukbas, her master, summoned his gang and started in pursuit of her. He came to the English consul and asked permission to search his garden for a fugitive. The request was granted. He soon discovered Ellen and compelled her to descend to the ground. He then seized her by her beautiful long dark hair, and dragged her around the garden. The consul had power to prevent this disgraceful proceeding, had he listened to the voice of injured innocence. But he allowed the Turk to drag her away, as she cried, "Oh God, is there no man on earth to pity us!" Those words made a strong impression upon the mind and heart of an English officer, who was present. He determined immediately to purchase her.

He proceeded to the konak of the Bouloukbas, and offered two thousand piastres for the Greek captive; but the master declined parting with her for any sum whatever, and declared that she should always live with him. Ernest, so the Englishman was called, went away deeply wounded in his feelings and began to imagine some method to obtain possession of the beauty. At last he determined to make one final effort to obtain the object of his wishes. He called upon the Bouloukbas, and increased his offer to five thousand piastres.

The Turk, observing his love for Ellen, was flattered with a prospect of a still greater sum, and ordered her to present herself to the sight of her lover. Ernest knew Greek, and immediately asked her if she was willing to accept a plan of escape to unite herself with him for life. Ellen replied that she hoped he would for mercy's sake spare no effort to liberate her. At the same time it was agreed between them that they should leave the island that very night. Ernest promised to send her a man's dress, that she might assume it to avoid the suspicion of the watch. The Turk, who did not understand the import of the conversation, was still obstinate in his refusal to part with her, and Ernest, who understood sufficiently well the Turkish language, promised to come again and make some proposal which he hoped would not be resisted by her unfeeling owner.

They separated; and Ernest rejoiced in the hope of possessing one of the fairest of the fair. He bribed the servant of the Bouloukbas, and by him forwarded to Ellen the disguise which had been proposed. At midnight he appeared under her window, and clasping her in his arms placed her upon the ground. They then fled to the sea-shore, where they entered a boat which conducted them beyond the reach of the Turks as far as Cerigo. I have not heard where they went afterwards.

FACTS AND FICTIONS.

A CHAPTER ON ELOPEMENTS.

MISCHIEVOUS entertainments are like made dishes. They delight not so much on account of their own merits, but of their concomitant savories. This is much the case with elopements, for an elopement per se (we beg at once to inform our readers that we are not adopting in the romantic composing of instructing young ladies in the art of descending rope-ladders,) is, we should imagine, a matter of rather a disagreeable nature, seeing that the success of its object depends so much upon a score of perilous uncertainties over which the principles can have but very little control. These consist in the greater or less amount of moral energy in the postboys, in the position of strength and speed, which characterize the legs of the horses, in the tact and fidelity of the novel-reading lady's maid, in the height of the window from which the indiscreet fair one has to descend, in the number of pieces of wine bottles in the garden wall which she has to surmount, in the nature of the road and the distance to be travelled, in the watchfulness and activity of the guardian or father and his domestics, in the amount of money contained in the purse in the gentleman's pocket, and a thousand other things which are considerably too numerous to mention for several reasons, to which it would occupy too much valuable space to allude.

There are some kinds of elopements upon the subject of which it would be extremely unbecoming in us, and we are by no means inclined, to allude in the present paper, which deals with things not pleasurable only. Other kinds of amatory runnings away from savage and afflicted parents are characterised by a great deal of what is classical as well as romantic, and gratifying as well as fac-tious. Imagine, for example, an old grasping guardian with a young, very innocent, and very beautiful ward—a guardian and ward, indeed, in such as are part and parcel of the stock in hand of farce writers, and are generally uncle and niece—the lady has a great deal of money, a fact, the pleasing nature of which the guardian fully appreciates, and the more especially because his own finances are considerably less extensive than his mistress's. The lady, however, man resolves upon saving the young lady—not to the abominable captain of the light dragoons, (whose recommendations, in the eyes of the guardian, are really quite offensive,) but to himself. What a change comes over the person, as well as the spirit, of the old gentleman. How he is quite as much another individual as, continuing to be the same one, he possibly can be. How improved is he about his neckcloth, what a decided change for the better has taken place as far as regards his knee-buckles, and how impossible is it not to observe, with a feeling of mingled satisfaction and surprise, that his shoes are not now so much too large for his feet as they generally have been, and that several muscles have suddenly burst forth about the region of his silk stockinged calves. All the old gentleman's efforts tend to the attainment of the now one great object of his existence. His love for the money which he has got is diminished by his burning desire to acquire more. His determination to succeed and his vanity assist to make him believe that it is quite without the bounds of possibility that he can do anything but succeed. Six months of what he imagines to be his "love making" perfect, his faith in the not to be resisted charms of his pleadings, his asseverations, etc., and the idea that it is barely possible that somebody else may after all be the young lady's husband never, of course, enters his head. The fatal evening approaches, however. 'Tis October, and about eight o'clock, p. m. The weather is most propitious, the fidelity of the lady's maid put beyond a doubt. In the lane, at the most retired side of the old gentleman's garden, there is a postchaise superintended by a post-boy of the highest integrity, and whose fidelity to any gentleman who would pay him handsomely to run away with any young lady, has been upon more than one occasion satisfactorily tested. A yard of bottle-glass has been removed from that portion of the wall over which has been arranged the young lady should climb. In the room on the first floor (the lady's chamber happens, luckily, to be in no more elevated situation) is the lady's maid, cheering her mistress with ungrammatical eloquence, and holding some strong salts to her nose, for now that the time has arrived her mistress gives symptoms of a very decided intention of fainting. The old gentleman is tapping in the dining-room after his dinner, and the abominable captain of light dragoons is standing outside in the garden, just beneath the fair one's window, of which he is momentarily anticipating the opening, and the subsequent appearance at it of his beloved, her maid, and the rope-ladder. The dreams of the sleeping guardian are totally unconnected with the important situation of affairs. The lover gently clasps his hands together. The saff of the window is thrown down—the maid appears—there are nods several times, smiling at the same time in such a manner as to assure her employer that things are as they should be. In another second the lady appears herself. She is considerably agitated. The captain stands on his toes as long as he possibly can, and kisses his hand with astonishing vigour, partly because his love urges him to do so, and partly because he desires thereby to strengthen the lady's resolution to make him forthwith decidedly the happiest of mortals. By signs he intimates the necessity there is that no time should be lost; by signs he inquires if there by anything to which he can apply his energies to make her mind more easy; by signs she replies that her mind, like the parcels in the postchaise, is quite made up. The ladder is thrown down—the lady is at the bottom—the lady descends in a twinkling the lady's maid in another twinkling—and before any one has had afforded him a sufficient period of time to make an exclamation of the name of Mr. John Robinson, the strawberry berries (the lady's maid running behind) to that part of the wall which has been made so inconvenient to surmount by the removal of the bits of bottle-glass. The prompt post-boy throws down other rope-ladder over the wall from the other side of it. The anxious parties are soon in the lane. "Now then, Tom," cries the lover, as, having placed his mistress and her maid into the coach, he is about to enter it himself—"now then, Tom, ride for your life." Tom jumps upon his horse with a Drocwoc facility, and in two hours' time the couple are about twenty miles from the dining-room of the guardian, who has just at that time awakened from his nap, and from his dreams of the ten thousand a year and the wife forty years younger than himself.

Oh! the vicissitudes of human life! Now, there is no drawback to the pleasure afforded us by the contemplation of elopements of this sort. They are of the most ancient kind of elopements, perhaps, in existence; the gods and goddesses of the heathen mythology and the fairies were frequently exhibited in the habit of indulging in them, and frequently exhibited in them considerable taste and decision, and what would now be called "a little knowledge of the world." The whole affair, whither, from beginning to end, is exceedingly moral, seeing that the guardian is old and worldly, (at least nine guardians out of every ten are so,) that the lady, by her youth and this fact of her affection being given to another, is wholly unfit to be the bride of her Corberus, and that the captain is a fine young, handsome, noble-spirited fellow, (at least nine captains of light dragoons out of every ten are so,) "cut out" in every respect to be the lady's partner for life, if only for the simple reason that the affection is mutual. No doubt there are some other kinds of elopements which, when we hear of them, exceedingly excite our laughter for the time being, but which it is quite impossible to look upon otherwise than as rather improper, to use a mild word. Elderly and old maiden ladies, with property in the funds, very frequently play the parts of prime donne in these little amatory ballets. The gentleman is generally a mere worthless adventurer, whom it would be a great pleasure to see not succeed on all occasions; while the lady is, in most cases, a kind of old soul, whom it would be a delight to have for one's mother, and for whose disappointments we accordingly feel a sort of filial regret. Old maiden ladies are the last persons in the world whom any one can be like to see hurt or imposed upon. The situation is one of pathetic unity; they are little lone islands, as it were, beside the great continent of the mass of their fellow-creatures. Generally speaking, they are old maids only because they have been faithful for years to the beloved of their earlier days, who has died or proved false, but whom, whether he behaved ill to them or not, each of them chooses to love, with memory-wedding truth, until the hour of her death. But we must have another paper on this subject.—Court Journal.

TWICKENHAM NEW TOWN AND POPE'S VILLA.

The dowager queen having taken up her residence at Bushy, has rendered Twickenham more popular than it has been for some years, although it has generally been a favourite, and always celebrated as a healthy village. On late occasions, however, it has been unoccupied; but since her majesty queen Adelaide has resided in the neighbourhood, there has been a demand for houses of the better description, and at present there is not a good tenable house to let. During Sir Wathan Waller's residence at Pope's Villa, and while the baroness Howe was living, no expense was spared to render that magnificent seat worthy of its owner; and such was the spirit which actuated Sir Wathan, that he thought nothing of purchasing a seat in his neighbourhood, to demolish the house, that he might appropriate the land and render the estate more complete. Since the demise of the baroness Howe, this estate has changed hands, and the policy of the present owner is quite the reverse of that which guided his predecessor. A portion of the land is now on let or sale for the purposes of building; and there is no doubt but the persons who are first in the field, with good, convenient, and tasty houses, will find ready occupants. There has been a subscription for the building of a new church, to which the duke of Northumberland, Mr. Pownall, Archdeacon Cambridge, Mr. Twining, and Mr. Clay, have each contributed five hundred pounds. At present, almost without solicitation, it amounts to more than four thousand pounds. The ground selected and purchased for the church is a part of the Pope's Villa estate, opposite the village green on the high road to Hampton; and the ground for building in the vicinity has been sold at prices varying from three hundred to four hundred pounds per acre. It will be called the new town, and it is proposed that two crescents opposite the green, shall be built, and called Adelaide Crescent and William Crescent. In the road leading to Bushy, always exceedingly narrow and inconvenient, overhung with trees, and cooped in with high walls, a vast improvement is in progress. The wall opposite Pope's Villa has been thrown down for the purpose of widening the road. A new private road to Twickenham Common has been commenced, for the purpose of building half a dozen or more residences. It is proposed to divide Pope's Villa into four houses; the chief division is the original mansion before any additions were made; but it is to be regretted that a domain, such as it now exists, should not be taken by some wealthy person, for it has always been considered unique, and now that the approach will be improved, and the opposite point is to be opened up and rendered an agreeable entrance to a wide and picturesque road, it is worthy of being made the residence of a prince. A vast improvement to the neighbourhood is contemplated in the conversion of a foot-path which leads to Teddington into a carriage-road, and thus shortening the distance for vehicles of all sorts very considerably. The increase of the facilities for travelling adds greatly to the temptations to locate in so delightful a spot, and it will not be long ere Twickenham surpasses Richmond in popularity as a fashionable place of residence.—Court Gazette.

THE AUTUMNAL SEASON.

The "melancholy days of autumn, the saddest of the year," and some will say the sweetest, have come at last, and now grief has been the space since the bright festival of spring time, when frost, tempest, and desolation were all forgotten amidst the song of birds in their green bowers of bliss: the sounds of the bubbling fountain and gushing stream: when nature threw off her frozen mantle, and resumed their kindest inspirations, changing the earth from "gloom to glory." It was but as yesterday that summer beamed upon us with its sunshine, unvarying heat, and the insect's evening hymn. Yet summer's done! the leaf turns pale, trembles, dies; the groves are deserted; the tenants have departed to a more congenial climate; the last sheaf is gathered in, and the cold harvest moon is pale and wan. The moss-cup, the tulip, the whole beauteous sisterhood of flowers, have been hung withering on autumn's shrine. There is something sad in the reflection that earth's loveliest things must fade; that there is nought too beautiful to escape the unsparring hand of time; that the fair buds which have opened their folded leaves to the sunbeam, should wither, decay and die; and the earth, so lately clothed with fertility and fragrance should become "barren, and desolate." But there is a sunlight amid these deepening shadows. A spirit of beauty pours its light upon the autumn woods, deep, varied, and magnificent, as if they had borrowed the summer's rainbow for a covering. The silvery garniture of the heavens is seen stretched far away into the dim hazy distance. The bill sides are clad in a habit of crimson and gold. The hoary forest, in their autumnal beauty, present a spectacle, compared with which the verdant plains are dull and comfortless. And then the going down of the sun, the intermingling of the beauty of earth with the glory of the heavens, like the images in a poet's dream. Sinking slowly from our sight, he changes the wreaths of vapour from glory to glory, into the same image, imbuing them with his own poorest magnificence, and creating a fit pavilion for the king of day. There is a moral in the falling leaf and perishing blossom. When all things are dying around us, we are admonished that change and decay come alike to all; that the chill hoar frost cuts down the tenderest plant and the noxious weed. As the dead smelt upon the hand, and memory calls up the thronging images of the past; as the eye wanders around the friendly circle, and finds it narrowed since the last vernal season, a strange feeling of insecurity comes over us. We know that in a few years, or days, perhaps, the falling leaves will rustle about our resting-place. May we be enabled, by a holy faith, to look forward to an immortal spring-time.

APPROPOS OF THE BATTLE OF LAKE ERIB.—We once heard an "old salt" who, if we remember rightly, was in the engagement, describe the subsequent scene on board the brave Perry's vessel. One poor fellow was sent below to the surgeon, with his right arm dangling like an empty coat-sleeve at his side. It had been shattered near the shoulder, and amputation was pronounced unavoidable. He bore the painful operation without a groan or a murmur, although "cold drops of sweat stood on his trembling flesh." An hour or two after his arm was amputated, he called the surgeon to his bedside, and said, "I should like to see my arm, if you have no objection." "None in the world," replied the surgeon, "if you desire it." The amputated limb was brought, and poor Jack, pressing the cold hand, which had forgot its cunning, in his left, he exclaimed, with tears in his eyes: "Farewell, messmate! you and I have weathered many a tough gale together, and now we must part. You have been a good friend to me; I shall never find such another."

THE OLD DRAWING-MASTER.

"Ah! bah! Mademoiselle, and you call that a couple! a couple of dis outline! Regardez dis line dat ought to be straight, he is crookt—dis line dat ought to be what you call curve, he is straight—dis foreground is light, and de background dark! Mon Dieu! Mademoiselle! vat is it that you tink of, ven you draw?"

Monsieur La Trobe was certainly very impatient; cross I called him then; but now, when I recollect him through the softening mist of years, and remember the provocation! so frequently given to the good old gentleman, I can only call him impatient. He had visited England long before I was born—an emigrant; and having settled, after the lapse of a few years, in our neighbourhood, felt it as a state on his professional character, that a child he had known from the time she was able to destroy a pencil, should pervert the crooked to the straight, and the straight to the crooked. "Dere!" he would exclaim; "you can copie ver well de Irish women, vid dere childa on dere backs, and dere pigs—and boats and ships—vy you not de landscapes! vy you not copie me?"

Dere Monsieur La Trobe! I could imitate them, but not him: yet I was doomed to try an hour and a half per diem by the great hall clock—simply, because Monsieur La Trobe professed to teach only this branch of art; and because all the paps and mammas in only this neighbourhood thought it their duty to make their children copy M. La Trobe's landscapes—I say M. La Trobe's landscapes, for nature had little or nothing to do with them. But the old drawing-master was a picture himself—no earthly consideration would have induced him to wear a round hat—his three-cornered one, banded with neat gold lace, was decorously placed over his white and wavy powdered hair; his coat was an unchanging record of the fashions of 1789—brown, a deep brown; his waistcoat was brown satin; but on Sunday, and when doing out, he wore one of rich embroidery—the flaps descending nearly to his knees, and his stockings were, on state occasions, of black silk, and his high-fronted shoes accorded with his quaint style, which no one seemed to consider strange, the old drawing-master had never worn any other—but as the clock ticked, it may be, a large and sudden tear, called forth by the mention of Queen Marie Antoinette, or a subject of still deeper interest, could dim the lustre of his keen, piercing, blue eyes; they were very bright, almost dazzling, flashing and sparkling beneath his white eyebrows—about eyes they were, whose expression you were never sure of. Imagine the high wrinkled features—the cocked hat, and ebony cane, and a large snuff-box, with a fine miniature of the fair, but hapless sovereign of France on the lid, which he generally carried in his hand—and you will believe that Monsieur La Trobe was, indeed a picture—a touching one, when we met him on the sea-shore, along which he always strolled on a summer evening—when he would sit down upon a rock, and while the tide rippled at our feet, lay his cane across his knees, take out his snuff-box, and, as if inspired by the beautiful countenance of that beautiful queen, tell us long sad stories of the French Revolution, which sunk into my heart and memory. It was then that the fine ennobling parts of the old drawing-master's character were developed. During his morning lesson, he struggled with the irritation which his sensitive mind could not overcome, occasioned by the knowledge, that he was engaged in an occupation which, however necessary, he was not born to. He was then alive to every little word—every look, that could be construed into even the shadow of a slight, and I always received instructions to courtesy to M. La Trobe—when he was angry, he would say to M. La Trobe, and to say, "I thank you very much, Monsieur, for the pains you have taken with me to-day." Notwithstanding this, the old man would get offended sometimes.

But meet Monsieur La Trobe away from his palette and crayons, you saw at once the gentleman of the old regime—most charming to converse with—full of spirit and anecdote—the acidity vanished, his countenance good and serene, and that nervous persimmon of his countenance broken up, by vivid flashings of enthusiasm. When he was surprised by anything that struck upon his feelings, there was an earnestness in his words, and a music in the deep, full tones of his voice, that could not fail to interest every one who felt its magic influence. French English has frequently something peculiar in its sound, but his English was his own, and he never perceived his utterances vulgar or ridiculous; his mind was well stored with the events of by-gone years—of the present when apart from his lessons, he seldom spoke or thought. This living with the past to him, was to me a world of romance; and though I had heard his tales more than once, still there was a freshness about his conversation that seemed to me like reading some book that I had never read before—hearing him talk of the French Court—and the queens—and the trials and troubles of the country—used to send the tears flowing over my cheeks. He liked telling his tales of trouble to his young pupils, because always certain of their attention and sympathy. But his great sorrow arose from events connected with his only daughter, when according to his own account, he had created most harshly—it was only at particular times that he would speak of "his Ernestine." The incident which had so great an influence over the latter days of Monsieur La Trobe's life, occurred on the anniversary of that lost daughter's birth-day. He ought to have been with us in the morning, but sent an apology, on the plea of indisposition; and in the evening we walked toward the cottage he called his own, and which he really belonged to. The Catholic priest of our parish, a gentleman who had received his priestly education in France. They lived together, and agreed admirably upon all but one or two points, which I need not mention now. "Monsieur La Trobe," Father Joseph said, "has gone to the sea-shore; he was in bad spirits; but he had good reason to believe he would be in better before he slept." We did not place much reliance on Father Joseph's prediction, for he was very fond of a little bit of mystery, and yet it was seldom he looked so happy—and we hastened our footsteps to what we had called the "Sketching Point;" for the worthy man took all his sea-view from one point—what would Stansfield say to that? and there he was, not sitting as usual, but leaning "on the top of the cliff," looking out at the sea, very perfectly unconscious that in five minutes more the water would have covered his shoes. We called out to him from the cliff to move, and never shall I forget the inexpressible mournful expression of his countenance when he turned it towards us—we felt as if we had intruded upon some silent sorrow—disturbed a holy melancholy by the intrusiveness of our laughter and our thoughtless cries, and were angry we had not moved more quickly and silently forward to meet us, we lowered our voices and spoke almost in whispers, so natural it is to subdue emotions before those we respect. The old man looked very sorrowful, and I thought I could clearly discover the traces of recent tears upon his cheeks; he saw that he had made us sad, and his contented spirit rallied.

"Dear children," said he, "poor Monsieur La Trobe have make you sorry, I see it in your face, your round Irish face, he look long! Eh ben! I ought to be glad, for though my child, my Ernestine, is not here to rejoice my heart, she rejoice the hearts of wherever she be. Yes, yes, she is loved, as she ought to be, though she was false to me, to love with my leave, and take de leave I never give to leave me! Ah! I was angry, angry to de death; I could have killed her; but now I grow old and de grave vill soon open for Monsieur La Trobe, and the time dat passas softens, and I forgive her, so she vill not be here to close my eyes. I shall have no friend to close my eyes."

"Oh, shame, Monsieur La Trobe, are not we your friends?" "Ah! chere demoiselles! you are all sweet, kind young ladies—you very sweet and good, ven you not draw, and monche, monche, de tops off your crayon, and lose your engee rubber, and make skiss green and grass blue; you are all most charming ven you away from your lessons, and I would be ingrat, if I did not remember all de kind things you have done for this poor refugee painter; but you not my Ernestine, de childa dat play on my wife's bosom; not de childa dat she press to her heart; not de childa dat she clasp in de convulsion of death; and den, just as her spirit fly to heaven, you, my dear young ladies, are not the childa dat she gave to my arms, and say, 'Louis, chere Louis Auguste, cherish her as you would my heart, my life, mon ami!' and then she die and leave me her living image, her miniature. Oh, my heart must be hard, or it would have broke, long ago."

"But you did cherish, and love her, Monsieur La Trobe; you have, therefore, no reason." The old man uttered an exclamation of violent anguish. In an instant the expression of his countenance changed—it had told the softened nature of his feelings, but never can I forget the bitter self-reproach that marked it, while he exclaimed: "No, Mademoiselle, I did not cherish, not love her, as I promise my angel Adele, my wife. I not do as I ought. I forgot that when she grew, my white rose, from a little bud, dat I carry next my heart, into a beautiful woman dat de sun shine on, and all the birds of the air admire, I forgot it was natural she should, as I forget her mother did, and fall in love! Ah, dear! she have no autonomy to de fove of France because her heart so large, poor dear, she like de whole world—and she take glory dat her Roland was brave soldier. She knew I would never give consent dat she would marry soldier—never, never."

"And what did she do?" "Ah! bah!—she marry without. I should have forgiven her, but no, I turned her away. She kneel at my feet—I spun her, though my heart bled; and I would have raised her to it, but her husband, he that stole her from me, came in, bah! so confidante, vid his proud blue eye, and his—vat you call swagger, and take her in his arms, and say to me—me, who was peer of France—dat if I had not been an old man, he would have tuck his sword. 'Old! as if honour was ever old. I call him coward—I strike him—and den he draw, and I draw mine. She, my Ernestine, she hold down her husband's arm, and I never knew how it was, but the point of mine wounded her. Oh, le bon Dieu! I saw her blood—her blood—drawn by my sword.'"

The old man became almost convulsed, and we, little more than children, stood trembling around him.

"Do not be afraid," he continued after a pause, "do not be afraid, my dear young ladies. I am quite harmless—a harmless old man—I would not shed a pigeon's blood. He take her from me, and refuse dat I should kneel to beg her pardon! he not a father then, though he be my son. I never see her since—I shall never see my child again. They become rich, and I would not let them know where I was; I hide myself in Ireland, for if I did de proud soldier might tink I want a bribe—ah bah!" And the old man, forgetful of the past agony in the present pride, took a pinch of snuff from his jewelled box, with the air of a prince. Again his tone and manner became subdued. "Dis is her birthday," he repeated, as if to himself, "dis is her birthday, and I shall never, never see her more!"

It certainly has a melo-dramatic effect, but it is, nevertheless, true, that at the very moment he had so said, we perceived that Father Joseph, accompanied by a gentleman and lady of middle-aged appearance, and followed by two young ladies, had descended the cliffs, and were close to us before we perceived them.

"Ah, bah!" said Monsieur La Trobe, "dat dear good Father Joseph is von great fool; he know I not vant to see strangers to-day. Ah bah!" And he turned to meet them with no very good grace. There was an expression of quiet enjoyment in Father Joseph's eyes, that made me expect some very great happiness; nor was I disappointed. The elder lady looked at Monsieur La Trobe for a little time, and then murmured—"Father, do you not know your Ernestine?" Oh, what a scene it was—and all managed so cleverly by that good old Father Joseph—poor Monsieur La Trobe could hardly believe the evidence of his senses, but seizing his daughter's arm, bared it to where the scar was; then, indeed, they wept in each other's arms; and the "soldier," he wept, and in truth, we all wept; but the two beautiful young ladies, who called Monsieur La Trobe "grand-papa," they wept the most of all; and I am sure everything was explained, forgotten, and forgiven; the whole country wished the old man joy, and praised Father Joseph, and visited the general and his lady; and the only ally to all this happiness was, that very soon after the occurrence of this incident, we lost the old drawing-master.

WHITFIELD'S BLOODED.—An officer in Glasgow, who had heard Mr Whitfield preach, laid a wager with another that at a certain charity sermon, though he went with prejudice, he would be compelled to give something. The other, to make sure, laid all the money out of his pockets; but, before he left the church, he was glad to borrow some and lose his bet. On another occasion, Mr. Whitfield preached in behalf of the inhabitants of an obscure village in Germany, which had been burned down, and collected for them six hundred pounds. After the sermon, Whitfield said: "We shall sing a hymn, during those who do not choose to give their mite on this awful occasion may sneak off." No one stirred; he got down from the pulpit, and ordered all the doors to be shut but one, at which he held the plate himself, and collected the above sum.

ILL-DERIVED COMMENDATION.—Praises of the unworthy are felt by ardent minds as robbers of the deserving.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE MOTHER'S HOPE.—BY LAMAR BLANCHARD.

Is there, when the winds are singing

In the happy summer-time—

When the captured air is ringing

With earth's music heaven-wind springing,

Forest-chirp, and village-chime!

Is there, of the sounds that float

Minglingly, a single note

Half so sweet, and clear, and wild,

As the laughter of a child?

Listen; and be now delighted.

Morn hath touched her golden strings;

Earth and sky their vows have plighted;

Life and light are re-united,

Amid countless carollings:

Yet, delicious as they are,

There's a sound that's sweeter far—

One that makes the heart rejoice

More than all—the human voice!

Organ, finer, deeper, clearer:

Though it be a stranger's tone;

Than the winds or water dearer,

More enchanting to the hearer,

For it answereth his own,

But of all its witching words,

Sweeter than the songs of birds,

Those are sweetest, bubbling wild

Through the laughter of a child.

Harmonies from time-touched towers,

Haunted strains from rivulets,

Hum of bees among the flowers,

Rustling leaves, and silver showers—

These, are long, the ear forgets;

But in mine there is a sound

Ringing on the whole year round;

Heart-deep longer than I heard,

Ere my child could speak a word.

Ah! 'twas heard by ear far purer,

Fondlier formed to catch the strain—

Ear of one whose love is ever;

Here, the mother, the endurer

Of the deepest share of pain;

Here the deepest bliss, to treasure

Memories of that cry of pleasure;

Here to hear, a lifetime after,

Echoes of that infant-laughter.

Yes; a mother's large affection

Hears with a mysterious sense

Breathings that evade detection,

Whisper faint, and fine infection,

Thrill in her with power intense.

Childhood's honeyed tones untought

Hiveth she, in loving thought;

Tones that never threaten decay,

For she listens—with her heart!

EXTRACTS FROM LAVATER

"Since the soul of man is the nearest approach to the Deity, it was not proper that God should clothe that which most resembled himself in dishonourable garments; but with a body befitting an immortal mind, and endued with a proper capability of motion. This is the only body on earth that stands erect. It is magnificent, superb, and formed according to the best proportion of its most delicate parts. Its stature is not terrific, nor is its strength formidable. The coldness of its juices occasions it not to creep, nor their heat to fly. It does not necessarily swim, for want of density. Man eats not raw flesh, from the savageness of his nature, nor does he graze like the ox. But he is framed and adapted for the execution of his functions. To the wicked he is formidable; mild and friendly to the good. By nature he walks the earth, swims by art, and flies in imagination. He licks the earth, and enjoys its fruits. His complexion is beautiful, his limbs firm, his countenance is comely, and beard ornamental. By imitating his body, the Greeks have thought proper to honour their deities."

"Oh that I could speak with sufficient force! Oh that I could find faith enough with my readers to convince them how frequently my soul seems exalted above itself, while I contemplate the unspeakably miraculous nature of the human body! Oh that all the languages of the earth would lend me words that I might turn the thoughts of men, not only to the contemplation of others, but by the aid of these: to the contemplation of themselves!"

"I cannot behold the smallest trait, without reading wisdom and benevolence, or without waking as if from a sweet dream into rapturous and actual existence, and congratulating myself that I, also, am a man."

"In each, the smallest outline of the human body, and how much more in the whole body, however old and runous the building may appear, or be, how much is there contained of the study of God, the genius of God, the poetry of God! My trembling and agitated breast frequently pants after leisure to look into these revelations of God; pants to remember I am not pure enough, innocent enough, to shudder in his presence, internally to adore; pants to feel I want words and signs to express my astonishment! Oh most incomprehensible, yet most revealed, what is it that veils the all-visible from our eyes, that prevents us seeing the all-invisible in the all-visible, others in ourselves, ourselves in others, and God in all!"

"Imagine to thyself the most transcendent water flowing over a surface on which grow beauteous flowers, whose bloom, though beneath, is seen through the pellucid waves; even as it with the fair flower of the soul, planted in a beauteous body, through which its beauteous bloom is seen. The good formation of a youthful body is no other than the bloom of ripening virtue, and, as I may say, the preface of far higher perfection; for as before the rising of the sun the mountain tops are gilded by his rays, enlivening the pleasing prospects, and premising the fair approach of day, so also the future maturity of an illustrious soul shines through the body, and is to the philosopher the pleasing sign of coming good."

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

JOURNAL OF THE PERSIAN PRINCES,
DURING THEIR RESIDENCE IN ENGLAND.

THIS work is quite a jewel, of its kind. We are so plagued with the trite and commonplace diaries and journals of trite and commonplace people now-a-days—so enamored with their small adventures, small criticisms, small misfortunes, and small satisfactions—that it is really mighty exalting to take up a book of travels that puts one in mind of the Arabian Nights, and of the good old times when travellers were not restricted to matters of fact, but walked about the out-of-the-way places of the world, and saw

"Anthrophophagi,
And men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders."

It may, perhaps, dwell in the recollection of a few of our readers that three real Persian princes visited England a few years ago, and bestirred themselves with rather un-oriental activity, in order to behold the wonders of the west. One of them, it appears, not to be behind the fashion of the age, kept a journal of his goings to and fro in the land, which, on his return to his own country, went through a course of circulation. This journal has been translated into English by an intelligent Persian, Assad-y-Kayat, who accompanied the princes during their visit. The result is one of the most amusing books of the season.

This journal is written with a true Oriental contempt for realities and matters of fact; and phlegmatic or discontented Englishmen, who have spent no inconsiderable portion of their lives in growling at and disparaging their country, (though, at the same time, perfectly ready to quarrel with and fight any accommodating foreigner who politely agrees with them in opinion), must be perfectly astonished to find in what a terrestrial Paradise they have been spending their grumbling existences. The princes were pleased with their visit, and everything is painted color de rose—they were not the men to travel from "Dan to Boereheba and find all barren;" though, doubtless, had their impressions been rather disagreeable, their feelings would have found vent in the opposite extreme, and the "fast-anchored iale" would have figured in their description as a combination of all that was barren, beggarly, vile and villainous.

The work, too, possesses an interest for Americans, inasmuch as the United States may be considered as an enlarged edition of England; not, it is true, quite so highly finished or prettily bound as yet, but still a reprint and continuation of the same work; and we may therefore form a shrewd guess from the present journal in what point of view our Atlantic cities, our social state, and our political institutions would strike an observant and intelligent son of the Orient.

Of course we must not look for grave statistics or literal descriptions from a Persian. Of all the Orientals, the Persians—"the Frenchmen of the East"—as they have been called, have the greatest aversion to "a dull, tame medium." When a Persian tells you that "all he possesses in the world is at your service," he merely means that he is willing to show you any trifling civility that will not materially inconvenience himself. This is in part the key to this journal. The prince is not deficient in intelligence, and makes some shrewd hits about duelling and other wise Frankish customs, but everything is seen through the illuminated haze of an Eastern imagination. Many of the things recorded, to be sure, we would not scruple, in our harsh western phraseology, to term "lies;" though if it be borne in mind that this is a Persian giving an account to Persians, of a land and state of things diametrically opposite to all he had ever seen or even dreamed of—and if it be recollected at the same time what notable absurdities John Bull and Brother Jonathan have fallen into in visiting each other's near-akin countries, it would be as well if a more charitable term were substituted. Doubtless he knew his readers, and if he had used a more subdued tone, perhaps he would have been misunderstood. The quiet humor and simple pathos of the Vicar of Wakefield would at present scarcely suit the pepper and salt taste of the public.

And now for a few of the princes' pleasant extravagancies. And first, as rather a rich specimen, take a VISIT TO VAUXHALL.

"In the evening we visited a large garden, beautifully lighted up, and the fireworks we saw here made us forget all others we had already seen. A garden—a heaven—large, adorned with roses of different colours in every direction, the water running on the beautiful green—pictures were drawn on every wall. Here and there were young 'moonly' [female] faces selling refreshments. There were burning in this place about two millions of lights, each giving a different colour; the lanterns and lights are so arranged as to make poetry, in such a manner that they have no end. On every side there appeared the moon, the sun, with the planets, moving in its orbit; and in every walk there were about ten thousand Frank moons [English ladies] walking and gazing about, where the roses and their tribes were admiring their beautiful cheeks. Each was taken by the hand. Such a company in such a place, say to the soul—Behold thy Paradise! Pleasure and joy appear; woes and sorrows are banished; every hand asked for a glass of refreshment to present to the possessor of jasmine hands, [few too-talors visit Vauxhall.] Thus we were happy to have in each hand a Paradisean companion, and to point out the beauties of the place, in order to draw forth the sweet music of their replies! [Well said, prince.] We left the rose, and met a pink! Are we awake or in a dream? We walked in this garden from one place to another, till we came to a place where we saw crowds of people gazing at a boy, elegantly clad, who was playing on a rope; now we were as though we had lost our mind. This rope was made fast high above in the garden on which the boy was dancing; indeed, he was like a bird with wings in the air. Afterwards a young and beautiful girl, handsomely dressed, increased our surprise; she joined the boy, and they played together in the most wonderful manner, enough to take the senses away to look at them. When the boy and girl had finished their manoeuvres, the people in the garden went to another place, where there was a wheel which was set on fire. As soon as it was lighted it began to ascend, throwing out fire of red, green, blue, yellow, and other colours wonderfully, as if all the world had taken fire, and continued to ascend till it reached the sky."

After this, alas for "the Gardens of Gull in their bloom!" The Vale of Cashmere, and the (hitherto considered) glowing descriptions in Moore's Lalla Rookh become absolutely frigid when placed alongside of this account of the Cockney Paradise. True, Englishmen, especially of late, have been in the habit of regarding Vauxhall, with its "two millions of lights," as rather a vulgar and commonplace exhibition, by no means celebrated for the selectness of its company—its "moons" especially—and the chief associations connected in their minds with the place is the dearthness of the punch and the thinness of the cuts of ham—"a Vauxhall slice" having become a metaphorical expression significant of lightness and unsubstantiality. But see, from the above, the disadvantages of a cold temperament. The ardent and lively Persian is astonished—delighted—transported with all he beholds. An Englishman would probably "poo!" and "pish!" at one half of the exhibition, and grumble most heartily at the other, amusing his wife, at the same time, by assuring her every now and then that he was morally certain it would "rain before they got home!"

But the visit to Vauxhall is almost transcended by Ducrow's Amphitheatre, which the prince felicitously calls—"The Opera of the Horse!"

THE AMPHITHEATRE.

"It is the same in form as the Opera House or Theatre, and in the same manner it contains boxes and seats for the spectators. There were on this day about fifty thousand ladies, with charming faces like the moon, and the ray of their beauty gave a most powerful splendour to the place. The principal parts in this theatre are performed by horses, including other wonderful exercises. In the first place, an Asiatic emperor, in Eastern splendour, came out upon the stage, where a fire was lighted up, the light of which made the whole place look as red as crimson. The horses ran up and down exactly like cats. Some little boys, of seven years of age and under, clad in different-coloured dresses, played by turning their bodies as if they had no bones at all. They formed, by joining their bodies in different ways, any figure they liked. For instance, they wished to form an elephant. One of them represented the proboscis, another the head, one the neck, and another the feet. 'Thus they form an elephant, exactly like the original; so wonderful that one could scarcely distinguish it from a real one. * * * * The most astonishing part of this exhibition was a ring of wood [Anglice hoop] which was held by a man ten yards distance, around which were fixed some spars. Some persons, while playing on the rope, passed most wonderfully through the ring without being hurt. Afterwards some beautiful young female performers, with ANGELIC FACES, DRESSED EXPENSIVELY WITH JEWELS, came out! They played in different ways, and their beauty and exercises exceedingly delighted and astonished all of us. * * * A young female appeared, of beautiful complexion, brilliant as Venus. She actually danced on the horses, and made those large, powerful animals themselves dance. Sometimes this young lady, with a stick in her hand, gave a sign to the horse, which he understood as well as a human being, and fell down as if dead; again, she gave another sign, which made him rise up and dance. In fact, nothing was wanted to this horse but speech. After this young lady had finished her wonders, then other performers were introduced. I will only add, that what we saw done here was as if by magic—indeed, you may call it a complete necromancy."

Almost the only piece of matter-of-fact in this journal is the description of Ducrow, which (with the exception of the two words in italics) those who have seen that inimitable horseman, will recognise as merely literal.

"Afterwards the master of this establishment himself came out, and performed so wonderfully, that he might be called the first horseman in the world. This man, standing on a large and powerful horse, exhibited such distinguished powers of horsemanship, that what I have already mentioned is nothing in comparison to it. While the horse was at full speed, he filled his pipe, struck a light and began smoking. He also took a pen and ink in his hand, and while at full gallop, wrote letters. Likewise he loaded his gun and fired. Again, two men stood and held a circular screen of paper in his way, ten yards above him, through which he jumped, though the horse was in full speed, and alighted on his back. In fine, what was exhibited here was miraculous."

Dr. Watts, who was a little man, expressed a desire to be "measured by his mind." The Persian prince measures everything by his mind, and excellent measure he gives, invariably changing feet into yards at the least.

When giving the impressions made upon the Eastern traveller by the places of amusement of the western Babylon, we may as well append his exceedingly naive description of the Queen's Theatre, or Italian Opera House. He appears at all times to be a most unreserved and enthusiastic admirer of Frankish feminine beauty, and even the fruit-women come in for their share of the prince's admiration.

OPERA HOUSE.

"There were in the boxes around more than a thousand young and beautiful ladies, splendidly dressed with jewels; the beam of their beautiful faces illumines the place—the brilliancy of their sweet faces takes away the heart; my whole soul cried out to leave my body, that it might go near those hours! The heart beats with ravishment of that sight. There are also distinguished places about this house, where are fine-looking women [true enough] with arms like jasmine, and faces like a shining mirror. These handsome young women sell refreshments; and, on the whole, this place seems to furnish the nourishment of life."

Of the ladies generally, he says—"Most of the ladies and females are more delicate and refined than the blossoms of roses. Their waist is more slender than a finger-ring, their form is beautiful, their voice gains the affections."

But this general description falls far short of one particular instance, in which he appears to have fallen several "fathom deep" in love, or, as in eastern man of the western world would express it—"pretty considerably over head and ears."

AN ENGLISH BEAUTY.

"While we were sitting when it was about the asser, behold! a sun appeared from our east shining and flashing. On seeing this incomparable beauty, and beholding this lovely face, like the full moon, I lost my senses, not to say that I lost my sight in admiration. No! my eyes by beholding her smiling became a hundred times more powerful. The delightful colour of her hair fell into my heart, and I was obliged to rise up and sit by my side, paying her all honourable respect. My heart died away, and unless my mind had gained strength to maintain conversation with this visitor, I should have appeared as if I were lost. I asked who she was. This full moon was the daughter of a captain in the East Indies."

What a pity the gallant prince did not take a passage in the British Queen. The fair damself of the west would then have had homage done to their charms in a style of which phlegmatic Johns and calculating Jonathans are constitutionally incapable.

About grave matters the Persian is equally liberal. The number and variety of the charitable institutions in London, calculated for the at least temporary relief or alleviation of the "ills that flesh is heir to," have for years past been objects of admiration to the enlightened traveller and philanthropist. But the prince cannot be content with the bare truth, and looks at London, and indeed all England, in this respect, through a magnifying glass of extraordinary power. He says—"In charity, and supporting the poor and orphans, they are exceedingly liberal, so much so, that they give ten per cent. of their income to institutions of charity." He then goes on to say that, "out of the twenty-seven millions of population, there may be seven thousand also poor; but not a single person begs in the streets, or in any part of the kingdom! In fact, if there should be any one begging, he would be taken up immediately and punished for it, as it is against the law, because in every quarter there is a house built on purpose for charity where the poor are accommodated." Doubtless the prince has been told that the laws are omnipotent in England; and doubtless he has also heard that there was a law against begging; and, putting the two statements together, has come to the not unnatural though mightily erroneous conclusion that there were no beggars. Yet we have known travellers, with better opportunities of judging, make as wonderful mistakes as this.

After the shabby and factious conduct of the House of Lords in refusing an adequate grant for the establishment of a national system of education—the only true remedy for charism and other social and political evils—there is a stinging satire in the following intended compliment.

EDUCATION.

"Perhaps out of this twenty-seven millions of population, there is not a single soul who does not know how to read and write, not even the deaf, dumb, or blind."

The radicals would, past question, be mightily gratified if the following account of the inability of the chancellor of the exchequer to rough handling were literally correct.—"Every person that has given ten tomans of the revenue, in case he should see anything wrong in its expense, has a right to rise up in the House of Commons, and seize the vizier of the treasury by the collar, saying—'What have you done with my money?' Mr. Spring Rice, the late vizier of the treasury, and now called to the "Upper House" as Baron Mountague, will doubtless be doubly thankful for his peerage after he reads this.

With the statistics of commerce and the details of naval engagements the prince seems not to be very familiar, for he says—"All the ships of the other nations on the globe could not equal the English ships alone, nor ten foreign men of war stand in battle against one English."

Many of his miscellaneous remarks are amusing: "GAS.—In all their cities, villages, towns, hamlets, mountains, hills, plains, bazaars, and every street, the light at night is just the same as in the day time."

COACHES.—There are through England, Scotland, and Ireland, about two millions of stage-coaches, which afford the government an extraordinary income."

HAND-WRITING.—They do not give credit for fine hand-writing, and say writing is good enough if it can be read."

LEARNING.—They have several thousand colleges and schools for instruction in every class of learning, on which they have spent millions of money. All this for education and wisdom! Verily, such a magnificent kingdom and high nation is not, in these times, in any other part of the world, nor has such an one been, even in ancient times, mentioned in the histories."

The following are not bad specimens of the system of generalizing from particular instances—a system which has very generally prevailed, in all books of travel, both ancient and modern, and which has not unfrequently led to the most laughable deductions and conclusions:

«RECEPTION OF COMPANY.—It is not the custom of this country to receive anybody in their families, not even a friend or a brother, therefore it is necessary to lodge in a hotel; and all travellers in this country, even the natives themselves, go to these public houses.»

«HORRORS.—In every hotel there will be more than two hundred servants, male and female, who are ready at any moment to receive orders, day and night.»

Here is a cool hit at men in office, which derives additional vigour from the grave and unhesitating manner in which the presumed fact is stated:

«WHIGS AND TORIES.—The administration consists of two parties. The one is named Whig, and the other Tory. The difference between these parties is as follows:—The Tories, in ancient days, have always been in office, and thereby they have established to themselves some privileges by which every one is now a possessor of some millions of money!«

Upon the whole this is a most amusing book. And it is not without its uses either as a guide to all who travel or intend to travel. There are more unconscious Munchausens in the world than the Persian princes. C.

LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE.

ON THE CHARACTER OF HAMLET.

WE are indebted to General Prosper M. Wetmore for a fac simile copy of a correspondence, which passed between Ex-President Adams and James H. (now Baron) Hackett, some time since, on the character of Hamlet. It will be found very entertaining. The theory of Mr. Adams is quite ingenious and lucidly expressed; but we concur with Mr. Halleck in the opinion that the actor has the best of the argument:

Washington, 19th Feb. 1859.

JAMES H. HACKETT, Esq., New-York.

DEAR SIR.—I return herewith your tragedy of Hamlet, with many thanks for the perusal of your manuscript notes, which indicate how thoroughly you have delved into the bottomless mine of Shakespeare's genius. I well remember the hospitable table, where, at seven years bygone, at Mr. Philip Hone's hospitable table, where, at the casual introduction of the name of Hamlet, the Dana, my enthusiastic admiration of the inspired (muse inspired) bard of Avon, commenced in childhood, before the dawn had darkened my lip, and continued, through five of the seven ages of the drama of life, gaining upon the judgment, as it loses to the imagination, seduced me to expatiate at a most intellectual and lovely convivial board, upon my views of the character of Hamlet, until I came away ashamed of having engrossed an undue proportion of the conversation to myself. That my involuntary effusions and diffusions of mind on that occasion were indulgently viewed by Mr. Hone, so as to have remained with kindness upon his memory to this day, is a source of much gratification to me; and still more pleasing is it to me that he should have thought any of the observations which fell from me at that time worthy of being mentioned to you.

I look upon the tragedy of Hamlet as the masterpiece of the drama—the masterpiece of Shakespeare—I had almost said 'the masterpiece of the human mind. But I have never committed to writing the analysis of the considerations upon which this deliberate judgment has been formed. At the table of Mr. Hone I could give nothing but outlines and etchings. I can give no more now—smatching, as I do, from the morning lamp to commune with a lover and worthy representative of Shakespeare upon the glories of the immortal bard.

What is tragedy? It is an imitative representation of human action and passion, to purify the heart of the spectator, through the instrumentality of terror and pity. This, in substance, is the definition of Aristotle; and Pope's most beautiful lines, in the prologue to Cato, are but an expansion of the same idea.

Hamlet is the personification of man, in the prime of life, with a mind cultivated by the learning acquirable at an university, combining intelligence and sensibility, in their highest degrees, within a step of the highest station attainable upon earth, crushed by extinction, by the pressure of calamities inflicted not by nature but against nature—not by physical but by moral evil. Hamlet is but against nature—not by physical but by moral evil. Hamlet is but against nature and soul of man, in all their perfection and all their frailty, in agonizing conflict with human crime also in its highest pre-eminence of guilt. Hamlet is all heart, and all soul. His ruling passions are filial affection, youthful love, manly ambition. His commanding principles are filial duty, generous friendship, love disappointed and subdued, ambition and life sacrificed to avenge his father.

Hamlet's right to the throne has been violated, and his darkest suspicions roused by the marriage of his mother with his uncle so speedily succeeding his father's death. His love is first trammelled by the conflicting pride of his birth and station operating upon his ambition; and although he has "made many tenders of his affection" to Ophelia, and "hath importuned" her with love, in honourable fashion; yet he has made no proposal of marriage to her—he has promised her nothing but love, and, cautioned both by her brother and her father, she meets the advances of Hamlet with repulsion. Instead of attributing this to its true cause, he thinks she spurns his tenderness. In his enumeration of the sufferings which stimulate to suicide, he names "the pangs of despised love," and his first experiment of assumed madness is made upon her. He treats her with a revolting mixture of ardent passion, of gross indelicacy, and of rudeness, little short of brutality; at one moment he is worshipping at her feet—at the next insulting her with coarse indecency—at the third, taunting her with sneering and sarcastic advice, to go to a nunnery. And is this the language of splendid intellect, in alliance with acute feeling? Ay, under the insupportable pressure of despised love, combined with a throne lost by usurpation—a father murdered by a mother and an uncle—an incestuous marriage between the criminals—and the apparition from the eternal world, of his father's spirit, commanding him to avenge the deed.

The revelation from the ghost caps the climax of calamity—it unsettles that ardent and meditative mind—you see it in the tone of levity instantly assumed upon the departure of the "perturbed spirit"—you see it in the very determination to "put on an antic disposition. It is the expedient of a deadly but irresolute purpose. He will execute the command of his father, but he will premeditate the time, the place, the occasion, and, to fore-arrange the most convenient opportunity, will feign occasional madness, with intervals of clear and steady rational conversation. And thus it is that "the native hue of resolution is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought."

This perpetual action and reaction, between the mind and the heart; the feeling spurring him on, and the reflection holding him back, constitute that most admirable portrait of human nature in its highest state, little lower than the angels, little above the Hottentot of the African cape, which pervades every part of the character and conduct of Hamlet. The habitual turn of his mind is to profound meditation. He reflects upon life, upon death, upon the nature of man, upon the physical composition of the universe; he indulges in minute criticism upon the performance of the players; he reads and comments upon a satire in Juvenal; he quibbles with a quibbling grave-digger; commemorates the convivial attractions of an old jovial table companion, whose bones the good man Belver turns up in digging the grave for Ophelia, and philosophizes upon the dust of imperial Caesar, metamorphosed into the bung of a beer barrel. During all this time he is charged with the command of his father, risen from the dead, to take the life of his murderer, to execute divine justice in the punishment of his crime. He has firmly resolved to execute this command—has frequent opportunities for the execution of it, which he suffers to escape him, and is constantly reproaching himself for his delays—he shrewdly detects and ingeniously disconcerts the practices of the murderers against his life, discloses to his mother his knowledge of her guilt, kills Polonius most rashly, pretending to kill a rat, and intending to kill the king, whom he supposes to be the person behind the arras, and to have been there listening and overhearing his terrible expostulations with his mother. When he discovers that the person he has killed was not the king but Polonius, instead of compunction and remorse, he begins by a cruel joke upon the dead body, and finishes by an apologetic burst of indignation at the wretched, rash, intruding fool who had hidden himself behind the arras to overhear his interview with his mother. Yet the man whom he has killed is the father of Ophelia, whom he loves to distraction, and whose madness and death are immediate consequences of this murder of her father. Shakespeare has taken care not to bring Hamlet and Ophelia into the presence of each other after this event. He takes no notice at the grave-digging scene; that the grave over which he so pathetically and humorously dissects upon the bones of Yorick, the king's jester, was about to receive the corpse of Ophelia. Afterwards, at the funeral scene, he treats Laertes as roughly, but finally apologizes to him, and desires him to attribute his violence and unkind treatment to his madness. The reasoning faculty of Hamlet is at once sportive, sorrowfully indignant, and melancholy. His reflections always take the tinge of the passion under which he is labouring, but his conduct is always governed by the impulse of the moment. Hence his madness, as you have remarked; is sometimes feigned, and sometimes real. His feigned madness, Polonius, without seeing through it, perceives has method in it. His real madness is towering passion, transient, momentary, the furor brevis, which was the ancient definition of anger. It overwhelms at once the brightest genius, the soundest reason, and the kindest heart, that ever was exhibited in combination upon the stage. It is man, in the ideal perfection of his intellectual and moral nature, struggling with calamity beyond his power to bear, afflicted by the crime of his fellow-man—struggling with agonizing energies against it—sinking under it, to extinction. What can be more terrific! what can be more pitiful!

This is the hasty outline of my view of the character of Hamlet. I regret that time will not allow me to fill the canvass with lights and shades borrowed from the incidents and dialogue of the play. But after bestowing so much of my own tediousness upon you, I can only repeat my thanks for the perusal of your own very ingenious comments upon this incomparable tragedy; and add, the assurance of my best wishes for your health and happiness, and of my cordial sympathies with your devotion to the memory of the immortal bard.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

22, Charlotte-street, Bedford Square, London, 24th July, 1859.

To the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Boston.

DEAR SIR.—I have at length an opportunity to acknowledge your obliging favour of the nineteenth February last, which was duly received by me at New-York, prior to my sailing thence for this country; that you should have esteemed me worthy of such pains will remain graven on my memory as one of the most gratifying incidents of my life, and your autograph document shall be treasured in my archives.

The elements, of which that matchless character, Shakespeare's Hamlet, is compounded, are generally as justly analyzed by you, as they are throughout beautifully described; but there are some causes you impute as contributing essentially to his madness, about which I beg leave to differ, and quote here and there a sentence of yours, the better to refresh your memory. "Love disappointed and subdued." Now I have always considered filial piety, in both Hamlet and Ophelia, the most prominently developed trait of character; a father's fate in both cases operates so powerfully on their sensitive natures as finally to overthrow the seat of reason; their love for each other was quite secondary; in pursuance of his voluntary oath to the ghost, that "thy remembrance all alone shall live, etc., unmixed with baser matter." Hamlet's first scheme is to feign madness, and he begins "to put on an antic disposition, on" in the presence of Ophelia, for whom he was reputed to entertain a tender affection, in order, as it seems to me, that she may (as she does) tell her father, and that Polonius' gerruily may advertise the whole court of his being mad for her love—a cause and effect calculated to mislead and calm the apprehensions of the gully usurper, and better enable Hamlet to scrutinize his unguarded behaviour thereafter.

Had Ophelia's love for Hamlet been strong, she would naturally not have yielded so readily to become the medium of assisting the espionage of her parasitical father, and the compplotting king, when it is proposed, in her presence, to "let her loose to Hamlet," whilst they watch them behind the arras; and here let me remark upon your sentence—"he treats her with a revolting mixture of ardent passion, of gross indelicacy, and of rudeness, little short of brutality"—that from his previous conduct "when she was sewing in her chamber," he knows she esteems him mad and will not feel wounded at anything he may say, for example! when he is most censorious of her father, she prays, "Oh help him, you sweet heavens!" further extenuation may be found in another and not unreasonable supposition, that, at the time, Hamlet had some lurking suspicion of her unfair position; also, why change his tone so suddenly from the incipient complimentary supplication, "Nymph, in thy orisons be all my sins remembered!" to such pointed rebuke? When asked, "Are you honest?" she evades a categorical answer by, "My lord!" then he follows, "Are you fair?" and explains to her why, if she is both, and would preserve her honesty from the contaminating influences of beauty, she should not admit them to any discourse with each other; "because the power of beauty will sooner transform honesty, from what it is, into a 'corrupt' bawd, than the force of honesty will translate beauty into his 'honesty's' likeness, now the time gives proof." (As here is she herself, for instance, allowing the effect of her beauty upon him, to be used by her father for a sinister purpose and at the expense of her honesty.) He "did love her once," but upon consideration, "loved her not." finding that she has inherited so much of her "old stock" (viz., her father's courtier-like insincerity) as to render her nature incapable of thorough honesty—"for virtue cannot so inoculate our old stock but we shall relish of it." "We are arrant knaves all!"—the aptitude of his epigrammatic sentiments, whether from accident or design, evidently embarrasses and betrays her into an absolute falsehood; for when questioned, "Where is your father?" she answers, "At home!" knowing Polonius to be a covert listener to them at that moment; and, by the way, be it remembered of this scene, that the king, who witnessed it, and was a keen observer of remarks, "Love! his affections do not that way tend!" and also of her when mad, he says, "This is the poison of deep grief—it springs all from his father's death." In short, Ophelia never in her madness alludes to Hamlet, nor does he but once, subsequently, refer to his love for her, and then only when chance informed him of her death and had brought him to her burial, where in a fit of temporary derangement, he lets the bravery of Laertes' grief "put him into a towering passion," which he afterwards, by way of apology to him, "proclaims, was madness."

Permit me to quote you further—"His love is first trammelled by the conflicting pride of his birth and station operating upon his ambition."

As regards Hamlet's ambition; in the course of what he stigmatizes to the courtiers "as their trade with him," he certainly pretends to them his cause of madness is, "I lack advancement!" but this he says after he has discovered the necessity of having an eye of them and a determination to "trust them" only as he would "adders that have fangs;" for in his first interview on their arrival, and before he inquires whether they have not been "sent for," he welcomes his old schoolfellows with, "Excellent, good friends!" and unreservedly scours their notions of his being ambitious because he esteems Denmark a prison; and when they suggest, "it is too narrow for your mind," adds, "Oh God! I could be bounded in a nutshell and count myself a king of infinite space; but that I have had bad dreams"—in fact, had he not had "bad dreams" concerning his father's fate, I doubt if disappointed ambition had ever caused him to express regret, much less urged him to any active measures about his deferred succession to the throne of Denmark. You continue—"And although he has made many tenders of his affection to Ophelia, and hath importuned her with love in honourable fashion, yet he has made no proposal of marriage to her, he has promised her nothing but love."

To the consummation of his love by marriage, his queen mother refers, when scattering flowers during Ophelia's obsequies:

"I hoped thou shouldst have been my Hamlet's wife / I thought thy bride-bed to have deck'd, sweet maid / And not have strew'd thy grave."

*A compliment to my Felsteg, which Mr. Adams had recently seen.—J.H.H.

*Hamlet did not then know of her death.—B.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"The Poetical Works of Edmund Spenser." In five volumes. First American edition, with introductory observations on the Faery Queene, and notes by the editor. Boston: Charles C. Little and James Brown.

We have been a nation somewhat more than half a century, during which time some hundreds of thousands of books have been given to the public, of which a few hundreds perhaps, are destined to survive the century. The superfluous trash of the English press during the last forty years has been revamped and republished in this country with a promptitude worthy of a better cause. We have had novels by the cart-load, and books of travels by the cargo. Nor has poetry been neglected. We have had Byron's poems and Marsh's poems; but never, till now, have our publishers given us an American edition of the poetical works of Edmund Spenser. As if to make amends for the neglect, this edition is put forth in a truly worthy and beautiful style, appearing under the supervision of one of the ripest scholars in the country, Mr. George S. Hillard, of Boston. His introductory notice is a brilliant specimen of literary criticism, while the notes scattered through the work are collated with evident taste and industry. No true lover of literature should be without the Faery Queene. It is amusing to trace throughout Spenser's works the numerous germs of thought of which his great contemporary, Shakespeare, availed himself. What an era was that which was dignified by two such gigantic intellects, whose works alone are sufficient to shed a blaze over English literature which ages cannot dim!

"The American Journal of Medical Sciences for November, 1839." Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

This number contains its usual quantum of valuable matter, thus sustaining the high character it has heretofore maintained. Among other articles, we notice a monograph on diseases of the stomach, by our distinguished friend and able physician, Doctor Chapman, of Philadelphia. Anything from the pen of this clever writer of Philadelphia is received with great pleasure by the profession at large. There is also a report of some cases of cutaneous diseases, by Dr. C. A. Porter, of this city, which is highly creditable to the practical sagacity of this gentleman. Under the head of improvements and discoveries in the medical sciences, we observe that the celebrated Sanson, one of the chief surgeons of the Hôtel Dieu, has undergone the operation of lithotomy. It is stated that there were great difficulties in the case. This speaks much for this operation, which we understand has been decreed in this city by most of the medical men. This reminds us that we witnessed our friend Doctor A. Goldsmith, of this city, perform an operation of this kind, with extraordinary skill and success. Indeed, the subject is of so much importance to the human family, that it is a matter of congratulation to our citizens to have a gentleman of such powers of manipulation among us; for, from all we can learn, great dexterity is required. Notice is also taken in this number of a case of Cæsarian section, by Doctor Hoffman, of this city, which is highly creditable to him—the life of the mother being preserved. Although we do not pretend to much knowledge of the condition of the medical world, yet we think it a duty incumbent on the profession to sustain a work like this, that has already done so much for the science to which it is so ably devoted.

"The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nickleby." By Charles Dickens. (Bos.) author of "Pickwick Papers," &c. With numerous illustrations by Foix. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

This is a neat edition of one of the most popular fictions of the age. The denouement is admirably managed. Poetical justice is satisfied, and all passes off well to the content of the reader. We understand that Messrs. Lea and Blanchard have made efficient arrangements for presenting Dickens's next new work to the American public simultaneously with its appearance in England. These publishers deserve well at the hands of the "reading community" for their untiring enterprise.

"The Life and Times of Martin Luther." By the author of the "Three Experiments of Living," "Sketches of the Old Painters," &c. Boston: Hildard, Gray and Co.

A popular biography of Luther is what has long been wanted, and here it is supplied in a manner that leaves us little room to wish upon this subject. The style of the work is luminous and engaging. The marked traits of Luther's character are displayed in a strong light, though we think a little too much leniency is observed in depicting the darker shades. We commend this work to our readers, in the full assurance that it is a good and interesting book, from the pen of a lady of extraordinary talent and fine acquisitions.

"Memoirs of His Own Time: including the revolution, the empire, and the restoration." By Lieutenant General Count Matieu Dumas. In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

Unlike the great body of French memoirs of the revolution, this work is evidently written in sincerity and good faith. It is full of interest, although occasionally the author is a little too minute upon topics of subordinate importance. The notices of Napoleon bear the stamp of truth, and possess an historical value.

The concluding number of "Nicholas Nickleby" have appeared, embellished with a fine portrait of Dickens on steel; the story is conducted to the close with unflagging ability. A new work by Thomas Moore, entitled "Alciphron," has been published in London; it is appended to a new edition of his "Euphrosyne," which has been issued with splendid illustrations by Turner.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The letter of our Boston correspondent, describing the brilliant performances of Charles Keen in that city, and his extraordinary success, was received a little too late for insertion. We are glad that Keen's noble persuasions have been so handsomely appreciated.—"Garlick" is informed that we have no "green-room intelligence" upon the subject of Maerdyck's visit to this country.—"X." will perceive that we have duly called attention to Alexandre's remarkable exhibition.—We must decline the Well-street sketch of "W. M."—A batch of poetry sent us last week, under the signatures of "L. Y." "Alpha," "E. X." "Julia," and "U. D." is at the disposal of the several authors.—We are gratified to learn that Dumas's admirable novel of "Nix's Mate" has met with a prompt and extensive sale.—The communications signed "Broadway," "O. O." "Manhattan," and a "Butt-end," are respectfully declined.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1839.

American hotels.—A correspondent of the London Court Gazette gives the following picture of his arrival at a hotel in Philadelphia. The account, if true, is discreditable to the country; but we suspect that the writer must have put up at a third-rate establishment. Certain we are that he would not have encountered such treatment from any respectable hotel either in Philadelphia or New-York:—"The arrival," he says, "at a hotel seems doubtless, to an English reader, to be a very pleasant termination to a long day's journey; but, although I do not mean to accuse the Philadelphians especially, or the Americans generally, with any Quixotic exhibition of hospitality, I can distinctly rescue them from the charge that a stranger is likely, in any part of the United States, to "Find his warmest welcome at an inn."

Upon entering one of these mammoth establishments, the visitor has to make his way through the reading-room; which usually occupies the principal space of the lower part of the house, and which is filled with a host of lounging smokers, and having navigated with sufficient care among the horizontal legs of these gentlemen, and having duly avoided putting his foot into any of the numerous spitons with which the floor of the department is, to judge from appearances, uselessly sought to be protected, he at length makes his way to the 'bar.' If, as was my case, he has a lady with him, he should previously usher her to the public drawing-room, leaving her there until he learns whether he can obtain a lodging; but at first, as of course he will be unacquainted with this fact, and as he will not find any servants prepared to give an answer or to show attention, he must leave her standing in the passage until he has completed the requisite inquiries. Arrived at the bar, where all is bustle and confusion, and speaking to the gentleman under whose superintendence a constant dispensation of cigars, wines, and compounds is going on, he at length gets an answer to his request for accommodation. 'Well—I guess we're pretty full—I'll see, right away.' In five minutes the said gentleman casts his eye over a list containing the numbers of the various apartments, and if he is fortunate enough to find a vacancy, a rough-looking negro is forthwith summoned, and the lady is conducted to her room. The luggage will follow in the course of two or three hours, provided its owner possesses sufficient activity of disposition to descend to the smoking-room at frequent intervals during the period, for the purpose of reiterating to the bar-keeper a request to that effect. Having proceeded thus far, the next thing requisite is that he shall read the 'Regulations,' to which he is required to submit, and to ascertain thereby the hours fixed for meals. In the present case, immediately upon entering the room, I rang the bell; a waiter entered. 'Did you ring?'—'Yes—we have just arrived from New-York, and this lady has not taken anything since seven o'clock. I know that it is after your dinner hour; but if you can let us have the most simple thing in the way of dinner, I shall be very much obliged to you.'—'Well—I guess not—but I'll inquire.' In two minutes the gentleman returned. 'I've been to inquire—it's now five—tea hour is half-past six—you can't have anything before.' After a week's experience I knew remonstrance to be vain. 'These people,' I exclaimed, 'complain about the misrepresentations of travellers! If a man were to utter the request that I have just made at the door of a Tartar hut or an Irish cabin, he would get an answer that when it came to be written down would not call for suppression beneath the stale clap-trap of 'national prejudices' and 'wilful misrepresentation.'"

The President steam-ship.—This noble vessel, intended for the British and American Steam Navigation Company, is, as we learn from a London paper, nearly completed. It was expected to be launched the latter part of October. She is a much larger vessel than the British Queen. Extreme length from stem to taffrail, (including the figurehead,) two hundred and sixty-seven feet; extreme breadth of her deck, forty-one feet, including paddle-boxes, sixty-seven feet; depth in the hold, thirty-one feet six inches; and her tonnage about two thousand five hundred tons. Her engines will consist of two, each of two hundred and fifty horse power. Her paddle-wheels are to be ninety feet in circumference. She is to be commanded by Captain Campbell.

Miniature painting—Madame Guillet.—We have examined with much gratification some specimens of miniature painting, the work of Madame Guillet, the wife of the distinguished French instructor, Isidore Guillet. Her rooms are in Barclay-street, a few doors from the Astor House. In perfect fidelity, beautiful colouring, and exquisite finish, the miniatures of this lady are equal to those of any artist in this country. We strongly advise those persons who may be in quest of a first-rate miniature painter, to look at the specimens of this delicate art, which may be seen at the rooms of Madame Guillet.

Our Indian summer.—A writer in the Cleveland Herald on the influence of the lakes on our autumnal sunsets, says that the beauty, blandness, and the mingled glories of a western Indian summer belong alike to the earth and sky. In the valley of the great lakes they are blent with a mellow richness and loveliness unknown in other climes. The spirit of beauty can worship in no temple more resplendent than the arched heavens lit up by an autumn sunset, and burnished with flashes and crimsoned colourings, deepened by the many-tinted foliage of the primeval woods, mirrored and reflected from waters broad and bright as the Mediterranean of the old world. The forests—pen or pencil can do justice to the spectacle nature presents, when the frost of a night has changed the lingering green of summer. "It is as if a myriad of rainbows were leaped through the tree-tops; as if the sunsets of a summer—gold, purple, and crimson—had been fused in the alembic of the west, and poured back in a new deluge of light and colour over the wilderness. It is as if every leaf in those countless trees had been painted to outflame the tulip; as if, by some electric miracle, the dyes of the earth's heart had struck upward, and her crystals and ores, her sapphires, hyacinths, and rubies, had let forth their imprisoned colours, to mount through the roots of the forest, and, like the angels that in olden time entered the bodies of the dying, reanimate the perishing leaves, and reveal an hour in their bravery."

Mr. J. G. Vandenhoff.—This young gentleman, a son of the distinguished actor now in this country, made a successful debut lately at Covent Garden theatre, in the part of "Leon," in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Rule a Wife and Have a Wife. The Laverpool Albion says, "though brought up to the law, in which he had acquired considerable practice, having recently held the important situation of solicitor to the Dock Estate, he had always a bent towards the stage. It is said he has abilities which cannot fail to place him, ere long, in a high rank, not as a comedian only, but as a tragedian also." He is, it is known, the author of several songs, &c., and a piece of his was produced at Laverpool, entitled "The Three Beauties of Dresden," when he was not more than sixteen years of age.

Beauties of royalty.—The Leipzig Gazette, in a letter dated Naples, third September, relates the following curious little incident:—"Last Friday the driver of a hackney-coach had the ill-luck to cross the Toledo-street, just when the king entered it with his carriage. The former's horses being too tired to proceed quickly enough, the king's progress was stopped for about five minutes. The poor hackney-coachman has been, in consequence, sentenced to an imprisonment of four months; moreover, his vehicle has been solemnly burnt in the courtyard of the grand palace, in presence of thousands of spectators, and the horses are to be sold for the benefit of the poor."

An imperial name.—When Shakspeare made his heroine ask, "What's in a name," it is very plain, that he had never heard of the imperial title of one of the potentates of Java, the sultan of Djocjakarta, who is called Hamankoeboewoenosenonpattingatong-abgurrachmansaydinpatonogmodo. We should think it would puzzle his majesty's poet laureate to make melody of this name in verse.

The mammoth Jonathan.—Brother Jonathan is advertised to appear the mammoth to-day, being double its ordinary size. If, as promised, it contains the cream of all the English and American souvenirs, it will be a valuable and entertaining magazine of literature, which will keep one engaged nearly a week in reading.

Alexandre's exhibition.—We publish the following communication with much pleasure, coming, as it does, from an eminent and liberal-minded citizen, who has done much for the fine arts in this country, and whose opinions are always entitled to much respect:—"The times are hard; I therefore, in the true spirit of philanthropy, propose a plan by which a small investment can be made to produce great returns. There is an exhibition at the rooms of the National Academy, Clinton-Hall, of the richest cabinet of original drawings and sketches ever exhibited here. They belong to Monsieur Alexandre, the celebrated ventriloquist, who is acting at the Park Theatre. This exhibition is made by the proprietor with the greatest liberality, as the proceeds are to constitute a fund for premiums at the exhibitions of the academy; and never did artist, or amateur, or man of taste lay out twenty-five cents to more advantage than in the study of this perfectly original and unique collection. M. Alexandre has travelled in every part of Europe, and had access to all the most distinguished persons—emperors, princes, statesmen, men of science and artists, and has gleaned a port-folio of the works of the most eminent painters, done in most instances especially for him. The works of each country form a specimen of the school of modern art in that country, and bear the impress of the genius of each artist, original, authentic and characteristic of his particular style; some of surpassing merit, and others interesting as the productions of individuals, whose lofty rank places them out of the sight of ordinary mortals. In the latter class are sketches by the emperor of Russia, princes Gallizien, the king of Portugal, duke de Reichstadt, and prime ministers, counsellors of state, and 'grave and reverend seigniors' in vast numbers. Added to which, he has letters from men of letters, autographs of autocrats, and notes from persons of note, which must have required the greatest perseverance, industry, and (I should be inclined to think) personal cleverness, to obtain. It is certainly a most interesting exhibition for us simple folks; and I trust his American port-folio, which he is desirous to add to his other treasures, will prove worthy of its association. The artists owe much to the liberality with which he has laid open his riches to their inspection and that of the public, and can by their contributions greatly enhance their value. LEEUW.

NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NO. 1 BARCLAY-STREET, NEAR BROADWAY. [PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.]

VOLUME SEVENTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1839.

NUMBER TWENTY-THREE.

For the New-York Mirror.

TO A GIRL IN HER TEARS.

BY MISS VANDERHOFF.

MAIDEN, weep not! why dost thou
Wear this sadness on thy brow!
Why should care's dark rayless wing
Hover o'er so bright a thing!

Why should thy fair bosom rise,
Giving birth to heart-sent sighs!
Why are thy soft curls unbound,
Hanging like a veil around!

Love has crept wily to thy breast,
Stealing all thy soul's sweet rest;
Love!—'tis but an idle thought,
More with grief than gladness fraught.

Cast these wo-drops from thine eyes,
Let them beam like sunny skies;
Though thy spirit pine away,
Let thy lip and cheek be gay.

Let no sigh reveal thy heart,
Let no gushing tear-drop start;
Let no trembling tone betray
Aught of sorrow—now away!

ORIGINAL SPORTING SKETCHES.

HARKAWAY:

The popularity of the sporting sketch, published in the last number of the Mirror, has induced us to make another selection from the manuscript of Mr. Mills's new work.

THE OLD WHIPPER-IN.

"I have heard,
The cock, that is the trumpet of the morn,
Doth with his lofty shrill-sounding throat
Awake the god of day; and, at his warning
The ev'ning against erring spirit flies
To his condole."

It was Christmas eve. A thick sleet was falling fast, and drifting against the windows of the pack-lodge, as the superannuated whipper-in sat in a large chair before a blazing fire, instructing his son, now occupying the same situation that he did, before "age made him slacken his pace," in the important duties of "first whip," to Lord Leyborough's pack. A small round table was between the father and son, upon which stood a huge brown jug, frothing to the brim with October ale, mellowed by time and the seasons. The silver hair upon the old man's head was thin, and worn away from his smooth forehead; but health glowed in his ruddy cheek, and contentment beamed in his laughing eyes. The son, an athlete full, just in the strength of manhood, with ample shoulder and sinewy limb, resting his elbows upon the table, listened with profound attention to his father; occasionally he rose and supplied the fire with fresh logs, and then again resumed his attitude of ease, and eagerness to hear.

"It's not much believed," said the old man; "that a good whipper-in is of more consequence than a good huntsman; but my lord knows that he is—he knows that a pack ought to be kept steady, and together, which are the chief duties of a whipper-in. Now his lordship supposes that, as I did these to his satisfaction, you, being my son, ought to be able to fill the place just as well as I did; and you will too, if you follow my directions. Help yourself."

This last desire was obeyed by the son taking a long deep draught of the ale.

"Show your genius," continued the old man, "when you've a chance, by clapping for and to an open earth that the fox is making for; keep him off his foil, and be sure never attempt to stop the hounds before you get well to their heads. Don't rate before you flag; when a hound deserves the lash, hit him first and raise him afterwards. Encourage them well in cover, and give 'em plenty of have-a-care! it's the best halloo you can use; for if they're on a good scent, they won't mind it; so no harm will be done; if on a bad, it's a good warning. Always think of the tail hounds; get them on as fast as you can; but never halloo forward, except when a fox is found, as then they'll always fly to it. Bring home all your dogs, nothing is more slovenly and careless than losing hounds; keep them up and well together, then you'll seldom miss one. Never ride into the midst of the pack for a riotous round; wait for an opportunity, and then single him out, otherwise some may be rode over and the whole thrown into confusion. Be sure not to discourage a particular hound, by crying out his name for the others to hark to him! without certain of being right, as it balks and makes all of them careless of your hollow. Young whips are always wishing to get on too fast; but mind, it's the greatest fault one can commit to ride on, if a single dog remains behind. Follow these instructions, and you'll give satisfaction, Bill, my boy, to my lord, and to the hunt."

At the conclusion of this homily, the old gentleman embraced the jug, and imitated the example of his son, by quaffing a stiff pull rom its contents.

"I'll mind what you say, governor, never fear. I've seen the way in which you make the bow-wows run. A table-cloth would cover them at any time," replied Bill.

The old man smiled at the compliment and a cold night, "faith I think it a fair excuse for me. Come, spice up some ale, and clap it on the fire." Bill obeyed the order by filling a bright blood of Sir John Barclaycorn, and adding to it, nutmeg, cloves, sugar, and a brown crust of brown bread. Soon the concomitants hissed and steamed fragrantly upon the bright embers, occasioning from Bill's father a peculiar twitching of the organ having the sense of smell.

"Governour, you're-like poor old Merryman upon——"

"The right scent," interrupted the governor, "poor old fellow!"

"He was a teazer, an' no mistake," said Bill, stirring up the smoking beer with a silver ladle; the handle of which was a fawn's foot.

"An out-an'-outer. I sha'n't put eyes upon his like, that's my belief, without I see his spirit again," rejoined the old man seriously.

"His what?" exclaimed Bill, stopping, with surprise, in the act of pouring the prepared beverage into a flagon.

"His spirit, I say; but go on, my boy, that stuff smells uncommonly nice," replied his father.

Accordingly, the savoury mixture was conveyed to the wishful palate of the old man, and after it being pronounced "excellent," he took his pipe from a capacious pocket in his scarlet coat, which he continued to wear notwithstanding time had decreed that no more with him should

"Horse and hound fierce joy display, Exulting at the hark-away!"

"Instead of smoking, governor, I wish you'd say what you meant by seeing Merryman's spirit again," said Bill, "one would suppose you had seen it already."

"So I have, boy."

"Have you, though?" exclaimed Bill, a disbeliever in ghosts, spirits, hobgoblins, and all sorts of immaterial beings, "through which the moon shines unchecked."

"The truth is, Bill," slowly said the old gentleman, with a contemplative look at the white-washed ceiling, and a smack of his lips, which is often a demonstration of self-supposed importance, "I have my own particular belief, as to spirits, and such-like. Why shouldn't there be ghosts of dead monkeys as well as dead men, I should like to know. A man isn't a more wonderful beast than a monkey, and both are great rascals, to say the best of them. Some people pretend to say, that when a monkey 'turns his toes up to the root of the daisies' there's an end of him. Stuff o' nonsense! There's no end to anything. The old bricks and mortar are fresh worked into other moulds, after this fashion: monkeys become Christians, being next to human nature, and Christians, as tops of the tree, again become hay-seed or cabbages. That is to say, their shells, or outside, so after; their spirits may be disposed of differently; but I think they accompany the outside, or vegetable, as the case happens to fit."

"Why, governor! you're not a Christian," said Bill.

"The Archbishop of York couldn't prove that he was a better one than I am," rejoined the old man. "Deal as you would be dealt by, in my religion—Isn't that Christian?"

"Yes; but that's not enough to make a man a thorough-bred one," replied Bill.

"Quite enough, my boy—quite enough; for if we act towards others as we wish them to act towards us, there will be no ground for complaint in our lives—no injustice committed—no wrong intended; and these are all that can be expected from the best Christian that ever lived."

"But this has nothing to do with the subject we started with," said Bill.

"Not altogether; and yet it has something. You see, that I believe everything living has a spirit. I think, in fact, it very probable that even a turnip has a soul; at any rate, I know that a dog has, and that I saw Merryman's on the night of his death," replied the old man, looking earnestly in his son's face; to see what impression this novel statement had made.

"Do tell me all about it," rejoined Bill, his curiosity much excited, "I never heard the whole of that day's work which killed the old hound. It was a splitter, I believe."

"Do you want to hear the beginning?"

"Yes, and the end of it," replied Bill.

"Put some more wood on the fire, and close the shutters first; the cold increases with the night," said the old man, drawing his chair closer to the fire.

When Bill had obeyed this order, he placed himself in a snug corner opposite to his father, who, with a preliminary clearing of his voice, commenced—

"It will be six years ago, the ninth of next February, that we threw off at the Lynaliet cover. The sky was cloudy, and the ground covered with dew. My lord, and all the gentlemen of the hunt were out. The cover not having proved a blank any one day; the weather good, and the ground in fine order, had turned out every one of them, and a pretty crack set they were. Bob, the huntsman, had hunted all the best hounds from the kennel; not one was out of rotous, and appearances were in favour of a run not to be beaten."

"We threw off, and drew up the wind towards a stopped earth. All was very silent, for Bob as you know is never noisy, as most huntsmen are; but in the finest style of any fellow in the world, he hunts the hounds. I was about to give 'em a cheer-up, when the old leader, Merryman, gave such a long bell-like note that pleased the ear like music. Hark to Merryman! hallowed I—Tallyho! tallyho! shouted some one immediately afterwards, as the fox broke. Yoiks for 'ard! for 'ard! shouted I, and out burst every hound close to his brush; not one tailed. There was no occasion to hawl out, hold hard! No one, except Bob and me, thought of starting before my lord, and he's too good a sportsman to tear away before the proper time. But when he gives the hark-away! and any one hesitates to ride or take a leap before him, the way in which he asks what he's waiting for! is a caution not to show him so much respect for the future. He can't abide humbug in any shape."

"In a handful of seconds, on went as strong a fox as ever rattled across a country—as fine a pack o' hounds as could be unkenelled in England—as fine a gentleman for a master as ever owned a pack, and two score and six of as well mounted, straight riders, as could cross saddles; not to say anything of Bob the huntsman, and——"

"My father, the whipper-in," chimed in Bob.

"Just so, my boy; but don't interrupt me."

"For a quarter of an hour we ran in view over a heath, as level as a bowling-green. The pace was so great, and no rasps to clear, that it was more like a race than a hunt. At the other side of the heath was a deep sloping hollow; at the bottom of which was a thick growth of furze; down dipped sly Reynard among the prickles; but the hounds were so hot upon him, that they ran him through without a check in full cry. On the side he came out was a steep hill, which he climbed at the best of speed; but Merryman increased upon him so at this work, that he was obliged to turn his sharp nose again to the hollow. Now he managed to make a greater distance between the hounds and himself, by running in a slanting direction towards the bottom of the hill. When he got there, he struck along the valley with his brush straight out, and, before the dogs reached the end of the slope, he became lost to view, through this cunning gallop of his. Every hound was in full tongue, and each strained his muscles to near the fox; making the hills ring again with his hearty cry. For about twenty minutes we rattled on, without any check, and the scent breast high. The ground was rather heavy; but no strong leaping fatigued our nags. Hogged woods were now in sight, to which the fox was making, and where there were some carliss; but the stoppers had been the night before to close them up, so that there was no danger of losing him, or our having any great trouble of getting him out of these thick covers."

"I and Bob were riding neck-and-neck, when the first stiff jump was before our horses' heads. It was a rail, a deep water course, and another rail on the opposite side; a regular fly of twenty feet Bob and I exchanged looks as we neared it. I believe, and often have told him so, that he wouldn't have switched that rasper if I had not been at his side; as it was, he went at it very cautiously. Neither of the horses swerved a hair's width as they took their spring at it; but the ground being much lower on the other side, made both stagger, upon their legs, as they cleared the splitting leap."

"The hounds dived into the cover, about one hundred yards before we reached the edge of it, and the earths being stopped, they ran the fox close through it, just as they did with the other one. Before we reached the end of the wood, all were out, and again the sneaking rascal was in view, doing his best to get away. We gave him a good tallyho! and he seemed to take the cheer like a hero, for he lifted his brush a little, as much as to say, catch me who can. We now were going over a grass country at a killing pace. Mile after mile we scoured, sometimes losing sight of the fox; but for the most part running him in view; so close did the hounds press to him."

"As near as I can guess, we crossed sixteen miles nearly in a straight line from Lynam to Gosford-brook, without a breathing moment. Here we had about a couple of minutes, from the sly vermin having dipped himself in the water to lose the scent; but making a wide cast, the hounds soon picked it up, and on we went again at the same rate. Still there was a good field up, although many had been flogged at the leap Bob and I took; and those who had been thrown, not only off, but out of the sport, being unable, from the speed we went, to make up the lost distance. That day his lordship rode at everything he came to, and was close behind me the whole of the distance.

"The hounds now began to tail one after the other. I did all that was in my power to get them on; but it was no use; the poor fellows wanted as much as I did to go ahead; but the pace and distance had taken their strength away; on they could not go. 'Never mind them, James, go on, go on, they must be left and found afterwards,' said my lord, galloping past me, as I was flogging four or five of the tired dogs on.

"I was on that tip-top mare, the Maid-o-the-Mill, and leaving the hounds to drop off, as they did, one by one, at almost every stride, I took every thing as God sent it, with but five couple of them now running before us.

"After going with these over a heavy woodland country for thirty minutes, I turned my eyes round to see the state of the field; his lordship held his place; but there were but six beside him in sight. We now mounted Beach-tree hill, and were swinging it like coursing greyhounds, when I heard the view hollow from the other side. As I dipped over the top, there I saw a farmer harrowing the fox, tearing along at the bottom, as strong as ever. We kept him in view for three miles across Rington Park; but did not gain a yard upon him. A new six feet fence was being made round the park, and part of it was up, at the end he was steering for. I thought he would double when he came to it; but there was no turn in him; he charged it fresh as a three-year old, and made for a straight course to Chalk-pit rock. The dogs went at it pretty much together; four jumped against the fence, about half-way up, and fell powerless to the ground; three reached the top—scrambled upon it, for a second or two, and over they came, backwards, to join the others, panting, without strength, or breath, upon the chain Merryman, Hopeful, and Struggler, flew across, but were the only three out of the whole pack able to continue the chase.

"Bob was a short distance before me, and, to my surprise, for he has good judgment in riding, I saw him prepare to have a go at the rasper. His horse was much too tired, and so was he for such a leap; but there was no flinching in either of them. Over! cried Bob, dashing his persuaders into his horse's flanks, and throwing out his whip-hand as they rose at it. By heaven! in my whole life, I hardly ever saw such a fall! The horse struck the edge of the fence with his fore-legs, just below his knees, and over they pitched headforemost on the opposite side, enough to break every bone in their bodies. I pulled up, and, to my utter astonishment, saw Bob wiping the perspiration from his forehead, as if nothing had happened, standing by the side of his fallen horse.

"Are you hurt?" said I.

"No," replied he, "not much; but the horse is done up. I can't go any farther."

"What's the injury?" inquired my lord, striving at the spot.

"Bob's horse, and all the hounds but three, are tired out," replied I.

"Then follow on, James. I'll not have the leash whipped off," said his lordship.

"I turned the Maid-o-the-Mill's head to where the fence ended, and cutting across at her best speed, I was close again to the crack three, having the hunt all to ourselves; not one rider being now up, except myself. For nearly an hour longer we kept the pace still the same; but now I felt the mare reel and stagger under me, and I was certain another mile would be all that she could accomplish. I had not seen the fox since he jumped the park fence till now, when I saw him go into a thick osier bed, by the side of a stream, a quarter of a mile before the hounds. Merryman pressed before Hopeful and Struggler into the osiers, which made me fear both these were about giving up. Before I arrived there, the fox was through, with the old leader not fifty yards behind him; but neither of the other two with him, or in sight. At every stretch the mare took now, I expected that she would fall from weakness; the spur was not answered; and sure that she could not last five minutes longer upon her legs, I pulled up and dismounted. Upon going into the middle of the bed, I found both the hounds lying down, with their tongues stretched out, upon the ground, and their eyes ready to start from their sockets. I could still hear the cry of old Merryman, which became fainter and fainter, until I lost it altogether, as I led the mare, and made the dogs crawl after me, towards a cottage in sight.

"After attending to the poor, worn-out, and punished animals, I procured a sort of a conveyance on wheels, and a lame pony, to take me to the nearest post town, where I got a chaise and pair of fast tuis to help me on the road home. Knowing our master would be very wishful to know what became of us, I was determined to get home that night, and send the next morning for the horse and dogs I had to travel thirty-seven miles from the cottage to the hall, and it was late in the evening before I arrived home. Upon sending in word to my lord that I had returned, I was summoned into the dining-room, where I found him comfortably stretched upon a sofa smoking a cigar."

"Well, James, did you kill him?" inquired his lordship.

"I then told him all that had happened. He was very much pleased with old Merryman's continuing the hunt; and, after hearing what I had to say, he told me that all the hounds, but a brace, were picked up on the way home, and ordered me to start, with some help, early in the morning, to get these, and Merryman."

"Do you think the old hound would run much farther?" asked he.

"Both the fox and hound were very strong, my lord, when I left them," replied I.

"The noble old fellow! Get to rest as soon as you can, and start with the dog-cart, by day-break, for him," said his lordship.

"It was a clear bright night when I turned into the bed, which you now occupy, over the kennel. Nothing could be heard save the deep breathing of the tired-out hounds, that were crouched in sleep, and the bubbling of the stream through the water-cour; however, I soon became unconscious of these sounds.

"I was dreaming of

Merryman, spurs, and leather breeches,
Falls, fences, and swinging o'er rails and ditches, when I awoke with every dog howling at his utmost stretch. I jumped up, blessing the cause of the noisy brutes' row, and was soon among them whip in hand; but there was no quarrel or fight, and I could see nothing amiss. All were huddled together like a frightened flock of sheep, and on they kept crying just as if the cord was being put upon them. To tell the truth, I felt somewhat queer at this, and my voice didn't seem quite so firm as usual, when I hallooed and urged them to be quiet. In a short time I managed to get peace, and I tried to find out the reason of all this rumpus. I looked here and there, but to no purpose, and began to think that a hound had been in my dream, which set the others on, when, in the airing ground, I saw, as plain as I now see you, old Merryman standing in the pale light of the moon, with his bushy tail fanning to and fro, and his ears thrown back upon his white neck, as it was his custom when pleased. Not thinking of the impossibility of his return, I called the old fellow to me, delighted and surprised at seeing him; but there he remained, waving his tail and looking at me. I walked two or three steps towards him, when he glided away into the mist, gradually fading from my sight, till he disappeared altogether, just as the first rays of light broke through the morning fog.

"I felt very uncomfortable, if not frightened at this sight, and returned to my room, to dress and prepare for my journey. As soon as the apparition, or whatever it was, left, the dogs recovered from their fright, and began to stretch their legs as usual about the yard. With a heavy heart, I started in the dog-cart, with a pair of good horses, to search for the old leader, and the other two hounds. After inquiring along the road, I found at a farm house, about twenty miles from the kennel, the brace, foot-sore and famished. I boxed them in the cart, and proceeded, with fresh horses, to the cottage where I had left the mare and the other brace of hounds. I put a stable-boy, that I had taken with me, upon the mare, directing him to walk her gently home, and went on to inquire for Merryman. After making, a man ploughing told me, that he saw one hound in full cry cross the road, about where I was, on his way from his work the night before. This was the first piece of intelligence I had received concerning the old hound. As I proceeded, and was turning down a lane in the direction that he took, according to the ploughman's statement, I saw a shepherd unfolding his flock. I inquired of him if he had heard or seen the hound."

"Yes, sir," replied he, "just inside of that brushwood I saw a dead hound and fox, lying close to each other, this morning at sunrise; and there I left them."

"I ran as fast as I could to the spot. About six feet in the thicket laid poor old Merryman and the fox, dead and stiff. Both had run their lives out at the same time. The gay old hound's teeth had not touched the fox; he had not been mounded; but died, as the hound did, with the race alone.

"A white frost had crisped the hair of the two matchless fellows, and the rays of the morning sun glittered upon their frozen coats. As I looked upon them with a quivering lip, and tearful eyes. For six years he had been the favourite; I was with him the first time he sung his song at a cub, and from that moment, when his cry was rung, he never was at fault. Poor old fellow! there he was, stretched upon the ground dead; never could his note again make our hearts leap with joy, as it used when he gave his signal for Reynard to unkennel. However, if he had lived, he would have been on the shelf now, as I am; as it was, he died the dashing leader of the pack."

A pause ensued for some minutes, after the whippet-in had concluded the account of old Merryman's last hunt. At length Bill said:

"There's nothing to be sorry for in a hound like him, ending his day in the way he did!"

"No, my boy, no. I agree with you in that. Here I am, you see, worn out, and obliged to take an old nurse's place now of lodge-keeper, to open the park gates."

"Not obliged, father—for my lord wished you to live in a cottage upon the estate, and do nothing," replied the son.

"I know that; but I'm not going to eat the bread of idleness as long as I can crawl," Bill rejoined the father.

"It was past twelve, and the old whippet-in was beginning to evince signs of required sleep, when the hunt was taken by Bill, who slowly rose from his position of comfort before the fire, and lighted his stable-lamp. After peeping into the ale jug, which, to his surprise, had been emptied at intervals by his father, he buttoned up his warm coat, and shaking the old man's hand, wished him a "merry Christmas," and took his leave. The door had but just closed, when he returned, and, with a look of assumed seriousness, said—

"What do you say as to the ghost or apparition that appeared on the morning of Merryman's death?"

"What do I say?" repeated the old man. "Why, that it was his spirit come to warn me of his death, to be sure."

"Did you ever see it again?" inquired his son.

"Never, my boy—never," was the reply.

"What do you think became of it?" asked Bill.

"Why, as to that matter, I can't say exactly; but I shouldn't wonder, when I reflect," said the old man, pressing a finger upon his brow, "that the spirit of Merryman may be in the puppy Trim-bush."

GAETIES AND GRAVITIES.

THE EDITOR, BY ONE.

THE editor is the dupe of destiny. His lot was knocked down to him a hard one, and it turns out to be a take-up. His land of promise is a moving bog. His bed of roses is a high-backed chair stuffed with thorns. His laurel wreath is a garland of nettles. His honours resolve themselves into a capital hoax—his pleasures are heavy penalties—his pride is the snuff of a candle—his power but volumes of smoke. The editor is the most ill-starred man alive. He, and he alone—the thousand pretenders about town notwithstanding—is indeed the identical martyr commonly talked of as the most ill-used individual. He seems to govern opinion, and is in reality a victim to the opinions of others. He incurs more than nine-tenths of the risk and responsibility, and reaps less than one-tenth of the reward and reputation. The defects of his work are literally assigned to him—the merits of it are magnanimously imputed to his correspondents. If a bad article appears, the editor is ansparsingly condemned—if a brilliant one be inserted, Anonymous carries off the eulogium. The editorial function is supposed to consist: "in the substitution of 'if it be' for 'if it is,' and the insertion of the word 'however' here and there, to impede the march of a fine style." Grammar and collocation are the only points he is reputed to make—his niche of fame is merely a parenthesis—but is but a note of admiration to genius! His life is spent in ushering clever people into deserved celebrity—he sits as charioteer, outside the vehicle, in which prodigious talents are driven to immortality.

It is his fortune to insert all his contributors in the temple of glory, and to exclude himself for want of space. He is always "going in," but expires unpublished at last. He bestows personal popularity on thousands, without securing posthumous renown as his own share. His career in this life is a tale of mystery—"to be continued in the next." He is only thought of when things go wrong in the journal. Curiosity then looks out at the corners of its eyes, and with brows and lips pursed up, curiously ejaculates, "who is he?" If by any chance, praise instead of censure should be mediated, the wrong man is immediately mentioned. People are only certain of their editor when they are going to horsewhip him. There is a brief passage or two in an indifferent article, you may be sure that they are not indolent for that polish to the editorial pen. Is there a dull phrase or a harsh period in some favourite contribution? Oh, the editor has altered it, or neglected to revise the press! But if the editor is abused for what he inserts, he is twice abused for what he rejects. It is a curious feature of his destiny, that if he strikes out but a single line of an article, whether in verse or in prose, that very line is infallibly the crowning beauty of the production. It is not a little odd, that when he declines a paper, that paper is sure to be by far the best thing the author ever wrote.

Accepted articles may be bad; rejected ones are invariably good. It is admitted that judgment is the first essential for an editorship, and it is at the same time insisted on, that judgment is exactly the quality which the editor has not. An author is praised in a review—he is grateful to an individual writer, whose name he has industriously inserted; or an author is condemned in a review—he is unsparsingly disgusted with the editor. Week after week, month, after month, the said editor succumbs the oppressed, raises up the weak, applauds virtue, exalts talent—he pines or promulgates the praises of friends—of their books, pictures, acting, safety-lamps, and steam paddles—but from the catalogue of golden names, his own is an eternal absentee.

DIONYSIUS, THE LISTENER.—Among the "rubbish" of the ruined city of Syracuse, in Sicily, there is a cavern cut out of the rock called the "Ear of Dionysius," which is no less a monument of the ingenuity and magnificence, than the cruelty of that tyrant. It is in the form of the human ear, in perpendicular height eighty feet, and in length not less than two hundred and fifty feet. The cavern is said to be so contrived that every sound made in it was collected and united into one point. This was called the tympanum, and opposite to it the tyrant had made a small hole which communicated with a little apartment where he used to conceal himself, and applying his own ear to this hole he could hear distinctly every word that was spoken in the cavern below. No sooner was the apartment finished, and a proof of it made, than he put to death all the men who had been employed in its construction; he then confined all whom he suspected were his enemies, overheard their conversation, judged of their guilt or innocence, and condemned or acquitted them accordingly.

BALLOONING.—According to a Paris paper a M. Gornein is constructing a balloon at the Ecole Militaire, which he proposes to direct through the air as he pleases. On each side of the car he has adapted four palletes, resembling the wings of a wind-mill, which he puts in motion by means of a secret internal mechanism. The resistance of the air to every pallette that strikes it is reflected upon the balloon and carries it forward, just like the flying bird or swimming fish.

SINGULAR CHERRY.—A Russian countess being persecuted by her creditors for debt, on the porter's acquainting her excellency that the poorer class attended at the gate, she ordered the servant to throw out a bag of copper money among them, and while they were scrambling for it, to let loose a bear at them.

CURIOUS PUMPE.—"The fact is, we are all in one ship"—and when she has sprung a leak, and the gale is carrying away spars and sails, we shall all go to the bottom together, unless all are willing to take their turn at the pump, or perform such other duty as the exigency requires."

QUACKS.—Quacks are said to be good friends to regular physicians, as they limit the number of murders of which they commit. The physicians might say, "save us from our friends."

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

MARY LIVINGSTON; A TALE OF REAL LIFE.

BY JAMES ALDRICH.

"She moved upon this earth a shape of brightness,
A power, that from its objects sharply drew
One impulse of her being—in her lightness
Most like some radiant cloud of morning dew,
Which wanders through the waste air's pathless blue,
To nourish some far desert: she did seem Beside me, gathering beauty as she grew,
Like the bright shade of some immortal dream
Which walks, when tempests sleep, the wave of life's dark stream."

In one of the loveliest spots on the banks of the river Rhine, beneath the ruined castle of Elselben, which hangs like a dark cloud over the waves, are the remains of a Roman fountain, the design of which is a lion reposing on a massive marble pediment. The pediment is elaborately and exquisitely adorned with appropriate figures in relief—the subjects taken for the most part from the heathen mythology. For ages tradition has awarded to the fountain its Egeria, and travellers passing by the Rhine seldom fail to stop at the little hamlet of Urflo, hard by, to visit the castle, or to consult, if possible, the divinity of the place. But neither the divinity nor the castle had induced the young sculptor, Ernest Wernlander, to visit the fountain; he was attracted by its fame as a work of art, and came to study and copy the reliefs.

Wernlander had been educated in one of the best German universities; at times he had given up his whole soul to the study of chemistry, astronomy, and poetry; these he left in disgust for the chisel of the sculptor; he did not lack genius nor ability, but that resolution and firmness of purpose, without which mental power is ever unproductive. His character was an anomaly not infrequently observed in young men of genius; he was a misanthrope, and had lived twenty-three years in the world without loving any one; at times he doubted the existence of virtue, the truth of the revealed religion, almost his own being, and was ever sighing for an ideal good which never existed except in the imagination; yet no base thoughts nor passions found a home in his heart, which was ever alive to noble sentiments and tender sensitivities: with truth he might have said of himself:

"To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often he too deep for tears."

It has been well observed by the author of Christabel that the best way to bring a clever young man, who has become skeptical and unsettled, to reason, is to make him feel something in any way. Love, if sincere and unworried, will, in nine instances out of ten, bring him to a sense and assurance of something real and actual; and that sense alone will make him think to a sound purpose, instead of dreaming that he is thinking.

In the autumn of 18—, an American gentleman, with his son and daughter, was making a pilgrimage up the Rhine; the father was an invalid, and on arriving at Urflo the party stopped partly to recover from the fatigue of travelling, and partly to enjoy the beauty and sublimity of the scenery which there meet the eye of the traveller at every turn.

"The day was in the golden west," and the dark shadow of Elselben lay upon the river and valley, making an agreeable twilight, when Mary Livingston—for such was our fair traveller's name—tempted by an adventurous spirit, and a natural fondness for solitary musings, wandered alone to the haunted fountain. Mary Livingston was then in her nineteenth year, of that delicate figure characteristic of the American lady; the curved lines of her fine form, the beauty of its flexible sinuities, it were difficult to portray in words; her countenance, though unexpressive of impassioned melancholy, was marked with a tender and pathetic beauty, harmonizing with the spirit within her, and expressing at once innocence and sublimity of soul; her eyes were large and full, of a dark lustrous brown, telling of tender feelings and a constant serenity of mind; but the most beautiful feature of her face was her lips, around the tremulous curve of which a faint smile of indescribable sweetness ever circled.

In the dark shade of some lindens trees beside the fountain, his head resting upon his hand, lay Ernest Wernlander; beside him were his unfinished drawings, which the gathering twilight had caused him to lay aside, and he was lost in a day-dream in which visions of the past, present, and future, were all indistinctly blended. On the approach of his fair visitor he started in astonishment from his reverie, half believing in the tradition which assigned to the fountain a spiritual attendant.

"Gentle lady," said Wernlander, "if I may be pardoned in addressing one in whose presence nothing, certainly, but the most fortunate chance could have brought a poor artist—there is a legend, with which you are doubtless well acquainted, that an attendant spirit presides at this fountain, whose only employment is in doing acts of charity to the pilgrim and wayfarer; forgive me for saying, when first I saw you, the fiction—for such in sober reason we must regard it—seemed reality; nor without cause, for none but one of gentle heart would, unattended, seek this lonely recess at such an hour."

"The hour is later than I deemed it," said the fair visitor, with timidity, "or I should not have ventured so far without the attendance of my brother, who, with my father, is at the inn in the hamlet below."

"Fear not, lady," replied Wernlander, "for such poor attendance as I can offer I shall be too happy in granting."

Mary Livingston, gathering confidence from the kindly tones and demeanour of Wernlander, said, "I would the twilight were not so deep, for much of the delicate tracery of the reliefs is imperceptible for want of light, and I have been told the ornamental designs are the chief attractions of the fountain as a work of art."

"But the effect of the whole is greatly heightened," replied Wernlander, "by twilight; the rough outlines of those rocks are softened, and the beautiful is almost exalted to the sublime: even that rude cross, bending with age, to the left of the fountain, which in the glaring light of noon would be nothing more than a monkish device, is now a hallowed symbol, subduing by its presence the turbulent passions of the heart, and lifting the soul above the gloom of this cloud-encircled world into the serene light of the stars."

"It is doubtless as you say; to-morrow I will come here at noon, that I may contrast the effects of different lights upon a scene so picturesque and beautiful," replied Mary Livingston, and turned to depart, in such a manner as to signify to Wernlander that his attendance would not be welcome. Wernlander gathered up his drawings and accompanied her to the door of her inn, and taking respectful leave promised, at her request, to send his drawings on the following day for her to examine.

The morning of a new existence had dawned upon Wernlander; his past life seemed an idle and half-forgotten tale, and he felt the moment of the meeting at the haunted fountain to be the point of time from which to date his new being. Restless and tortured with conflicting hopes and misgivings he retired to his chamber, but in vain essayed to sleep; in the drapery of his couch he saw the delicately moulded form of Mary Livingston; he looked from his window, and in the blended beauty of the sky and stars beheld her eyes; he listened to the night-wind, and in its low breathings recognized the gentle tones of her voice.

The following morning Mary related to her father, and brother Herbert, her adventure at the fountain, and the interest the young sculptor had awakened in her; her father listened with pleasure to the unaffected narrative, but Herbert petulantly expressed his displeasure at what he was pleased to term his sister's imprudence. While they were conversing upon the subject, a servant brought into the drawing-room the address of Wernlander. "Bid him come in," said the old gentleman, and Wernlander entered with a portfolio of drawings. Herbert sneeringly looked at him and left the apartment. The insult momentarily placed Wernlander under painful restraint, from which, however, he was soon relieved by the marked civilities of both father and daughter. The conversation was unrestrained, turning chiefly upon the masterly works of ancient art, a subject introduced by the drawings which Wernlander had brought with him.

"We shall set out to-morrow," said Mr. Livingston, "on our pilgrimage; our destination is Rome, where we propose spending the winter, and it were fortunate for me if I could meet you there and avail myself of your taste and assistance in making a small collection of statuary, which I am anxious to take to the new world, as relics of the glory of the old."

Wernlander's heart sank within him when he heard the time of the intended departure was so near; Mary observed his emotion and could not misunderstand its cause; a feeling of sympathy, akin to love, prompted her to say that her heart responded to her father's wishes that they might meet again at Rome; "at least," continued she, fearing she had expressed herself too warmly, "it would be gratifying to have you write to my father there, and give him such aid as could be conveyed by a letter. Her words were soothing to the feelings of Wernlander, who felt if he could continually enjoy the presence of the fair being before him his love would soon be exalted into adoration. Wernlander departed from the inn; he saw not Mary Livingston again till the next morning, as she was entering her father's carriage on the point of taking a final leave of Urflo; as she bade adieu she carelessly dropped a flower from her hand, which Wernlander caught. Who could estimate the value of that little flower to him! In a few moments the carriage receded from sight. The accustomed pursuits and pleasures of life became repulsive to Wernlander, who suffered that mental enervation which always succeeds extravagant mental excitement.

When time had somewhat softened his regrets, he again pursued his studies and endeavoured to forget the adventure at the fountain, or only to remember it as a pleasing incident in the drama of life. A month had passed away since the parting, when, one evening, sitting in his solitary chamber, his memory recalled the form of Mary Livingston, her tones, her words, and above all her look at parting; the fountain of his love was unsealed, and tears were the silent expression of the emotion that thrilled his heart.

To the heart-afflicted it is a consolation to weep in silence—to conceal the sorrow that cannot be assuaged; and it was not to excite sympathy in the breast of Mary Livingston that Wernlander wrote to her the following letter:

"In addressing one whom I can never hope to see, from whom I can never hope to hear, there can, at least, be no insincerity. The bitter pangs of disappointed wishes torture me with their stings, and despair mocks me with melancholy sighs, like the lamenting voice of the night-wind breathing through withered sedge; yet, when I recall the past, my heart's misereere is changed to

"A more precipitated vein
Of notes, that eddy in the flow
Of smoothest song, they come, they go,
And leave their sweeter understrain,
Its own sweet self—a love of thee
That seems, yet cannot greater be."

Before I knew you, I had supposed that love, such as is traced by the glowing pencil of genius, existed only in the fervid imagination of the poet; experience has taught me how erroneous was my opinion.

"You are now in Rome, the sepulchre of the past. What a world of human woes, of love, ambition, and glory, lies there entombed! the thought is a satire upon the contending emotions which afflict me. Last night I dreamed I sat beside you upon a fallen column, among shattered capitals and cornices of delicate sculpture, within the ruins of the coliseum; through the immense rifts in the walls and crumbling arches, over which enormous blocks of stone were hanging totteringly, the full moon rained down its sanctifying beams upon us: my sense of pleasure was unutterable, and I awoke to weep that it was only a dream.

"In a few weeks I shall set out for Florence; but I shall depart without that ardour so necessary to ensure success in a difficult pursuit. Do you remember the closing part of poor Thekla's song? I have enjoyed the happiness of this world—I have loved and I have loved. Adieu! Heaven love and protect you."

In accordance with the determination expressed in this letter, Wernlander removed to Florence, and placed himself under the tuition of the greatest modern sculptor. With Florence—that museum of the arts—he was delighted; the gloomy grandeur of its public edifices, those stupendous and enduring monuments to the genius of Lippo, accorded happily with his feelings, and became to him holy and spiritual companions.

Mary Livingston remained, during the winter, with her father and brother at Rome. Her beauty, the gentleness of her manners, and the brilliancy of her genius, captivated the best of the foreign society then residing there. Early in the ensuing spring, while her father was making preparations to depart from Rome, she was attacked with a fever, peculiar to the place, and in three days thereafter, she, who seemed made to bless all who came within the rainbow circle of her influence; she, to whom the future seemed only a continuation of innocent delights, had departed—Mary Livingston was no more! Her grave was made in the beautiful protestant cemetery, a burial-ground of which one who now sleeps there said, "It might make one in love with death, to think that one should be buried in so sweet a place."

The protestant cemetery is devoted to the burial of strangers who die in Rome, and no spot in the world urges on the mind of the spectator such melancholy reflections, such silent and profitable admonitions of the utter vanity of human life and human ambition. On that beautiful plain a host of young and ardent aspirants for fame "have pitched in heaven's smile their camp of death," painters, poets, and sculptors, "the inheritors of unfulfilled renown," there repose, who were cut off in the morning of existence, ere the prize for which they were toiling was won; and many who in life mourned over broken affections, whose hearts were living sepulchres, there sleep, unweakened by dreams, beneath a green coverlet, pranked with wild violets and daisies.

"Go thou to Rome, at once the paradise,
The grave, the city, and the wilderness,
And where its wrecks like shattered mountains rise,
And flowering weeds, and fragrant copes dress
The bones of devaluation's nakeness.
Pass, till the spirit of the spot shall lead
Thy footsteps to a slope of green access,
Where, like an infant's arm o'er the dead,
A light of laughing flowers along the grass is spread"

Spiritless and broken-hearted, the disconsolate father pursued his way to Florence, for the purpose of completing his collection of statuary. In an obscure street he found the studio of an eminent artist, and examining a variety of specimens of his workmanship, he was suddenly overwhelmed with astonishment by seeing before him a statue, exquisitely chiselled, and perfectly representing the form, features, and expression of her whom he had recently consigned to the grave. The old man could not conceal his emotion, his eyes were suffused into tears as he inquired into the history of the statue.

"That," said the sculptor, "is the work of a young German artist, named Wernlander; he called it the nymph of the fountain; the execution is admirable, but the design faulty—almost ridiculous—if, indeed, he intended it as an ideal creature to ornament a fountain; but his singular history justifies the belief that the statue is a representation of some object of his affections; he was found dead beside it some weeks since, having destroyed himself with poison."

The old man covered his face and left the apartment. That statue now adorns a mansion in the state of New-York.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

GOETHE'S FAUSTUS.

FIFTH NOTICE.

PASS we over the interview between Mephistopheles, in the professor's garb, with the student, and join Faustus on his airy journey with his servant. The old man enters upon his new life. And first, to Auerbach's cellar at Leipzig, and the drinking bout of merry companions; a novel brotherhood, surely, for the reclusive student. Here Mephistopheles gives the doctor a touch of his jugglery. Whimsical enough is this scene, strangely contrasting, in its effects, with the previous incidents of the poem; but we cannot quote it at length, and it may not be mutilated.

Auerbach's cellar is a favourite resort in Leipzig; after the same fashion, we suppose, with less classic cellars in other European cities—the like whereof we may not find in our own metropolis, save in the subterranean chambers of Payne, or Sandy Welch. Hayward tells us that he supped at Auerbach's during his last visit to Germany, and took some pains to learn the traditions connected with it from a communicative waiter. Thus he learned that there was no doubt of his being seated in the very vault where both Faustus and Goethe had caroused; and was favoured with the sight of an old copy of Widman, which had been in the cellar, as a sort of heir-looms, for at least three centuries. In the vault are two very old paintings, supposed to commemorate Faust's achievements. One represents him carousing at table with the students; the other exhibits him in the act of passing out the door upon a cask, while the spectators are holding up their hands in an expression of wonder.

Roscoe, in his German Novelists, gives the following account of the magical exploits which are developed in Goethe's text: "At the city of Prague is a publican's house, known by the sign of the anchor, where the doctor one day called as he was upon a tour. Seating himself among the travellers, in a short time he thus accosted them: 'Gentlemen, would you like to partake of all kinds of foreign wines in the world?' The whole party, with one accord, cried out—'Yes, yes.' 'Then, will you first like to taste the French, Spanish, Rhenish, Malaga, or any another kind?' continued he—'whichever you most approve.' Upon this, one of the guests exclaimed: 'Doctor Faustus! whatever wine you please to furnish, doctor, we shall find some means of disposing of it.' Whereupon he begged them to provide him with plenty of bottles and glasses, and he would supply the rest. This being done, he bored several holes in the table, and, placing a funnel in each, he held the bottles under it, and decanted as much wine as they would contain. As he laid them down one after another, the delighted guests began to laugh heartily, and heartily did they regale themselves."

Next the curtain rises upon the witches' kitchen. Here we find Faustus and Mephistopheles, surrounded by the strange figures of cat-apes; the room furnished with all manner of fantastic articles, and on a low hearth a large caldron boiling over the fire. This a female cat-ape is watching, skimming it, and careful that it does not over-boil. The object of this visit seems to be, to procure a draught from the witches that shall make Faustus young again. The fountain of youth is to bubble from the witches' caldron:

FAUSTUS

This senseless witchcraft sickens and disgusts me—
And sayest thou that I shall recruit life's powers,
Here, in this loathsome den of filthy madness!
Shall I petition an old hag for counsel?
And can the nauseous puddle of that pot
Make me a younger man by thirty winters?
There's little hope if thou hast nothing better—
My expectation is already gone!
Is there in Nature no restorative
But this! Has Spirit never yet devised
Means different to restore the spring of life!

MEPHISTOPHELES

Now do I recognize my friend's good sense.
Yes! there are also natural means, by which Life's bloom and vigour may again be given;
But in a different book this lesson lies,
And it forms an odd chapter.

FAUSTUS

There is a means, and it requires not gold,
Magic, or medicine; away with you
Into the fields—begin to hew and delve—
Confine yourself, and limit every wish,
Within a narrow circle—fed upon
Meats, simple, undisguised—and live; in short,
Beast-like, 'mong beasts; deem it no degradation
Thyself to spread the dung upon the field.
The growth of which thou art to reap. This, is,
Indeed, the best way to repair life's powers,
And wear at eighty a hale countenance.

FAUSTUS

This cannot be. I am not used to it—
Nur can I learn to take up now the spade.
Such narrow life would never do for me

No, surely! That day has passed. The simple, sober, unexciting pleasures of rural life can find no sympathy in a heart filled with the demon of unrest. To the spirit that consumes itself—that joys not but in repining—that looks back upon a void past, and forward to a void future, there is no hope or health in the gentle restoratives of nature. "Babble not to such a spirit of green fields, the pomp of autumnal forests, the magnificence of the uprising dawn, the musical flow of waters, or the quiet influences shed from the resplendent heavens in the star-light ramble. The chase delights him not; for, Actæon-like, he is the victim, and not the huntsman; the hall-hounds are unkenelled, and have fastened their fangs upon his soul!

Rejecting nature, Faustus must revert to witchcraft. The cat-apes play strange gambols, and Mephistopheles jests with them with a most gay familiarity. Faustus keeps aloof, disgusted with their ugly shapes and fantastic tricks, till his eye rests upon a glass, which reveals to him a vision of unwonted beauty.

FAUSTUS

What is this that I see!—how heavenly fair
The form that shines in this enchanted glass!
Oh! lend me, Love, thy swift and silent wings,
That I may fly away to where she is!
Near me she seems, yet hopelessly removed,
And living in another atmosphere!
Alas! if from this spot I do but stir,
If I but venture to approach more near,
There seems a dusky cloud to gather o'er her
Image of woman, beyond woman fair.
Oh! beautiful transcendently—has earth
Charms such as this!—in that reclining form,
Say, rather, that all charms of many heavens
United are. Can this, indeed, be woman!
Can this, indeed, be a created being!

MEPHISTOPHELES

Fine cause of wonderment!—after seven days
Of work, if he who made this pretty world,
And who admired his workmanship, made something
Worth looking at! Ay, gaze on her in rapture—
This, by the way, is one of these same treasures
That I am pretty safe in promising.

Blessed is the man who brings the fair bride home!
(Faustus continues looking into the glass—Mephistopheles, leaning on the settee, and with the velvet in his hand, continues speaking.)

Here on my kingly throne I sit me down,
With sceptre too—I only want a crown.

(The apes, who have been playing all kind of fantastic gambols, bring Mephistopheles a crown with loud acclamation.)

Monarch proud—
With sweat and blood—
Swear it—wear it—

(They handle the crown awkwardly, and break it in two pieces, with which they go dancing about.)

'Tis done—'twas to be—
We speak and we see—
We hearken—we listen—
We rhyme and we reason.

Faustus still remains with his eyes fixed upon the glass. His heart is on fire, and he would fain quit this scene of loathsome jugglery. But, in their sports with the funny and lively Mephistopheles, the cat-apes have forgotten the caldron, which boils over; a great blaze arises and streams up the chimney. This brings down through the flame the old witch, mistress of the mansion, who had been carousing on the house-top. Screaming she comes, and salutes with strange imprecations her unexpected visitor. Dipping the ladle in the caldron, she sprinkles the flames upon the intruders and the neglectful cat-apes. Mephistopheles thinks all this "exquisite fine fun," and whisks his fan about, breaking the pots and glasses, and kicking up a most diabolical bobby.

MEPHISTOPHELES

Broken, broken!
Hell-broth splashing,
Glasses crashing,
Payment for the words you've spoken!
It is all in sport, my honey!
Nothing but a frolic funny!
Keeping time, old carrion odious,
Filly with thy voice melodious!

(The witch steps back with rage and astonishment.)

Knowest thou no more than that o' me,
Thou raw-boned old anatomy!
Skeleton! the devil blest her!
Know you not your lord and master!
Shall I dash the old deceiver's
Boots into a thousand shivers!
Smash her cat and crooks together!
Know ye not my vest's red leather!
Know ye not the cock-tail feather!
What mask is there upon my features,
To hide me thus from my own creatures!
And am I called upon to mention
My name, my rank, and my pretension!

THE WITCH

Pardon, my lord, this rough salute;
I do not see the cloven foot—
And where are your two ravens!—where!

MEPHISTOPHELES

Enough, old fool; for once I spare
'Tis long since we have met, and strange
Has been, in such a time, the change—
The world's grown wise—in every movement
Is seen the Spirit of Improvement—
Reform to everything extended;
Among the rest, the devil is mended;
For court has left his wildernesses,
Thrown off his ancient savage dresses;
The curling tail, and talons horrid,
And horns to guard the wrinkled forehead,
All gone—the northern phantom's vanished,
By modern education banished!
As to the foot—against my will,
I bear that witness with me still;
'Twould injure me in the good graces
Of some who figure in high places,
So, what I can I do to hide it,
And for the purpose am provided
With padded calves; and thus am able
To limp no more than fashionable—
Many young men, that I might mention,
Avail themselves of the invention

THE WITCH

Satan again—my own old boy,
Once more with me! I'll die with joy

After some further discourse of the same fashion, the witch asks them, with all civility, what they would desire to drink. Mephistopheles tells her that he will have a bumper of the right old stuff. Forthwith the witch describes a circle, with extraordinary gestures; the glasses, meanwhile, begin to ring, and the caldron to make music. Racing the cat-apes within the circle, she brings a great book, which she rests on the back of one of these fantastic creatures, while others of them hold torches. Faustus, also, must come within the magic ring, and the witch begins to declaim from the book with great vehemence in very good witch-nonsense. Mephistopheles bears with the foolery till he thinks of the beverage that was brewing about to his taste, when he exclaims:

Enough—enough! incomparable Sybil!
Hands us the drink—fill the cup to the brim;

No thimblefuls for us—no niggard dribble—
Fear not—such draught will never injure him—
He is one of us, and of the highest grade—
Has drunk deep before now—be not afraid!

(The witch, with many ceremonies, pours the drink into a cup; as Faustus raises it to his mouth, a light flame rises.)

Off with it, fast—why should you fear it?
Once down, 'twill warm your heart and cheer it.
How's this!—my friend, and much the same
As one of us, afraid of flame!

(The witch dissolves the circle. Faustus steps out.)

MEPHISTOPHELES (to FAUSTUS)

Now! out at once! you must not rest!

WITCH (to FAUSTUS)

Much good may it do! (Aside.)—I hope the best!

MEPHISTOPHELES (to the WITCH)

If I can serve you, sure you might Command me, on Walpurgis' night.

THE WITCH

Here is a song—a pretty glee.
Hum it a few times—you will see
Some merit in it, and effect
More than they would at first expect.

MEPHISTOPHELES (to FAUSTUS)

Come, quick! be for the present guided!
This draught will do you good, provided
It gets fair play; but it requires
Brisk motion till the frame perspires,
And its full force is felt to dart
At once through each and every part.
And then, not sooner, will I teach
What joys the lazy hand can reach
Of indolent voluptuousness—
The pleasures that our nobles bless.
Soon in thy cheery heart, I trow,
Will Cupid rock him to and fro.
Already the young urchin lurks
Within, and in the spirit works.

FAUSTUS

Once more!—one other look into the glass!
Fair form—too fair more than a form to be!

MEPHISTOPHELES

Come! come! no form the beauties can surpass,
That soon in living woman thou shalt see!
(Aside.)—With this draught in him, he will meet
A Helena in every street.

Sent abroad thus ripe for mischief, we may well believe that he makes rapid progress in the arts of his new scholarship. Of that more on the return of Saturday. There has been a blank of some weeks between our numbers, lest by too frequent coming we might wear out our welcome. This we shall mend. Parting the present company of the witches—walks before us, as before Faustus in the Mirror, the matchless MARGARET. May we live to see you better acquainted!

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

JOURNAL OF THE PERSIAN PRINCES.

INN AT EXETER.—A wonderful lofty building; consisting of many rooms which are royally furnished. These rooms have places for washing, the hot water was quite ready placed on the wash-hand table, standing before the large looking-glasses, and towels hanging down exceeding clean, with perfumed articles and fine soap. Every traveller is shown to a room to himself, attended by a servant. In every room there is a splendid bedstead with everything belonging to it; ink and pen, with fine paper, are placed on a table, for the convenience of travellers. Fine-looking women also serve here, and everything is most desirable. The rooms for eating are separate from the bed-rooms; where there are fine large tables, furnished with all sorts of eatables, both cooked and uncooked; everything that you may desire and imagine is placed on the table. Many people were sitting round the tables taking their breakfasts, others reclining on the sofas. We were quite astonished at this house, and asked whose it was, and we were informed that it belonged to an individual whose business is to entertain strangers and travellers; and as he knows the time that the mails come in, all things are made ready for travellers to take their breakfast, that no time may be lost. Moreover, we were informed that there are in this country about five thousand such public places; each of them gains about one thousand toman per day; indeed, the money here is like dust.

WINDSOR CASTLE.—This superior palace is situated in a garden, or park, fifty-two miles in circumference, which is surrounded by a wall of iron bars about three yards and a half high. The park has strong gates, splendidly wrought, and through it runs several fine streams like rose-water, and its trees are most noble, producing a most beautiful shade. The carriage-roads are so finely paved, that a person might take his repose upon them. Roses of every kind, and flowers of every hue, are in this park. Its land is green, like emerald, its prospect is pleasure to the eye. Gazelles, antelopes, and deer, are here in thousands. Pheasants, partridges, woodcocks, and game of every kind, abound, all of which are enjoying this delightful place. Nightingales, goldfinches, and their associates, keep, with their sweet voices, watch in this garden. It is naturally carpeted with a rich green velvet. My pen tells me, do not proceed; I am incapable of describing it—it is Paradise. In one part of this Eden, there is a hill, two miles in circumference, on which the palace is built; it is about two thousand yards in height, and affords a most beautiful view of the park. The mind cannot but be astonished at this splendid edifice, whose description exceeds the power of human writers. Each of the kings, for two hundred years past, has had a separate palace in this castle, with distinct majestic splendour of sovereignty, as may be now seen, just as they were when these sovereigns occupied them. And whatever unique jewels each sovereign obtained during his reign are placed in his palace, with his statue, either of marble, jasper, or porphyry, seated on a jewelled throne; so beautifully made, that you might say it is alive, and can speak. One statue of a former king cost more than twelve thousand toman. All his ministers and officers of state during his reign, have also statues placed by him in the room, each with arms of the age, and appearing as if they were alive. In the royal rooms of the late kings all are seated on their thrones and chairs of gold, embroidered with precious stones, which cost millions of minted gold; each has his crown on his head of a hundred mauns of solid pure gold, and adorned with precious stones, so magnificent as to take the senses away. These crowns are supported by chains of gold, and suspended over the heads of the sovereigns. We also noticed several rooms, three hundred feet long, and a hundred broad, all adorned with beautiful pictures. These are for balls, where the king and queen invite their noble guests, the king himself dances, and the queen also with whom she pleases. When such balls take place, the sounds of the musical instruments in these rooms is heard at a distance of twenty miles.

DESCRIPTION OF THE ROAD FROM PALMOUTH TO LONDON.—From the time that we left Pالمouth till we arrived at London, we did not see a span of earth uninhabited. In all places along the roads and streets we observed men and women walking arm in arm; also coaches and carriages, in which there were ladies like the houriens, running in every direction; every moment increased our surprise as we advanced. Even the peasants that dwell in villages have lofty and beautiful houses; outside of every house there are beautiful gardens, adorned with very fine flowers, where ladies splendidly dressed take their walks. All the time of our travels in this country, our eyes did not see a single handbreadth of earth but all covered with delightful green, roses and all kinds of flowers guarded by the nightingales' singing. Such air and water are scarcely in the world; indeed, what there is to be seen is enough to take away the senses. It is the first story of paradise, the mystic moon, the nightingales on the trees standing with pride, the roses resembling the cheeks of the inhabitants. At length, all this night we went on, passing by gardens, edifices, and lights; there was no darkness at all. In all the roads, there are lanterns lighted, also the houses give out their lights from the windows; in short, our travelling in midnight was not less pleasant than that of mid-day.

ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—There is no possibility of describing these strange and wonderful animals; for, however they may be recollected in the mind or imagined in the head, these kind of creatures cannot be described by the pen. There is to be seen an elephant twenty-four feet high, and his proboscis forty feet long. This wonderful elephant was brought from the extreme parts of the East India islands. The tooth of this mountain-like beast stretches out like a long ivory promontory, and on the whole this animal presents a most glorious appearance. * * * There is also one of the wonderful amphibious animals of a curious form. It is as large as a horse. It was brought from the interior of Africa. It is a very beautiful creature. When it stands and walks it very much resembles mankind. All kinds of baboons, of wonderful sizes and forms. They act like human beings. Bears, white, red, green, yellow, and indeed all colours. Also a kind of monkey, which is of all the animals most like the human figure, the size of a mule, with an extraordinary long tail. These animals act like human beings and laugh wonderfully, and play at chess with men, and some of those who visit the gardens play with them. To-day a Jew happened to be at this place, and went to play a game with the monkey. The monkey beat, and began to laugh loudly, all the people standing round him. The Jew felt exceedingly ashamed, and was obliged to leave immediately. The most wonderful animals of all, were a pair of creatures larger than an elephant, and higher than a camel; their necks are fourteen feet long; their legs are handsome; their tails are like that of an Arabian horse of red colour, with white spots on the face. They were brought from Africa, and their flesh is said to be excellent. They go as fast as a gazelle: all the world from England, Scotland and Ireland, come to see them. There are also more than thirty thousand kinds of birds—in truth, we do not know how even to write their names; to describe their colour is impossible. Some elephant birds, just like an elephant, but without a proboscis. Their wings are about fifteen yards long.

Verily a visit to a place like this brings to mind the power of the Omnipotent. The eyes are dazzled, the mind is surprised, the heart is agitated, and curiosity takes its utmost fill. All this gives a most excellent opportunity to the lover, to lead his favourite by the hand to show her this and that curiosity. Besides all the above, you will see beautiful moon-like ladies, led by the hand to gaze at these wonderful spectacles, and repose under the delightful shade of the beautiful trees. In truth, unless the eye should see, the mind cannot form an idea of this place.

SHIPPING IN THE THAMES.—The ships on this river are like forests. The large men-of-war are twelve hundred in number, some of which are one hundred and twenty guns; these, besides the packets and steamers. The least of their navy carries thirty guns. The British mercantile vessels are above twenty-five thousand, such is their extreme and extensive commerce. In fine, all the ships of other nations on the globe could not equal the number of English ships alone, nor ten foreign men-of-war stand in battle against one English; they have always been victorious over their enemies. One of the twelve viziers of government has the management of the navy; he is called the high lord of the admiralty; Lord Minton fills this high station at present. In his hand is the direction of the whole navy. Besides the abovementioned ships, they have innumerable others in the West and East Indies, in America, and Australia, which are called out at the time of necessity. The water of the river Thames is very heavy, and not at all good for the digestion, nor could it ever produce an appetite. Yet the people of this country do not use water as a drink; when it is necessary, they take a little, once in three or four days.

DESCRIPTION OF THE ENGLISH.—The people of this kingdom are of gentle nature, and delicate constitution; most of the ladies, and females in general, are more delicate and refined than the blossom of the roses. Their waist is more slender than a finger-ring, their form is beautiful, their voice gains the affections. The men are very particular in their disputes, which are carried on with great ability. If there should be the widest possible misunderstanding, still they keep up the rules of politeness. If it should rise so high as to produce vindictive feeling, still they carry on their disputes in a genteel style, and bad language (God forbid) is not used. To be called a liar is the utmost insult; this will lead to a duel; the duel is allowed here.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

TOM TIPP, THE MAN OF GENIUS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF YANKEE NOTIONS.

Tom Tipp was a great genius. His infant years were marked by uncommon precocity of intellect. The same thing, indeed, has been said of sundry other persons; but in Tom's case we have the fact upon unquestionable authority. The first bent of his genius displayed itself by a shrewd discovery in the science of bread and butter. How many full-grown people there are who cannot tell which side of their bread is buttered! Yet Tom found this out very soon after he cut his teeth! As he grew bigger, he grew more cunning, and was pronounced as bright a child as you would see of a summer's day. He demolished picture-books, and smashed crockery, in a style that showed he would speedily become a "smart, enterprising young man." These anticipations were soon fulfilled. He played truant, and beat the schoolmistress, by the time other boys had mastered half the alphabet. Need I say more! Everybody called him a lad of spirit, and predicted he would make a noise in the world.

It is not exactly known at what age he first got into debt—that manly exploit which is sure to mark the career of a man of genius at a very early period. Let it suffice, that he ran up scores in various quarters, to the annoyance of his parents and the astonishment of the neighbourhood. Other trifling school-boy pranks may be passed over; "tricks had he in him which gentlemen have." At college, Tom kept up his character; he robbed hen-roosts, badgered the tutors, raised rebellions, set fire to the college, and attained to the glory of a speedy expulsion. A career so brilliant at the outset promised great things, and Tom was set down by all his acquaintance as a lad of undoubted spirit and genius. In truth, he thought as much himself, and was determined to make his fortune as soon as he had sown his wild oats. He had five thousand dollars to begin with.

Two or three years did Tom spend in adorning the smoothness of his pantaloons, as he walked up and down Broadway; two or three more in cultivating whiskers; and two or three more in cocking his hat over the left ear. He now thought himself finished, and quite the thing; and all the town called him a likely fellow. At this crucial moment, he put his hand in his pocket for a five-dollar bill, and, to his great surprise, found his pocket empty. Tom's pocket was empty too, and his surprise grew into astonishment when a further scrutiny informed him that all his cash was gone. "Five thousand dollars!" exclaimed he in amazement; and is it all gone!" Echo answered—"Gone!"

Was ever a discovery more mal-apropos? An ordinary mortal would have been overwhelmed by it; but Tom instantly bethought himself that he was a man of genius, and thus set all at rights. "I have only to make my fortune," said he, "that's all. Yes, I'll make my fortune without putting it off any longer; what signifies waiting?" So saying, Tom went off to the theatre, and thought no more about it.

But a day or two afterwards, a tailor's bill came staring him in the face. Tom put his hand in his pocket again, and was again reminded of his want of cash and his possession of genius. "Pshaw!" said he, "I'll make my fortune—I'd quite forgot to do it; but it seems to be time now." Tom, having said this, lighted his cigar with the bill, pulled up his cravat, and sallied forth upon a stroll.

Not many weeks afterwards came a third remembrance, in the more emphatic shape of a constable, with an awkward-looking scrap of paper. Tom got rid of him with some difficulty; for constables are a sort of folks that hold young men of genius in no great respect. "Really," said Tom, "I must make my fortune: I may as well do it now and have it over—so let me think of it the first thing to-morrow morning." With these words, Tom went off to

What's-his-name's, up the street, and called for champagne and oysters.

Tom's fortune-making scheme appeared to be totally forgotten by him for three months longer, and nobody can tell to what extent his forgetfulness would have run, had it not been disturbed by another of those perverse accidents which seem to be designed by the malignant fates to bother gentlemen of genius, likely fellows, and such high-middled sublimities on two legs. Tom was one evening lacing up his pantaloons for a ball. "Not handsome," said he, as he looked in the glass—"but killing genteel." At this moment the cassimere gave way in a most disastrous rent at the knee! "T'other pair, then," said he; but, alas! Tom had not another pair! "Bah!" he exclaimed, "cash, credit, and pantaloons gone! then I must make my fortune, and so here goes!"

At these decisive words Tom sat down to make his fortune; and began to rub his head and think. A man of genius has, of course, the world at his command; and Tom debated at first with himself, whether he would be secretary of state or minister to the court of St. James. Both officers had some thousands of dollars salary, and Tom was of opinion that either might do him something better cast up. His cogitations, however, were awkwardly interrupted by the recollection that possibly neither of the actual incumbents could be displaced without some loss of time, while tailors are plaguily impatient. So Tom concluded that the safest project would be to make love to the daughter of old Niggs, the tallow-chandler. She had red hair, and was considerably short and thick. "A dumpy thing," said Tom, "but what of that! The old one will cut up heavy when he goes off, besides what he'll fork over on the wedding-day."

Dorothy Niggs was neither coy nor coquetish, and as for Tom, was not he irresistible! To make a long story short, Tom found no great difficulty in gaining her heart, for let me whisper the secret—it was the first offer she had ever had, although more than—no matter how many years old. Tom considered the business as good as done; so being desirous to despatch matters because creditors cannot wait for ever, and a man of genius without money is constrained to keep his talents, and possibly his person, hidden from the public gaze, to the great loss of the community, he waited upon old Niggs, to receive his consent. He sat in his arm-chair reading the Prince Current. A sheepskin pocket-book, very much worn, lay at his elbow on a thin quarto volume, entitled Rowlett's Tables of Interest. Tom stated his business, and the old man lifted up his spectacles, but kept fast hold of the newspaper.

"Oh, I understand. Are you in the grocery line?"

"No, sir," replied Tom, in some surprise.

"Beg pardon. I thought I had seen your name in the advertisements. Hem! hem! where was it? Ah! here it is 'Thompson and Tipp, Water-street, two hundred hogheads of molasses.'"

"Altogether a mistake, I assure you," said Tom.

"In the hardware trade?"

"Not at all."

"Perhaps dry goods?"

"By no means," returned Tom, growing a little uneasy.

"Crockery?"

"Neither."

"General commission?"

"Can't say it is."

"You ain't in the soap-boiling way?"

"Never was."

"Speculating, I'll warrant."

"Not exactly," replied Tom, beginning to feel quite alarmed at the oddity of these queries; "I—I don't do much in the way of business just now."

"Ah! I understand," said old Niggs, with a knowing kind of grin, and at the same time laying down his newspaper. "Property all snug, living on your income! Real estate! hey! or bank stock!"

Tom sat with his head bent considerably forward during these awkward questions. He felt a sort of fidgety embarrassment quite unusual for men of genius in the presence of tallow-chandlers. He fumbled with the tassel of his cane, and faltered out a reply.

"Neither, sir; that fact is, that owing to peculiar circumstances, my property has very considerably diminished of late, or rather, I may say, entirely disappeared."

The first movement of old Niggs at these words, was to throw back his head with a stare of unutterable astonishment. The next was to let it fall again with a very forcible snuff expiration of breath through the nose that spoke a whole volume of language. His face instantly assumed the most stolid and stoical indifference of expression, while he adjusted his spectacles with the greatest calmness, took up his newspaper, crossed one leg over the other, and pretended to study the fluctuations of Russia tallow with might and main. There was no mistaking this demaenour. Tom saw in an instant it was all over with him. He caught up his hat and rushed out of the room.

Such a catastrophe as this he had never so much as dreamed of. A man of genius to be without cash or credit, and not able to get a tallow-chandler's daughter for a wife! The thought was madness. To-morrow the whole story would be about town! "What is to become of me?" exclaimed Tom. "By heaven! I won't live another hour in this rascally world! I'll shoot myself! I'll hang myself!" Tom, in his confusion, had quitted the house by the wrong door, and at these words found himself in the back-yard. A well was before him. "I'll drown myself!" said he, and jumped in!

Now drowning one's self is no joke, although talking of it may be. Many a thinker better of his determination to do it, in a short walk to the head of the wharf. Tom Tipp did this in a short jump down a well. Before he had fallen half way, he caught at the rope, and hung dangling for some minutes, till his strength failed, and then he gently slipped to the bottom. Don't be frightened, reader, the water was only knee deep, and our hero landed with no other harm than wet feet.

I would advise all sensible persons not to jump into a well till they have thought twice of it. Tom had not been in the well ten minutes before he was heartily sick of drowning. He would have climbed up but he was not able; and there he was forced to remain counting the minutes and the hours till he was positive his legs had been in the water half a century. How long it really was I never learned, but just as he had given himself up for lost, he heard a voice above crying wildly, "I'll drown myself! I'll drown myself!" Tom was in such astonishment at these words, that he had no power to speak. Presently some one approached the well, exclaiming, "Poor Tom, dear Tom! I shall never see you again. Cruel, hard-hearted father! I'll drown myself! and break his heart." "Be Dorothy! by heaven!" said Tom to himself. "She's going to drown herself for love of me, the dear, faithful, kind-hearted soul."

"To lose a lover so devoted! so ardent! so generous! No, no! I cannot live! Ye stars, farewell! Oh deep abyss open thy awful jaws, and take a wretched, despairing maid!"

"Capital!" exclaimed Tom, at the bottom of the well, "and so exquisitely sincere! She's an angel! Come to my arms, thou sweet enchantress—one leap and it's done!"

But Dorothy did not leap: she was resolved, like Caesar, to "die with dignity." So she laid hold of the rope and slid gently down, perhaps from a misgiving that her purpose might cool before she got to the bottom, in which case it is convenient to suspend the body as well as suspend the resolution. Now, it is much easier to slip down a rope than to climb up, so that Dorothy's change of opinion on the subject of drowning, which took place in transitu, did not prevent her from plunging some into the water and uttering a most unearthly scream at finding herself in the arms of a man.

"In the name of heaven, who are you? a man, or a fish?" "Only your own dear Tom. Do I look like a fish?" "My blessed stars! and how came you here?" "Jumped in out of pure despair—meant to drown myself." "Poor fellow! don't die, I beg of you, for my sake, don't!" "I won't indeed—besides, this drowning isn't exactly what it's cracked up to be."

"Mercy on us! what shall we do?" How long they continued to ask each other questions of this sort, we are unable to state, but a trite-a-dete at the bottom of a well must be long enough in all conscience, if it lasts but half a day. So thought our two lovers, who just began to feel serious apprehensions of being the subjects of a crowner's quest, when they heard a noise above. It was the voice of old Niggs, who approached the well, exclaiming in a most rueful tone, "I'm undone! I'm undone! I won't live to endure it!"

"What! more drowning?" said Tom, in greater astonishment than ever. "What can all this old put?"

"Lost! lost! lost! lost!" exclaimed old Niggs, leaning his head over and looking down into the well.

"Ah! his daughter!" said Tom, "how he takes her loss to heart! kind, fatherly old soul!"

"My cash! my cash! I shall never see it again!" bawled out the old man.

"Not in a well," replied Tom.

"Oh! that cursed Cape Flyaway Land Company that I bought into!"

"And this cursed well that I jumped into," said Tom.

"I'll drown myself! I'll drown! I'll drown!" With these words old Niggs caught hold of the rope and went, hand over fist, down nearly to the bottom, when Tom put a stop to his descent by a tremendous "halloo!"

"Mercy preserve us!" cried the old fellow, "who's there?"

"An unfortunate man!" said Tom.

"Land speculation!" demanded Niggs, fearfully.

"No—a love speculation," replied Tom.

"Oho! I think I know you. Came here to drown?"

"Exactly. And now I think we know one another. You may drown if you see fit, and then I'll take your daughter."

"I think I won't," replied old Niggs, "for I've no doubt the company will pay at least fifty per cent. I've thought better of it."

"Good!" exclaimed Tom. "We'll all live and be merry. You wouldn't have me tell of this queer affair about town, you know it might set some folks laughing, eh?"

"For heaven's sake, never mention it, Mr. Tom, and Dolly is yours!"

How they all got out of the well we have not time to say, but old Niggs was soon reconciled to the loss of half his money. Tom married Dorothy, kept the secret, and went into partnership with his father-in-law. He has given up his pretensions to the character of a man of genius, but enlightens the world by selling mould and dipped candles on the lowest terms for cash or approved credit.

BROTHER.—In a market town in England, the wife of a "gentleman" of the Baptist society lately gave instructions to her surgeon to vaccinate her children for the cow-pox. The surgeon accordingly proceeded to execute her commands; but, when about to communicate the infectious matter to the arm of one child, the lady, out of curiosity (for women are always curious) inquired from whom he took it. "A son of Mr. —" was the reply. "What, the Churchman?" vociferated the lady. The surgeon having replied in the affirmative, she declared most positively he should not proceed—"he should never make her children churchmen."

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We have sent the communication of Darwin, relative to the proposed Atlantic and Pacific ship-canal to one of the daily papers.—"Inceptor" wishes us to inform him whether he "can have any hopes of success in wooing the muses?" So far as our experience goes, Master Inceptor, they are sorry jills, and least forward when most sedulously wooed. Slight them, pursue them, and they may grow kind and propitious—but we assure our young correspondent, that, at the best, it is a very unprofitable wooing.—The stanza by "Irene" is touching and beautiful, and reminds us of Shelley. They are united with the true spirit of poetry.—"A. L." he is a beginner in the "art of poetry," we say very frankly, "go on and prosper. Your versification is smooth and melodious, and your imagery in good taste. Publish less than you burn, he not afraid to blot, or reluctant to part with a pet idea should it not be altogether appropriate, and we cannot doubt your ultimate success."—We cannot meddle with the theatrical little-tattle sent to us by "A. Y. N."—G. T. L. "will find her manuscript at the office. It is altogether too cumbersome for our purposes."—"The Model" is in type, and shall appear in our next. We were reluctantly compelled to omit it this week, especially as it was promised; but tide, time and type are equally beyond our control. The author will bear with us for the unintentional delay.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1859

America against Alleghania.—A correspondent objects to the proposition to change the name of our country to Alleghania. He says:—"With all due deference to the superior judgment of our country's favourite, Mr. Irving, I think he has erred in suggesting the new (and I will admit misspelled) name of Alleghania to the land of his birth. I cannot suppose he is ashamed of our present name! Nor will I believe he has not found the title of America a sufficient passport, in all his transatlantic travels, to all the attentions he could have wished for or expected. Nay, he believes a citizen of the United States would be recognized in any country, by the good old title of American, but suggests the change because, forsooth, our name is not a good word to juggle in rhyme, because it has not the sweetness of Alleghania. Opposed to this, the only tangible reason in favour of the change, there are many and strong ones against it. And first, under what title would our revolution sail down the stream of time? As the Alleghania revolution? Phœbus, what a name! Who would conjecture that that was our war for liberty, the war that freed us from British oppression? Who would think that the first Alleghanian congress was composed of Hancock and his compeers? Who would recognize the fifty-six signers of the 'Alleghanian' independence! or, who believe that Washington planted the tree of Alleghanian liberty? Besides this reason—that the change would be a stumbling-block to the historian—there is another that comes home to each American heart, and cannot fail to make some impression. It was the proudest boast of an inhabitant of the seven-hilled city, that he could say, 'I am a Roman citizen.' If you had said to him, your name is unpatriotic, he would have replied; 'my sires were Romans, and I, too, will be a Roman!' He would have added, 'there's magic in the name; mention it to the foe, and he will shudder at the sound.' So say we. Our sires were Americans! they fought the battles of America; conquered as Americans; died as Americans; and, whether living or dying, let us, too, be Americans. In conclusion, I must express my hope and confident expectation that the sound of Alleghania, like the late Dr. Mitchell's Frederica, will be quickly blown to the consistency of a bubble, and then burst in the clouds of smoke which will have been raised about it to blind our eyes." Our correspondent has left out of sight the main objection to the adoption of the name of Alleghania, which is, that when new states begin to be formed beyond the Rocky Mountains, there will be no appropriateness in the title.

Philadelphia Opera-House.—A meeting was held at the Marshall House in Philadelphia, on the ninth instant, for taking into consideration a plan for the erection of a new opera-house on a liberal scale. Mr. J. R. Ingersoll presided upon the occasion, and set forth the objects proposed in a clear and eloquent manner. From his remarks, we learn that it is not intended to limit the exhibitions of the contemplated establishment to such as are strictly within the class of opera. Spectacle, melo-drama, spirited and correct afterpieces, classical and heroidal illustrations of different times and countries, are within the very comprehensive and ambitious scheme. It is believed that a moral community may witness its success with satisfaction and pride. To succeed, it must have sterling merit. An elegant, rational, pure, and moral entertainment will then be always at hand to receive the patronage, and repay the encouragement of our own fellow-citizens. Its freshest enjoyments will be within the reach of the mechanic and tradesman of humble means; for the right of admission is intended to be placed at the lowest price. The plan of the building, as submitted by the committee, consisting of Dr. Samuel Jackson, John Butler, and Edward P. Fry, equires, designates the lot of ground at the south-east corner of Ninth and Chestnut-streets as an appropriate site. According to the plans drawn by the architect, this building will cover an area of one hundred and forty-seven feet on Ninth-street, by two hundred and forty feet on Chestnut-street. It rests on a marble basement, fifteen feet high, subdivided into stores. The principal entrance to the first and second tiers of boxes and parquette is to be on Ninth-street. The boxes are in the form of a parabola or semi-circle, with diverging sides, five tiers in height. Every seat in the house will be a large and comfortably cushioned arm-chair, the total number of which chairs will be five thousand and seventy. The orchestra will contain six hundred and seventy-five superficial feet, sufficient for the accommodation of seventy-eight musicians. The best feature in the establishment, however, is that expressed in the following terms: "By the use of chairs only in the house, by the employment of an efficient police, by affording in the saloons and ante-rooms every desirable comfort to the audience, by excluding persons professedly licentious, by prohibiting the sale of ardent spirits, and by adopting very moderate rates of admission, it is intended to merit general patronage among all respectable classes of the community, and to invite especially the attendance of the numerous strangers who are always ready to encourage places of public amusement." We heartily wish success to an enterprise commenced in such a spirit, and with views so judicious. The names of the committee are a sufficient guaranty that their promises will be abided by. They are: J. M. Sanderson, William Norris, Edward P. Fry, John W. Field, Joseph Sill, Dr. J. K. Mitchell, W. W. Haly, L. J. Levy, Pierce Butler, Henry C. Carey, Jacob Smider, jr. and E. N. Scherr.

Mr. Castanis.—We accidentally omitted to mention that the "Tale of Scio," in our paper of last Saturday, was from the pen of C. P. Castanis, a young gentleman, who is, we believe, a native of the time-renowned island, the events in whose recent history he commemorates. Mr. Castanis has acquired quite a mastery of the English language, and his lectures upon Greece, at Clinton-Hall, have attracted large and intelligent audiences. Should he ever devote himself to the task of writing a full and elaborate history of the last Greek revolution, we cannot doubt that his success will be great. No one more competent to the undertaking could be designated. We shall be pleased to hear from Mr. Castanis again, and in the meantime commend his lectures strongly to the public attention. He does not speak from hearsay. He describes what he has himself seen.

The Maverick-House at East Boston.—We endorse with much pleasure the following merited tribute, which we find in a contemporary journal, to the host of the Maverick-House. We can from experience attest the truth of the compliment: "Major Barton, of the Maverick-House, is a princely host, and keeps—we were on the point of saying—the best hotel in the country; and we are not sure that we should have been in error, had we ventured the assertion explicitly. Certain we are, that the Maverick-House, in the cheapness, commodiousness, and airiness of its accommodations; the perfect order, cleanliness, and efficiency of its internal arrangements; and the kindness, attention, and gentlemanly demeanour of its landlady—is second to no establishment in the United States. If the Bostonians will not give some man opportunities enough for making his fortune, let him come on here. New-York will receive him with open arms. We speak advisedly."

The Park.—The management of the Park theatre have had the good fortune and the good taste to effect an engagement with Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff, who have been playing at Philadelphia with marked success. We trust now to witness the representation of Bulwer's play of "Richelieu" in a manner creditable to the Park. These eminent performers sustain the principal characters, it is said, in a manner at once original and highly effective. Wherever Miss Vandenhoff has appeared in public, she has created a sensation altogether unsurpassed since the palmy days of Fanny Kemble; and it gives us pleasure to state that she is equally a favourite in private circles. Giobelli, Manvers, Martyn and lady, and "last not least" in our kind regards, Miss Pool, remain firm attachés of old Drury. We regret to hear that there is a prospect of Mr. Alexandre's speedy return to Paris—we say regret; for he is both in private and in public one of the most worthy and extraordinary men connected with literature and the stage, that ever crossed the Atlantic.

Women at a premium.—The congress of Texas have passed a law granting two thousand nine hundred and eighty-two acres of good land to every woman, who will marry during the present year, a citizen of that republic, who was such at the time of the declaration of their independence. Young gentlemen from Texas will, we suspect, be in demand during the present year.

Wooden pavements.—We find the following in a late London paper. It is confirmatory of the remarks we made a week or two since upon the subject of wooden pavements:—"The numerous accidents which have occurred in the Old Bailey since it has been paved with wood—have at length awakened the city authorities to the expediency of making some alterations, and workmen were on Saturday employed in 'notching' the wooden blocks."

Prince Puckler Muskau.—It is stated that this distinguished character is making arrangements to purchase the possessions of the late Lady Hester Stanhope in Syria, and there establish a penitentiary according to his own ideas. The heirs of Lady Stanhope, however, are said to be reluctant to sell.

Music.—Of this delightful science, Martin Luther said—"Music is so great and powerful an engine, designed to awaken and render our faculties more susceptible, at the same time ennobling the hearts of men, that it is of the highest importance, both to church and state, to cultivate it properly."

Perilous travelling.—A letter dated Dossola, September the nineteenth, mentions that a French baron and his lady were passing over the mountains, the lady riding on a mule, when the mule slipped and went over a precipice with the lady on his back, and both were dashed to atoms with the guide.

The Borey.—Hamblin is as busy as usual in producing novelties in quick succession. Mrs. Shaw, however, continues to be the principal attraction at this house.

ERIN IS MY HOME.

A BEAUTIFUL BALLAD—SUNG BY MR DEMPSTER—ARRANGED AND ADAPTED TO A BOHEMIAN MELODY, BY MOSCHELES.

ANDANTE ESPRESSIVO.

Oh, I have roam'd many lands, And many friends I've met; Not one fair scene or kind smile, Can this fond heart forget; But I'll confess that I'm content, No more I wish to roam; Oh! steer to E-rin's Isle, For E-rin is my home. Oh! steer my bark to E-rin's Isle, For E-rin is my home. E-rin is my home. Oh! steer my bark to E-rin's Isle, For E-rin is my home.

3d.—If England were my place of birth, I'd love her tranquil shore; || And if Columbia were my home, Her freedom I'd adore; || Though pleasant days in both I pass, I dream of days to come; || Oh! steer my bark to Erin's Isle, For Erin is my home.

MISCELLANY.

LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT.—The Courier Français gives the following account of the origin of the intended marriage between the hereditary grand duke of Russia and the princess Mary of Darmstadt: It appears that the princess had been very much kept in the back ground by the grand duke, her father, who entertained no view of so splendid an alliance for her. The hereditary grand duke of Russia, returning, like the heirs apparent in the old eastern tales, from a tour from court to court, to select a wife from the numerous princesses who were on the list, and like them, wearied with his tour, and disappointed in his expectation, was delighted to arrive at Darmstadt, where, as there was no princess to marry, he might be allowed to repose after the tedious ceremonies of courts, in which the marriageable daughters had been brought forward in the hope of captivating his heart. At the first court party, however, his imperial highness remarked in the corner of the room a beautiful young girl of fifteen, dressed in plain white, and who was sitting unnoticed by the brilliant throng. The illustrious tourist inquired of the grand duke of Hesse Darmstadt who this young lady, who had not been presented to him, was; and, with some embarrassment on the part of the father, he was told that it was his daughter. The simple and interesting appearance of the princess produced an immediate effect upon the prince, who, after an hour's conversation with her, in which he found that the beauties of her mind equalled those of her person, sent a courier to the emperor to request his consent to their union, which was not refused.

FEMALE COURTSHIP IN ROME.—The women of Rome know nothing of those restraints which delicacy, modesty and virtue impose upon the sex in northern Europe. A Roman lady who takes a liking to a foreigner, does not cast her eyes down when he looks at her, but fixes them upon him long and with evident pleasure; nay, she gazes at him alone whenever she meets him in company, at church, at the theatre, or in her walks. She will say, without ceremony, to a friend of the young man's, "Tell that gentleman I like him." If the man of her choice feels the like sentiment, and asks, "Are you fond of me?" she replies with the utmost frankness, "Yes, dear." The happy medium between American and Roman courtship appears to us the best. We hate excessive coyness but do not like too much familiarity. What Maryat—his opinion we have published—has said of American women in regard to mock modesty is too true.

CRIMINALS NOT ACCORDING TO LAW.—All old bachelors, of a reasonable income, above forty, all young men who have married old women, all old men who have got young wives, all those who have helped to make the national debt what it is.

SALE OF A WIFE.—The infamous practice of a man offering his wife at public sale is still continued in England. Recently, in Rottenham-market-place, a respectably dressed woman was offered for sale. She appeared with a balter round her waist, under her gown, the end of which passed through her pocket hole. She was knocked down for four shillings and twopenny to a purchaser from Sheffield, and started off with him to his home. The constables were present to prevent a breach of the peace.

LOVE.—In the first approaches, ere it has assumed any definite character, it is full of life and beauty. Its hidden agency fills the soul with ineffable pleasures; it tinctures every object with new lustre. We do not ask ourselves why we are happy; we feel that we are so; and that is sufficient. The fresh fulness, like new flowers, give forth a sweetness, delicate and spontaneous, and the spirit reposes under its influence, in a beatitude of which, like the happiness of childhood, it is not conscious until it is past.

CONJUGAL CURSORS.—In the canon of Gales, in Switzerland, there is a law which compels every newly married couple to plant six trees immediately after their ceremony, and two more on the birth of every child. They are planted on commons, frequently near the high road, and the greater part of them, being fruit trees, are at once both useful and ornamental. The number planted is said to amount to ten thousand annually.

TRANSPORTS OF LOVE.—An accented suitor, one day walking at a pretty village in Bedfordshire, with the object of his affections hanging upon his arm, and describing the ardency of his affection, said, "How transported I am to have you hanging on my arm." "Upon my word," said the lady, "you make us out a very respectable couple, when one is transported and the other hanging."

AGREEABLE COMPANY.—A man to be agreeable and good company, must think nicely and readily upon what is said—have a good fund of wit—and a faithful memory, and suitable imagination; he should also be master of his mother tongue, for, without this the best thoughts will fail to please.

BEAUTY.—We have high authority for the opinion, that perfect loveliness is only to be found where the features, even when most beautiful, derive their peculiar charm from the sweetness and gentleness of disposition which the countenances express.

CONTENTED POVERTY.—Do not sigh for this world's goods, nor lament the poverty. Out of the meanest hovel is obtained as fair a sight of heaven, as from the most gorgeous palace.

GOOD BREEDING.—A man's own good breeding is the best security against other people's ill manners.

INDUSTRY.—Honest industry is, after all, man's only sure dependence for the double blessing of a contented mind and a comfortable livelihood.

GARRICK AND DR. STONHOUSE.—The following anecdote from the countess of Huntingdon's Life and Times, is well worthy the attention of clergymen, some of whom we doubt not occasionally lay themselves open to a rebuke, similar to the one given by the British Roscius.—"Dr. Stonhouse is said to have been one of the most correct and elegant preachers in the kingdom. When he entered into holy orders he took occasion to profit by his acquaintance with Garrick, to procure from him some valuable instructions in elocution. Being once engaged to read prayers and to preach at a church in the city, he prevailed upon Garrick to go with him. After the service, the British Roscius asked the doctor what particular business he had to do when the duty was over? 'None,' said the other. 'I thought you had,' said Garrick, 'on seeing you enter the reading-desk in such a hurry. Nothing,' added he, 'can be more indecent than to see a clergyman set about sacred business as if he were a tradesman, and go into the church as if he wanted to get out of it as soon as possible.' He next asked the doctor, 'What books he had in the desk before him?' 'Only the Bible and Prayer-book,' replied the player, 'why, you toss them backwards and forwards, and turn the leaves as carelessly as if they were those of a day-book and ledger.' The doctor was wise enough to see the force of these observations, and ever after avoided the faults they were designed to reprove."

MANNERS.—In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, good manners required that persons of different sexes, when invited to parties, should sit down in couples, and that each couple should have one plate between them. In families one goblet was deemed sufficient for all, and St. Bertrand was discredited by his father, who was affected by the leprosy, for having wiped the edge of the goblet before he drank.

LAWS.—A person talking to Fenelon upon the subject of the criminal laws of France, and approving of the many exceptions which had taken place under it, in opposition to the archbishop, said, "I maintain that such persons are unfit to live." "But, my friend," said Fenelon, "you do not reflect that they are still more unfit to die."

LIBERTY.—Political liberty does not consist in being able to do what we wish, but in being able to do what we ought to wish.

SINCERITY.—To practice sincerity, is to speak as we think; to do as we profess; to perform what we promise; and really to be what we would seem and appear to be.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, near the corner of Broadway. Terms, FIVE DOLLARS per annum, payable, in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

George P. Scott, Printer, corner of Gold and John-streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with Accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR. SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NO. 1 BARCLAY-STREET, NEAR BROADWAY. (PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.)

VOLUME SEVENTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1839.

NUMBER TWENTY-FOUR.

For the New York Mirror.

A PICTURE.

BY MISS VANDENHOFF.

THE hand of time hath blanched that lady's hair,
And paled the hue that once adorned her cheek;
Yet does her age possess a majesty:
A mother's love is in her soft glance, greeting
Yon beauteous girl reclining on a couch,
E'en like a rose nipped in its hour of pride!
And mourning, but resigned, she daily sees
Her lovely child approach the dark grave's brink.
And she, the suffering one—she too submits Without complaint; nay she is sometimes glad
To quit the weary earth and be at peace:
For she hath tried, and, broken-hearted, found
How frail a thing is man's so boasted love!
The music of her voice hath never breathed
The grief that steals the ruby from her lip;
The glossy curls wave round her brow and neck,
And almost hide the thin transparent hand,
On which her head is leaning for support.
Her hazel eyes are bent upon a boy:
Whose childish face is beaming with delight:
His dimpled hands are holding fast his frock,
Which serves him for a basket, to contain
A store of beauteous flowers—roses, pinks,
The lily, formed of but one single leaf,
Whose honied breath hangs sweetest on the gale;
The gaudy tulip and the eglantine
He brings, to please a flow'et far more fair
Than any there that blooms. The drooping one
Still loves their varied hues. Their soft green stem
Arching their slender necks beneath the weight
Of beauty which they bear so busily,
Their bursting into life from tiny buds,
Their fragrant scent—all speak of her—of Hope!

ORIGINAL INCIDENTS OF TRAVEL.

THE MODEL.

A BRIGHT morning found me ascending the Scala from the Piazza di Spagna, for the double purpose of breathing the fresh air and making an early call at the studio of my friend. At the summit of the grand stairs, and on the south side of the Piazza della Trinità del Monte, stands the house of Claude Lorraine. Here that great artist resided when he produced those works which have made his name immortal. Under the simple portico of this casa famosa I sat down to rest. From this spot the painter might see the sun go down behind the dome of St. Peter's, and from here he could look upon the eternal city with its fountains, obelisks, palaces and churches, almost at his feet; while beyond the walls, the campagna stretched away until the blue skies, and darker blue of the village capped peaks, traced the boundary line of the plain. How much may we owe to this happy location for the classical, rich compositions, so full of living light and warmth, of this extraordinary landscape painter.

I looked upon St. Angelo, and my recollection told me I had seen its picturesque reflection changed in some small points in more than one of Claude's pictures. Many a palace, church and monument looked familiar to me, yet bearing different relation to the scenery. I had seen them somewhere, in such and such a composition. Immediately in the foreground, adorning the tops of buildings, statuary and beautiful fountains arose to the level of his studio: white gardens made upon the flat roofs enriched his view with flowers and the liveliest foliage. Broken columns, bas-reliefs, remnants of antiquity, were about him on all sides. Observe his glorious creations, and you see how genius has wrought those materials into books of poetry, and ravishing combinations of nature and art. My attention, was fastened upon the Pantheon, and my mind was wandering from pictorial thoughts to still earlier associations than those belonging to Claude's dwelling, and I know not how long I might have lived among the events of Roman history, had not my course of thought been disturbed by a mendicant who demanded, "qualche cosa, per the love of the Madonna." Starting up, I threw a few coins into the capscellino of the eyesore povera, and continued my way towards the old palace of the De Medici, reflecting upon the incident which forced my mind from the contemplation of a nation's glory to its degradation.

I entered the gardens belonging to the French Academy. An institution supported by the French government, and where she sends her most promising young artists to further their studies at the shrine of art. The grounds appertaining to this palace furnish one of the most agreeable retreats at Rome. You ramble between "murailes des fleurs," parterres of trimmed foliage, with fountains and vestiges of antiquity—here a mouldering capital, there a part of a fluted shaft. Now a torso nearly buried in shrubbery is discovered in your path; now a vase rises from among clustering leaves, which embrace its peaceful form, and harmonizes with the golden moss, with which time has mellowed all things exposed to the air in this delicious cline.

From the rear of the Accademia Franchese is seen the villa Raffello, once the residence of the divine painter. The cypress trees and the pines which tower in the neighbourhood enrich many a background of his pictures. They are consonant with lofty, pure composition, but belong not to the familiar and ornamental. From the same spot that commands this view a picture presents itself, the foreground of which is the fine edifice itself, with its Claude-copied carvings. Beyond, across the Tiber, swells the Pantheon dome, looking like some immense balloon ready to burst from the great church to that vault of ultramarine above—the theme of poets and of travellers innumerable. Mounting to the roof of the academy, the eye sweeps over the campagna, resting upon the misty hills, where sit shrouded in azure vapour, Albano, Tivoli and Frascati. Gazing upon the sea-like amphitheatre, with more minute research, the wrecks of tombs, temples, and all that remains of the monuments born of the mother of empires, are seen, desolate features, scattered upon a sublime waste.

But, in my landscape sketching, I find I am making a late morning call at the studio of S—. Descending from the panoramic view that promises again to imprison my thoughts with the past, suppose me at the door of one of those many studios, which are in the vicinity of the Piazza del Popolo.

Fortune favoured me for once; I found my sensitive friend absent and the door unlocked. I could never prevail upon him to show me certain pictures and sketches, the backs of which excited my strongest curiosity. I was quick to profit by this favourable opportunity. Upon a small table stood the pallet and pencils ready for painting. Upon the easel stood a cabinet-sized canvass. I was destined to get no farther in my search than this. My attention was seized by the commencement before me. From a mass of chalk outlines and dubious things, which might be taken for clouds, smoke or angels, beamed forth a head beautifully painted, fresh, vigorous, and as lovely as Italia herself. All was too indefinite to make out the story or subject; but that face—the deep, deep black eyes, exquisite mouth, chin, nobly-defined nose—that tent so warm yet transparent. I gazed upon this reality among shadows, as it seemed, until, like the Fornarina of Raphael, I fancied it ready to speak. I was less surprised than annoyed as I saw the bewitching vision move from before my eyes—in its place, looking from between the legs of the easel, stood the disconcerted artist. "Mio caro, I am sorry," exclaimed he, "you have seen that bazza; I am heartily ashamed you should see how little I can do without nature before me. I despair ever getting through with this composition, or doing justice to the head alone."

"Is that face a dream of yours?" I demanded, "or is there within the walls of Rome a living Venus like that?"

Turning round as I spoke, the door opened, and the original entered. The resemblance could not be mistaken. She advanced into the room with a soft "Buono giorno, signori." And thus I saw, for the first time, "Annina," or, as she was familiarly called, "La bella Modella."

The history of Annina is soon told. She was a Contadina, or peasant girl. Her parents were poor, and, rather than beg, they were forced to avail themselves of the surpassing beauty of their child as a model. While yet an infant, Annina's features found a reflection upon canvass in figures of angels, cherubs and seraphs. As she became older, she would sit for Hebes, Venuses, sibyls and Mariannas. She had escaped miraculously the common fate of models, and could never be induced for any consideration to sit for more than the head, although her figure was one that a sculptor might have envied, surpassing, as it did in symmetry, the antique statues.

Annina was famed throughout the city, but she was a model; and in this light few, above a certain grade, would make honest advances to her; and those who presumed, she met with a repulsive dignity that won for her the highest respect and esteem. In short, in another walk in life, this Roman girl would have been a model for the proudest to envy and the best to emulate.

In a young Roman she had a desperate amato. His passion was not responded to, yet he continued to haunt her, to follow her from studio to studio, even to the sacred shrines at her prayers. Her constant companion was an old woman, who counted her beads during the hour or hours that she sat. In this employment had Annina seen eighteen summers, maintaining, by her efforts, her sinking, helpless parents.

Upon the occasion of my present visit, she took her seat, and

C— proceeded with his picture. His pencil was the most glowing of any at Rome; it was a pleasure, difficult to describe, to see him, with each touch, add to a copy of nature, already so perfect, still more expression and sweetness of effect. The hour was magically short as I stood watching, by turns, the artist and his model. At length Annina glanced at the picture with an expression of approbation, and, cursing to us gracefully, darted out of the studio. Her jealous admirer stood waiting at the door, and no doubt the poor girl was obliged to listen to his frenzied amoré, even to the protecting roof of some holy sanctuary, or the atelier of some other artist, where she was engaged to personate some other beautiful character.

"Come," said C—, throwing down his pencils, "let us hurry to the Vatican; it is open to-day, and the lights will be favourable; for, look you, how clear we have it." C— had resided several years at Rome, pursuing his art with an ardour that absorbed nearly all other reflections, except those which grow out of a sojourn among scenes so deeply fraught with matter for the reflection of philosopher, poet, and painter. An artist takes few steps here without contributing to advancement in his profession. In truth, his life might be consumed in one dream of genial devotion, undisturbed by the trading world, that almost everywhere else mingles itself with his reveries. The day being brilliant the streets were full of carriages, and everybody was abroad. Barefooted monks, "pale and grave," glided by. Silks rustled against grass, as we threaded our way towards the Ponte St. Angelo, entering in our route several of the most distinguished churches. How strange to break from the stirring multitude, whose every expression and motion speak of the world's ambition and dissipation, and find one's self within the walls of one of those solemn cathedrals!

Approaching one of the obscure chapels, the better to see a picture over the altar, within, we saw kneeling before the Madonna, a figure, the eye fixed upon the holy mother, while her hands crossed upon her bosom, pressed there, as if to leave its impression upon her heart, the sacred emblem of her faith: the santo croce, never absent from the heart of a good catholic. Passing on, I caught a look at the profile. It was Annina! We hurried softly away, afraid to breathe too loud, lest we might disturb the beautiful petitioner. As we stole towards the door we observed the desperate amato, haggard and wild, leaning against a baptismal font, dipping his fingers now and then into the vessel, and crossing his low, lurid brow, while his eyes seemed trying to penetrate the hallowed air, which enveloped the humble model. We left the church, and were again mingling with the apparent masquerade, which is presented in the streets on a festival day. The costumes of the contadini, noted for being picturesque, students with their long hair, mustachios, velvet coats and cappali, together with the many-fashioned strangers, who linger but a day in the eternal city to exhaust its sights, and to experience its mighty associations, produce a mescolanza singularly striking.

We lingered long at the Vatican, and, without visiting half of its thousand rooms, I found my senses wearied from excess of seeing, and reeling under the excitement consequent upon ranging through this museum of art; that accumulation of antiquities, linking centuries together with rescued tablets and time-crumbled vestiges. Stealing into the Capella Sistina to see the grand picture of Michael Angelo, as it caught the rays of the setting sun. We finished our day at St. Peter's.

It was Avé Maria, deepening into the most solemn shade of twilight, as we turned from the Via Candotti into the Piazza di Spagna. Proceeding towards the Scala, we encountered a crowd, which, silent as the hour, encircled something upon which all eyes seemed to dwell with expressions of awe and pity. We entered the circle. Upon a chair reposed a female figure, which, at first sight, might have been mistaken for some lovely statue, were it not for the stains of blood which were visible upon the light dress. The head was supported by a person standing behind the seat, while the arms fell upon the lap in graceful but marble repose. The softened, doubtful light, presented but the general effect, leaving the imagination to guess the rest. The dress, modestly disposed, might seem to have been arranged in its folds for some fastidious artist to copy. In short, the whole was statue-like, apparently the dream of some Flaxman or Donnetello.

I stood transfixed for some minutes, making part of that riveted crowd; anxious to know the meaning of so strange a spectacle and the circumstances. I demanded sotto voce of one near me. He replied—"It is La bella Modella—she is dead." Stepping forward to get a nearer view, it proved sadly true! It was indeed the beautiful creature whom I had seen in the morning, so full of life and elegance. Her jealous lover, repulsed in his advances, had, as she descended the grand Scala, stabbed her in the neck. Staggering to this spot she had sat down, and bled to death. Night wrapped the cold clay in its mantle of black, and leaving the silent watchers still surrounding the hapless model, we found our way home, our thoughts still coloured with this tragic event.

THE POSTMASTER OF ROUVRAY.

THE career of Napoleon inspired a degree of enthusiasm in the breasts of the people of France, which had never been known to exist before under any—the most fortunate—circumstances. From the peer to the peasant, all idolized their hero, and Napoleon never discouraged the manifestations of affection with which he was greeted wherever he went; indeed, he gave such license to his people, even after he had become emperor, that their familiarities often became unpleasant and inconvenient. Among the most enthusiastic of his admirers was the postmaster of a small place in Burgundy, bearing the name of Rouvray, who upon two or three occasions had the honour, personally, of driving the emperor's carriage, and had been spoken to by him familiarly. His first meeting with Napoleon was under circumstances calculated to awaken a lively feeling in the breast of the emperor; for the postillions who were driving his carriage to Rouvray had fallen asleep, and his horses, instead of going direct to the post-house, had wheeled round, and the night being dark, they had nearly precipitated the carriage, emperor and all, from a bridge. As it was, the carriage was nearly overturned, and the postmaster happening at the moment to be returning, with two of his men, from the next town, perceiving the danger, rushed towards the emperor's carriage and prevented the accident from occurring. The emperor expressed himself grateful for the assistance rendered by M. Bizard, and intimated that he would not forget the circumstance.

Bizard never importuned the emperor; he was indeed delighted if he got but a nod of recognition; and as nothing pleased Napoleon so much as fanatic devotedness, he was always glad to see the postmaster and hear him give vent to his enthusiasm. M. Bizard had access to the Tuileries, and he never visited Paris without paying a visit to "his friend, the emperor," which he did with less ceremony than when he had to wait upon the director of the post-office department.

One day, on alighting from the diligence, in his usual travelling dress, he proceeded to the place to visit his imperial friend. His sans-froid, as he inquired whether the emperor was at home, astonished the guards and officers of the court. Some laughed, others desired him to go away; and when he became importunate they swore and threatened to send him to the guard-house. This aroused all that was lion-like in the disposition of M. Bizard, and he cried:

"Ah, ye cowards! if you dare to threaten the postmaster of Rouvray—"

"And who's the postmaster of Rouvray?" asked one of the officers on duty.

"Let me have pen and ink, and you shall see!" exclaimed M. Bizard, in a voice of thunder; "let me have pen and ink, and I'll write to the emperor! Ah, you may stare!—I say, to the emperor."

Pen, ink and paper were brought, and M. Bizard wrote as follows:

"Sire.—The postmaster of Rouvray (your best friend and most devoted subject) is about to be sent to prison, just as if I were a roter in your palace. I don't like to waste my time any longer, and besides I wish to see you forthwith.—Please to make haste."

BIZARD.

The emperor had no sooner read this strange note, than he laughed heartily, and to conceal his enthusiastic assent he insulted that had been offered him, he despatched one of his chamberlains to have him released; and, to the astonishment of the officers, M. Bizard was conducted into the presence of "his friend, the emperor."

His business with Napoleon was of some consequence. He had a daughter, a young and delicate girl, who had given her heart to one who was far above her, but who returned her love, and would have married her, but that his parents opposed his union with one so humble. Julie, who, encouraged by the hopes of her lover, had believed that his parents would at length be induced to consent to their union, was nearly broken-hearted when she learned that they had desired François to pay his addresses to the only daughter of a wealthy merchant. The postmaster had for some time observed that his daughter's health was declining, and he did all that lay in his power to make her happy. Never lived a kinder parent than M. Bizard. Rough as he was in his manner, yet he possessed such a warmth of feeling that in the contemplation of his good qualities everything else was not forgotten. He beheld the suffering of his daughter with dismay. The colour had forsaken her cheeks, her eyes had become lustreless, and he thought that she was dying.

Moved by his constant kindness, and the tears which fell from his old eyes upon her pale cheeks, as she reclined upon his bosom, Julie disclosed to him the secret of her grief.

The old man was a few minutes speechless; and then the only words he uttered were "my friend, the emperor!" He pressed his poor child fondly to his bosom, and the next morning at day-break set out for Paris, where he obtained an interview, as already stated.

The postmaster's business was explained in a few words, and the emperor's reply was equally laconic.

"Go home, postmaster," said Napoleon, "and if Julie's tears be not dried within three days come hither, again."

M. Bizard travelled quick, but the emperor's wishes had gone faster; for on the former riding into the post-yard of Rouvray, who should come out to meet him but Julie and François; and both were looking so happy, and both were so eager to tell him what had come to pass, that they were both unintelligible; but by their looks M. Bizard knew that they were happy, and his heart instinctively said—"This is the work of the emperor."

And his heart spoke truly. The emperor had sent Julie a marriage portion and François a commission in the army; and now the parents of the youth no longer oppose the nuptial union, and that night the post-house of Rouvray resounded with cries of "Vive l'Empereur!"

Time passed on, and the idol of M. Bizard fell into misfortune. His "friend" was no longer emperor of France, but a captive. Who can describe the postmaster's sorrow and despair!

But soon afterward, all France was aware that Napoleon had escaped from Elba; and again were the spirits of M. Bizard exalted. Early one morning in March, before the sun had risen, the postmaster of Rouvray was awakened by loud shots at his chamber window, and, on popping out his head to ascertain the cause of the disturbance, who should he see but "his friend, the emperor."

"Allons, Bizard!" cried Napoleon; "my old and faithful friend! Quick—quick with horses! I am expected at Paris!"

The postmaster was bewildered.

"My friend, the emperor!" he cried, and rushed into the stable for the required horses.

The note of preparation soon struck, and all was bustle and anxiety in the post-house at Rouvray. The horses were put to, Bizard's two sons were mounted, and the good old enthusiastic postmaster himself, who had also assumed the postilion, did not yet ascend his post of honour. He stood pensive and serious, close to the impatient Napoleon. At length the cloud passed from his countenance, and he exclaimed with a dignified smile, "Ma foi, if I make him angry, I shall be angry too!" and then turning towards the emperor, he said, "I have been thinking for these ten minutes how I should convey a request to your majesty—and I am not a bit the wiser after all!"

"Bah!" exclaimed Napoleon, taking a pinch of snuff.

"It must come out, sire," said the postmaster, "though I know—that is, I am afraid—it will offend you."

"Well," said the emperor, "what is it?"

"Sire, I have had the honour of driving you many times; I am no courtier, no intriguer; I love my country's preserver. I love you for yourself. That's all!"

"Is that all?" echoed the emperor.

"No—I have just now a great favour—a very great favour—to beg. You will perhaps laugh, perhaps be angry, but I shall be the happiest of men if you grant it: I ask permission to embrace you!"

The emperor burst into a fit of laughter.

"Is that all, my poor Bizard?" he exclaimed, "Come—and then let us be off."

Bizard rushed to the emperor, clasped him in his arms, hugged him, and triumphantly besting his porter, started, versus a terre, and in less than an hour drove up before the post-house of Avallon, shouting "Vive l'Empereur!"—There Bizard took leave of his great friend—but his parting good wishes, though enthusiastic, were expressed with sadness, and tears fell from his eyes as he joined in the acclamations of the surrounding throng.

The disastrous news from Waterloo fell upon him as a thunder-bolt. Soon after that fatal event the postmaster of Rouvray was dismissed from that situation, next sent to prison, and tried at the assizes for having promoted the usurpation of his imperial patron, and endeavouring to avenge his fall upon the restored government. He was acquitted, but such heavy blows impaired his health. From that time he was no longer pensive, and the revolution of 1830, found him plunging fields that were not his own. His attachment to the memory of his departed idol long inspired the success of his applications to Louis Philippe's government. At length, one afternoon as he returned from his daily task, a letter was put into his hands, the contents of which extracted from him a "Vive l'Empereur!" meant to be a "Vive le Roi!" M. Bizard was informed, that through the personal interference of the duke of Orleans, he was restored to the office of postmaster of Rouvray.

MUTILATION OF WORKS OF ART.

The mischievous propensity which is so often manifested by Englishmen and Americans to disgrace and mutilate works of art, or to handle them through an idle curiosity, is well satirized in the following extract from the second volume of "Little Pegginton," just published—"But what about the kangaroo?" said I. "Is it possible you did not hear of it?" The town talk," Chickney, the poetaster, who has naturally been keeper of our zoological gardens, and honorary secretary, has presented us with a stuffed kangaroo. Yesterday there was a private view of it. Interesting sight! Subdued, quiet interest, though—not of an exciting interest, like the monkeys on the ladies' dais, Sundays, you know. Interesting creature, though, "Peggy patted on it." Visitors are requested not to touch!" Very foolish—gave great offence. How can one tell what kangaroos are made of if one isn't allowed to touch?—and the moment Chickney's back was turned, people did touch. And what harm did they do? Nothing but a little bit of its tail, one fore paw, and two claws of the other broken off. Chickney angry—very foolish to be angry—told him so. Easy to glue the pieces on again, ever he should get them back. If not, what then? What is that in comparison with the rights of the people! I don't know how dear the case will be with you Londoners; but this I can tell you, my dear fellow, no free-born Peggintonian will relinquish his right, at an exhibition, of touching whatever he can lay his hands upon. As I thought the tone in which Mr. Hobbleday uttered his last remark was intended to convey an offensive doubt of the patriotism of my dear fellow-Londoners, I replied to him somewhat sharply: "Mr. Hobbleday, allow me to tell you, sir, that the London public are as well acquainted with their rights, and as jealous of them, as the Little Peggintonians, sir, of theirs. And, sir," I was vexed, and could not help string him a little—"and sir, if in a picture gallery one entertains a doubt as to whether the varnish on a picture be dry, he will satisfy his very laudable curiosity by rubbing his hand over it; if as to what it may be painted on, he will prove it with his finger; and to point out its beauties, he, like a true-born Londoner, will use the end of his stick or his umbrella. In a museum, sir, doubting as to whether a statue be of marble, or stone, or plaster, he will exercise his right of twirling it by a finger, or any part most easily fractured, in order to inform himself; and in all places, sir, he will scribble or chop his name (and, for the information of posterity, the date of his visit too) upon the most prominent object within his reach, no matter how much it may be defaced by his handiwork; always taking care, sir, to assert them (these instruments of tyranny and oppression, the keepers or guardians) are absent!"

STANZES.

Alas! the day I e'er beheld that lovely form and face,
Those blessed eyes, those melting lips, that beauteous look and grace;
The fairy form is dazzled, the moment I beheld,
My heart leap'd high, and from that hour it never has been cold.
For that fond being, who to me! another has possess'd,
And ever henceforth calm repose is banish'd from my breast
With agonizing torments now my restless bosom teems;
By day my thoughts engross'd by her, and each long night my
Her name I mention in my prayers; my waking eyes unfold
And light upon the angel form I feel I behold.
An altar'd being am I now, this recompense is given,
I've gazed upon the star so long, one ray I've caught from heaven.
The scorching fire in my soul by hope alone I bear,
The agonizing anxious hope of Sympathy's pure tear.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

CHILDREN.

SPOKE Childer, the immortal, the ever young.

I passed by a city, a man stood near.

Plucking fruit that in a fair garden hung;

I asked, How long has the city been here?

He said, as the clustering fruit he caught,

There was always a city on this spot.

And so there will be, till Time is not.

Five hundred years rolled by, before

I was standing upon that spot once more.

Not a trace of the city could be seen;

A shepherd lay piping his song alone;

His flocks were browsing the herbage green;

I asked, How long has the city been gone?

He said, while still on his pipe he played—

Fresh flowers spring up, as the others fade,

Here I and my flocks have ever strayed.

Five hundred years rolled by, as before—

I was standing upon that spot once more.

I found there a sea with billows crested;

A man was shooting his fishing gear,

And, as from the heavy draught he rested,

I asked, How long has the sea been here?

He smiled at my question, and thus he spoke

As long as these waves in foam have broke,

It has been the haunt of my fisher folk.

Five hundred years rolled by, as before—

I was standing upon that spot once more.

A tall spreading forest there I found,

And a woodman old in its shadows drear;

The strokes of his axe broke the silence round;

I asked, How old is the forest here?

He said, All the days of my life I've known

This forest a forest, and dwell alone

'Mong trees that ever were growing or grown.

Five hundred years rolled by, as before—

I was standing upon that spot once more.

'Twas a city now, where the hum resounded

Of crowds on a festive holiday

I asked, What time was the city founded?

The forest, and sea, and pipe, where they?

They cried, of my question taking no thought,

'Twas always the same as now—thus spot,

And so will be, till time is not.

And when five hundred years have rolled by, as before,

I'll be standing upon that spot once more.

PIETY IN WOMEN—BY MRS. BALL.

It is a matter of proud congratulation among women, that whatever extraordinary powers may have been bestowed, or pre-empted talents developed in their sex, piety has ever been their concomitant. There is a native purity in the heart of women which naturally leads her to Christianity. On no other altar can she pour out all the pure aspirations of her nature. But the innocent woman ceases to be virtuous, she shrinks with nervous terror from the convictions of conscience, and listens to the bewildering voice of infidelity, in the vain hope of stifling the self-reproach which haunts her solitude. Then, and then only, if she has talents, they become perverted, and to make the wrong appear the better reason, becomes the aim of all her efforts. Her object is to create admiration, not that she can no longer inspire love; and she turns from her own sex and assumes the masculine coarseness or infidel philosophy, for the pure, meek, and holy religion of the gospel. Thus she stands forth to the world an isolated object of contempt and pity; and, cut off from all the sympathies of society, becomes a wandering wanderer, destined finally to sink in the gulf of misery.

But the bright is the reverse of the picture! Look back upon the history page, and see woman proudly living her destiny. See Helena, the pious mother of Constantine, laying the foundation of a christian empire. Look at the British king christianizing and humanizing his subjects, under the influence of a pious queen. And in more modern times, see the Angustine queen of England, with the firmness of manhood, clearing away the superstitions with which time and weakness had obscured the light of religion, and at once reviving learning and christianity. But I need not go back. Look at Mary, the mother of Washington, "a devoted woman," and the preceptor of him who stands in bold relief on the record of time, above a host of heroes and conquerors, the boasted worshippers of an abstract virtue, but in reality the practical murderers of their species. Washington was as good as he was great, and his mother taught him the true philosophy of greatness.

And why should man, who leans with such confident trust upon woman's holy tenderness and purity for all that soothes and consoles, and makes home happy—why should man seek to substitute in her heart, for its innate elevation, the bewildering glare of unbelief? Is woman unhappy in her domestic regulations, what alleviates the bitterness of discord? What like religion robs the reproach of it, and substitutes the heart-touching prayer for the cold tam? Is her husband a wanderer from the domestic hearth? What hinders her from a wish of retaliation, and what reveals him so soon as the settled conviction of his wife's virtue, guarded and sustained by her unwavering faith in another and more blessed state of existence, where the wicked cease from troubling? Oh! sweep not from around the female hearth the banners which religion has reared, by a cold deluge of infidel sophisms. Deny a part, and you shake her faith in the whole. Teach her not to seek the contaminating influence of vice in the world, by inculcating the union of virtue and vice on heaven. Her Bible teaches her that a stark and quiet spirit is the distinguishing trait of a christian, and what man will displace it for the glittering bubble of licentious infidelity.

PATIENCE—A SCHOOLMASTER'S VIRTUE.

In all studies, patience is needed; and he who is studying for an educator, should particularly exercise the virtue and the power of patience in the course of his own private studies, whereby he will not only have schooled himself to bear the rebuke and rebuke of a pupil, but will be enabled to appreciate the difficulties which lie in the way of the student, and to make proper allowances. The difficulties of study are to be overcome with patience; the educator, therefore, must take time for himself, and grant it to others.

For the New York Mirror.

MINNA.

Who, at Saratoga Springs, during the last summer, was the "observed of all observers?"

"One fatal remembrance, one sorrow that throws its bleak shade alike o'er our joys and our woes.
To which life nothing darker or brighter can bring;
For which joy hath no balm and affection no sting."
Moore.

"The thoughts we cannot baffle Force their way without the will."
Byron.

Little think'st thou, gaily dancing,
Of the heart that's wholly thine;
Happy eyes on thee are glancing,
Though unbidden tears fill mine.

Smiles will light these eyes no more—
I have lost thee—woe is me;
Yet the loss I may deplore,
Though it be my destiny!

Dearest Minna! may thy breast
From such wretchedness be free;
Where the dove of peace may rest,
Though, alas! it flies from me.

From the hour I saw thee beaming
On my child thy look of joy,
My fond fancy has been dreaming—
How I envied that dear boy!

Anguish deep the lips ne'er uttered,
Tongue, nor pen, nor lute can tell;
My dark genius sure has muttered,
Hope, love, happiness—farewell!

Days and months my senses wandered:—
Sear'd in heart—with madden'd brain
Like a prodigal I squandered
Peace, I ne'er may hoard again.

She whose soul has wrecked for ever
All my hopes in sorrow's sea,
Could not crush the love—ah, never,
Which, dear girl, I feel for thee.

Sure it was an act inhuman
First to snare then wound my heart—
Fiend, in angel form of woman!
Well I know thee as thou art!

Oh, forgive me, bright perfection!
For the bliss of loving thee—
Droops my soul in sad dejection
O'er hope's grave—a willow tree.

Vain the struggle to forget thee;
Vainer still to cherish love;
Yet how deeply I regret thee
Let my present anguish prove.

Fare thee well—the word is spoken;
Minna, lost one! fare thee well!
Couldst thou read the heart that's broken,
What a history and 'twould tell!

Though my hopes I'm doomed to smother,
Still I'll live alone for thee:
Lady, shouldst thou need a brother,
Let me that true brother be.

Till the green mound of the valley
Shall above my bosom swell,
I am thine—though now I rally
Strength to bless and breathe—farewell!

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

EXTRACTS FROM LECTURES ON GREECE.

BY C. P. CASTANIS.

MUCH curiosity has been exhibited to know the circumstances of the interesting appearance of Americans, on the shores of Greece, near the close of the revolution, with provisions and clothing sent by the generosity of that transatlantic people to relieve the sufferings of the devotees of freedom and the defenders of the rights of humanity. A son of the most deeply-afflicted of the Grecian communities, a community lowered from the height of respect and opulence to the depths of poverty and want (ill-fated Scio), now undertakes the task of gratifying the desire expressed by so many friends, to hear the story from an eye-witness, and recipient of American bounty.

It was chiefly in 1827 and 1828, that the relief was forwarded from America. It would, perhaps, be satisfactory to know what the condition of the country was, at that period, to call for succor from places so remote, and put into action the sympathy of so many foreign states.

The aspect of the country harmonized exactly with the distress of every inhabitant. The green and balmy Grecian islands were smoking with ruin. Scattered lay the blackened tomb of her immense population, presenting only now and then a survivor who wept and served as a slave to the Turk, who was going about to undermine the lofty walls of the Chian mansions, for the purpose of finding the paltry treasures, for which he had murdered innocence and wisdom, and even the venerable and aged priest, that once walked in that paradise and favourite resort of travellers through the Orient.

The giant ghost of Crete stalked where her hundred cities once stood, and there saw she the falsely-styled disciplined Egyptian troops, the regular corps of Mehmet Ali, the pretended defender, torturing her defenceless children.

Ipsara's barren rock, the Thermopylae of the Ægean, was rent in twain, and the sea around might have revealed the bones of her brave defenders with those of their wives and children, who preferred death to the harem and servitude, and perished and leaped into immortality from their exploding fortress. All the renowned Cyclades displayed the traces of revenge and hatred upon their shores and rocky summits.

Ægina and Salamis, as formerly at Xerxes' approach, were covered with Athenian families, which stood anxiously watching the regions of Attica and the Acropolis, especially where Minerva's temple was destined for a short time longer during the terrible siege to bear the flag of freedom, while at the command of Criotez, the gallant phrurarch, or captain of the watch, the Parthenon's base seemed to cast forth Jove's own thunderbolts upon the seventy thousand barbarians of Kiutahy, the Albanian general.

Then the Peloponessus! Neither pen nor tongue can describe the scenes that were presented in Argolis, Messene, and in every part of the peninsula. At Navarino, the Egyptian regular was roasting alive and maiming in every imaginable way the captives. The present author saw many a poor wretch who had escaped from the Egyptians holding his tongue, which had been cut out, in one hand, and beckoning for aid with the other. Argos was completely devastated, and the inhabitants could find not even huts or tents to shelter them in their almost utter destitution of clothing.

Such was the prospect, when the American ships, sent with the benevolent design of relieving the starving and naked, sailed through the Ægean sea. On every side, on the island and on the main land, nothing was seen but desolation and war. The Americans almost feared that the objects of their sympathy were past relief. They had but a short time previously quitted a youthful and vigorous nation, green with forest and smiling with cities. But now they beheld the ruins of a people, and the sad and distressing remnants of what the rage of fanatical despots had overthrown. But we hasten to the account of the distribution of the supplies.

The number of the American ships sent at different intervals was five; namely, two from New-York, two from Philadelphia, and one from Boston. The chief ports at which landings were effected, were Poros, (Troezene), Nauplion and Ægina.

As the warm-hearted Americans landed, they were greeted by the joyful tears of a persecuted nation. Although Greece had lost her Bozzaris, her Guras, her Caraiscos, her bravest generals; although sixteen hundred of her gigantic Cretan children had fallen a few days before on the plains of Attica, with a large band of the noblest Sulioti; although Greece had lost almost every hope, she welcomed not only with joy the angels of succor, but with confidence of success, because she saw that the cries of suffering justice and liberty had been heard across the roaring waves of the broad Atlantic. When the representatives of the land of Washington met the gaze of that oppressed nation, it seemed that fury was in fact doing to Greece the homage which the freeborn Romans had refused, when they sacked Corinth, whose sons, by their knowledge of Homer, so affected the Roman despot, that he relented, although it was too late to save. It seemed that the very shades of a free-born antiquity had conducted to their native shores these benefactors, to show the modern people of Greece how imperishable is the influence of true national worth, and also prove another thing through the American munificence, namely, that after the lapse of ages, Greece had at last found a nation, an offspring of the same lofty divinities, and a true relative and ally. On the Peloponessus at that very moment the Egyptians, the gigantic race of antiquity, were murdering and torturing in the most barbarous manner, like those of their own primeval Pharaohs. Next, the Jews, a nation boasting of their laws, which their historians assert, were not adopted by the Greeks, because their writers were prevented by Jehovah from promulgating divine privileges intended only for Jews; the Jews, I say, were dragging to the sea-shore with every demonstration of contempt the bodies of the slaughtered Christian Greeks! Next, again, the descendants of the Romans, Venetians and Genoese, who formerly invaded Greece, and who are Roman Catholics, were mocking at our calamities. As for the European people, the people of France, England, Russia and Germany, excepting Austria, the same could not be said, for they really assisted the Greek people much at this crisis; but the Christian invincible kings, the plenipotentiaries of Europe, were looking on, seemingly indifferent. But the Americans, devoid of the self-interest and bigotry so common elsewhere, appeared less as foreigners than as brethren. While Egyptian, Turk, Jew, Frank, Armenian, and all the barbarous tribes of Europe, Asia Minor and Northern Africa, were against us, Christian Greece, struggling for liberty, the Americans were not afraid to sail alone amid so many heartless spectators, in order to nourish and console the suffering descendants of Homer, Minos and Lycurgus. Look through all history, and your eye will find no act of benevolence like that of a nation that sent ships across the wide Atlantic, through the Mediterranean and the Ægean, on a message of mercy.

The Americans were naturally shocked on entering Nauplion in Peloponessus, to see the distress which prevailed in that city. Here were assembled the elite of the Greek population, escaped from the Egyptian. At the time the Greeks possessed in Peloponessus only this post, together with Corinth and Monembasia, and some retreats on the mountains of Sparta. Every day the sky was echoing to the thunder and shock of battle, in some part of Peloponessus. Over fifty thousand Egyptian regular troops had been poured upon this peninsula, and against that formidable force the few starving hundreds of the bold Spartans, Cretans and Sulioti, were hurling mountains of vengeance and recalling the shades of those demigods who fought, in the pristine age, with fate and dire necessity.

Nauplion had formerly been inhabited by the Turks alone, until the valiant Stalkas, a Peloponessusian, during the terrible siege, early in the revolution, scaled the walls of Pallameda, the fortress, with a few score of Greeks, and massacred the guard, when the Grecian force followed and took the city. At this time some of these Turkish-built houses, which were very inconvenient, were filled with twenty families, while the streets also were covered with refugees from the surrounding country and islands. Here the Americans beheld the pride of the Grecian population almost naked and starving. Many wounded soldiers were perishing for want of a surgeon. The hospitals were crowded with patients. This was truly a crisis. Nothing was heard on the Grecian lips, but "May God bless the Americans." As the supplies were distributed, the Greek girls thanked the donor and added, "May God pardon all your sins." This phrase resounded continually. There was also another, still more particular, "May God and the most holy Virgin return you safe to your distant country!"

Such were the scenes at Nauplion. At last, the Egyptians being out of the way, the Americans proceeded towards Argos, about six miles distant from Nauplion.

At this time the country presented a sad spectacle. The whole coast, from Argos to Laconia, was covered with men women and children, driven from the interior of Peloponessus. They had fled from the exterminating sword of the Egyptians. The ghost of Cadmus might have wropt to see the land, where he introduced letters, so deplorable and so desperate, through the descendants of those who came to colonize and civilize, what was now being depopulated and rendered barbarous by the order of the Pacha of Egypt. Many a woman, and many a child, had escaped from the exterminators with the loss of an eye, their nose, their ears, or some other portion of their body. Here was a torture worse than the American savages, and on a larger scale.

The wretchedness of most of the population scattered over the plains beggars description. Some persons had scarcely any covering at all, having been obliged for several months to live in caves, which they excavated beneath rocks, where they hid not only for shelter from the night air, but also to escape, if possible, the bands of Egyptians who scourged the whole peninsula, crying, "down with the infidels!" Navarino, on the opposite coast, was a sort of Avernus to the unfortunate natives of that city; for the tortures of the ancient hades could not have been more refined; and many a means of prolonging life through the most intense pain was adopted by the Egyptian demons, for the hellish delight of beholding their victims writhe, groan, display features of grief, and turn purple amid the throes of martyrdom. One amusement was, to cause two victims to kneel on the ground, and essay one's dexterity in cutting off both necks at once, in which case, when the executioner was successful, the tongues of the victims made a vibratory motion and a slight murmur. The sufferers who escaped from Navarino were said by their friends to have arisen from the dead, just, as in ancient times, when one returned from a long journey of peril, the friends observed, "you have been rescued from the hades."

The maidens who had escaped from Navarino presented a pitiful sight. They could not harden their hearts nor close their memory to the terrific scenes which they had witnessed. They tore their dark ringlets and exclaimed, "Oh God, to what hast thou condemned us? Is there no Christian arm to relieve us? Are we indeed the last of Christians doomed to this fate!"

The poor, untaught, simple-hearted girls knew not that the world contained Christian kings and autocrats who might at a blow abase and exterminate all the forces of Turkey and Egypt. Had they been fully sensible of such a fact, their grief would have been still greater to reflect that Christendom should permit the massacre of a whole Christian nation.

It is well, here, to remark that the females, and the inhabitants in general, in Peloponessus were not so well educated as those in other parts of Greece. Most of the Peloponessusians could neither read nor write. This arose from the strictness maintained there by the Turks since the past century; for it is well known that the Peloponessusians particularly, together with other Greek communities, raised the first standard of liberty in modern times. This happened in 1769, and lasted ten years till 1779, during all of which time the Peloponessus was overrun by myriads of the wildest Albanians, whom the undaunted Spartans cut entirely in pieces, but not until the greater portion of the country had seen the same calamities witnessed at the close of the late revolution. The Russians who had promised assistance refused it, when the Peloponessusians needed only powder and ball to complete their vengeance, and join the other Greeks in a general assault against the Ottomans. Thus the misfortunes which happened through the influence of the promises of Catherine II. of Russia, were here repeated, after the lapse of more than fifty years, to the children of those sufferers. In that manner, it seemed to the Peloponessusians that they were doomed to struggle for liberty, and gain no other boon than the privilege of dying where their ancestors fell.

During the time which intervened between the revolt of 1769 and the revolution of 1821, the pachas and beys of the Peloponessus or Morea were obliged with the Sultan to keep the strictest subjection to his despotic rules, and increase the acts of outrage and insult upon the natives, that they might be prevented from future insurrection.

Thus it was natural to find the Peloponessusians more ignorant than the other Greeks. Many of them could not fancy who the Americans were. It was a ludicrous sight to observe their astonishment. The girls especially could scarcely credit their own sparkling eyes when they were told that friends had come from America. "America! where is that place?" exclaimed some of them, wiping away their tears. Accordingly, a certain Yankee, then present, pointed towards the ground, in order to indicate that the Americans were antipodes, or on the other side of the globe. But the Yankee mode of interpretation was altogether too deep. The Greeks rolled their eyes and said: "Surely they are from the infernal regions! and who should wonder that our calamities should excite the sympathy of the unseen world?" Some persons from New-York and Philadelphia succeeded much better in giving the wished-for knowledge. They pointed towards the sea, and heaved a long sigh, to indicate that they had come from a distant place, and a country where they had left objects worthy of sighing after.

This last explanation had a magical effect. The Americans were forthwith and henceforth brethren and kindred in spirit to the descendants of the Herculidae. Such was the scene of introduction between American and Greek. But the more ludicrous part remains to be told. It was really tragico-comic to see the appearance of the Greeks in the clothing forwarded from America. The tight sleeves of the shirts, the tight pantaloons, and all the tight array of the American form was transferred upon many thousands of Greeks. The singular gowns of the ladies afforded much amusement to the Grecian damsels, who were for ever turning their heads to look behind and get a glimpse of the general fit and figure. The men capered about in the greatest ecstasy, often wearing a dress half Greek and half American, of the most fantastic appearance. The new-comers poured in in great numbers, and were glad to throw aside their blood-stained tunics, which they had not changed or mended for many months, and assume a new dress. Many boxes were filled with cloth unwrought, accompanied with needles, tape, and every article needful in making new clothing. Consequently, the young ladies were soon set to work. It is impossible to conceive the joy of some who had scarcely been able to shelter themselves in bad weather from the wind and rain. All the dwellings were destroyed, as it has been remarked, out of the fortified posts and the city of Nauplion. Consequently, the accommodations for the most delicate females were not as good as those of the wildest North American Indians. A hole was dug in the ground, and there reposed the beauty of Peloponnesus. All these sufferers were devoted christians, and they had prayed to God that one christian community would step forward, and prove that the disinterested love taught by the fathers of the Greek church would display itself, if any vestige of such affection really existed. Accordingly, on the appearance of the Americans, they exclaimed: "God has answered our prayer! Assuredly America has a heart that responds in perfect harmony to that of Hellas!"

In the distribution of the clothing, the recipients, in searching the pockets of their dresses, often found billets of paper, which they mistook for bank notes and commercial orders. These supposed notes were presented to the Americans for the money, but to no purpose; and at last, by using an interpreter, they learned that the papers were merely expressive of the attachment and veneration of the donors for the nation which they were succouring.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

GOETHE'S FAUSTUS.

SIXTH NOTICE.

In our previous numbers we have portrayed, with the aid of the poet, the characters of Faustus and Mephistopheles. It remains for us to depict the third actor in the mystery, the exquisite creature of Margaret. A new interest is now brought into the drama. Hitherto we have seen the doctor and the devil, surrounded by mere subsidiaries and adjuncts to the scene; peasants and soldiers at one point, carousing students at another, and at a third witches and cat-sps. These, however, have been but the fillings-up of the pictures. They have been subservient to the main personages of the piece. Interpret them as we may, the drinking bout in Auerbach's cellar, and the visit to the witch's kitchen, are but merry extravaganzas, whose absence would impair the whole poem only by abbreviating it. As for any aid they lend in developing the main design, they might be lost, without being missed. They are comic interludes, relieving the tragic view of the work, acquainting us with the gay traits of the character in Mephistopheles, and the description of entertainments to which he introduced the doctor. In this light, we can understand and enjoy them. But the scene now opens upon a character, which is, no less than Faustus or Mephistopheles, essential to the progressive development of the poem.

Mild, innocent, and lovely, a simple-hearted cottage girl, guileless herself, and knowing not of guile in the world, appears before us Margaret. After gazing upon the vision of the mirror, and quaffing the subtle beverage prepared for him by the witch, Faustus first meets and salutes her in the street. His advances are repelled. Let Faustus describe her:

By heaven, she is a lovely child;
A fairer never met my eye,
Modest she seems, and good and mild,
Though something pert was her reply—
The red lips bright—the cheeks so soft light—
My youth had not departed quite!
She passed, her timid eyes declining,
Deep in my heart they still are shining—
And her light spirit's lively play
Hath stolen me from myself away!

Mephistopheles interrupts his soliloquy. The doctor, somewhat abruptly and peremptorily, demands instant possession of the girl, who had just passed. After some protestation of the difficulty of gratifying his wish, the devil promises to put him in the way of success; laughing at his impatience, and reminding him that the toil and trouble of winning a treasure augment its value, and stimulate the desire of possession. Faustus tells him that he needs no such incentive, and the next scene opens at evening upon the doctor in the chamber of Margaret. After dismissing his devil-companion, he breaks forth in a most touching and exquisite strain, which we must copy without the loss of a line. The contrast between the images and impressions of tranquillity, suggested by the scene, and the perturbed spirit to which they are presented, is vividly and strikingly exhibited:

FAUSTUS (looking round.)

How calm! how happy dwells the tender light
In this still sanctuary, reposing here,
And the sweet spirit of peace pervading all,
And blessing all. Spirit of peace and love,
I give myself to thee! Oh love, whose breath
Is fed on the delicious dew of hope,
Be thou henceforth my life!

How round we breathe
In everything the same prevailing quiet
And neatness, and the feeling of contentment!
In low estate what more than riches are,
And this poor cell, how very, very happy!

[He throws himself on the leathern arm-chair beside the bed.

Receive me, thou who hast with open arm,
Year after year, the generations gone
Welcomed in joy and grief: how many a swarm
Of children round this patriarchal throne
Have gathered here! perhaps beside this seat—
I well can fancy it—a happy child
Even now the scarce is more—at Christmas eve,
My love has knelt down at her grandpapa's feet,
Among the children grouping to receive
The Christmas gifts, with pleasure undefiled,
Kissing the good old man I see her stand,
Her young round cheeks pressed on his withered hand.

The spirit of contentment, maiden dear,
Is breathing in thy very atmosphere;
I feel it sway me while I linger here.
The sense of neatness, felt in everything,
Speaks with a mother's voice, and bids thee spread
The little table with its covering.
The floor with clean and crackling to the tread—
Everywhere round the hand beloved I trace,
That makes a paradise of any place.

Here could I linger hours on hours,
Where dreams and meditative thought,
And, nature, thy benignant powers
Within her virgin bosom wrought,
As day by day such influence pure,
Of heaven and earth her heart matures,
And pain would welcome forth and win
To light the angel from within.

Here lay the slumbering child, her tender breast
Filled with the warmth of happy life; and here
The heavenly image, on the soul impressed
Came out, as clouds part off, divinely clear

But thou, accursed, what art thou?
What brings thee to her chamber now?
Alas! I tremble but to think,
And feel my heart within me shrink.

Poor Faustus! has some magic cloud
Befooled thine eyes? thy reason bowed?
Else why this burning passion strange!
And why to love this sudden change?
Oh man—unstable, erring, blind!
The plaything of the passing wind!

And, should she now return and meet
Thee here, how would the hostess shrink
Into the coward! at her feet
In what confusion sink!

MEPHISTOPHELES (entering.)

Away—I see her at the door.

FAUSTUS

I go and I return no more.

His better angel triumphed for the moment, but the sneering, mocking fiend at his elbow soon recovers his rightful mastery. Of the arts by which the maiden was won, the progress of the lover's guilty courtship, and the introduction of a new actor on the stage in the person of Martha, the accommodating assistant of Mephistopheles in his devil's purpose, we need but make passing allusion. Already have we dwelt so long on this masterpiece of poetic invention, that we are fearful it may be but "bestow tediousness" on some of our readers. One exquisite little passage in a garden-scene, however, cannot but delight you, and here it is:

FAUSTUS.

Sweet love!

MARGARET.

One moment wait.

[She plucks a star-flower, and picks off the leaves one after another.

FAUSTUS.

Why pluck the star-flower?

Do you wish a bunch of bows?

MARGARET.

No, I just fancied

Trying a little game of chance.

FAUSTUS.

What mean you?

MARGARET.

You will laugh at me.

[She plucks off the leaves, and murmurs to herself.

FAUSTUS.

What are you murmuring?

MARGARET (half aloud.)

He loves me—loves me not.

FAUSTUS.

Angelic creature!

MARGARET.

[As she plucks off the last leaf with eager delight.

He loves me!

FAUSTUS

Yes, my child, deem this language of the flower
The answer of an oracle—"He loves thee!"
Dost thou know all the meaning of "He loves thee?"

[Holds both her hands.

MARGARET.

I am all over trembling.

FAUSTUS.

Tremble not!

Oh, let this look, this pressure of the hands,
Say to thee what no words can say: henceforth
Be our whole being lost in one another
In overflowing joy—that loves and loves
For ever and for ever! Could it end
It were—but no, it cannot, cannot end!

[Margaret presses his hands; disengages herself from him and runs away. He stands for a moment thoughtful and follows her.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

OTHELLO.

FROM THE GERMAN OF WILLIAM HAUFF.

The theatre was crowded; a singer, who had been recently engaged, was to play Don Juan. The pit heaved like a restless sea, and over the dark mass were sparkling the brilliant plumes and head-dresses of the ladies. The boxes had never exhibited so splendid a display, there having been at the commencement of the season a general mourning, which had been succeeded by the dazzling colours of rich turbans, waving plumes, and variegated shawls. The diadem of that brilliant circle, however, was an elegant and lovely girl who, with kindness and affability in every look, now graced the royal box: One regretted that her lineage was so lofty, for that fresh bloom—that bright serene brow—that inviting mouth—those pure mild eyes, were all formed for love, and not for cold respect. Her whole mien was in perfect keeping with her simple natural beauty. She seemed to have resigned all artificial ornament to the haughty circle that surrounded her.

"What sprightliness and beauty!" said a stranger to the Russian ambassador, who stood near him, and was looking at her through an opera-glass: "and yet can all this be but a mask—can she feel, feel bitterly—can she possibly," continued he, while he addressed the lady of the ambassador, "can she at this moment be suffering under ill-starred love?"

"Believe me, what I told you is true. She loves, loves passionately, one beneath her own high station. Why do you wonder that a princess, reared from her youth to have a strict regard to appearances, should be artful enough to conceal so improper a penchant from the eyes of the world? Her favourite is now far distant from her."

The overture was drawing to a close; the notes pealed louder and louder from the orchestra; and the eyes of the spectators were directed with intense interest towards the curtain, to catch the first glimpse of the new Don Juan. The stranger, however, in the box of the Russian envoy, had ear for the music of Mozart, no eye for the splendour of the scene. He saw only the lovely girl, who was now more interesting to him than ever, since he had been informed that her bosom was not altogether a stranger to secret love. The eyes of Sophia roamed through the whole extent of the crowded theatre. "What, if her eyes thus glance along the benches to greet him with a stolen smile, a gentle inclination of the head, any one of the thousand tokens with which secret love knows so well how to bless and bewitch a favourite object!" Suddenly a slight blush passed over Sophia's features, she moved her chair a little towards one side, and more than once threw a rapid glance at the door of the box. It was thrown open; a tall handsome young man entered, and took his station by the side of the mother of the princess. Sophia looked with well-feigned indifference at him through her glass; but the stranger shrewdly read in her eye language which revealed that the person who had then entered the box was the happy man. He could not see his face, but the figure and air of the young man were not, he thought, unknown to him. The princess was drawn into conversation by her mother; the young man turned round, and the exclamation, "My heaven! Count Zronienky!" burst involuntarily from the stranger. The ambassador started with alarm, whilst his irritated lady seized her guest by the hands, and as she pulled him down upon his seat, whispered in his ear—"For heaven's sake don't affront us—every one stares at us." The stranger kept his eye intently fixed upon the royal box.

He saw the count engaged in conversation with the princess and the other ladies. Ever and anon he stole glances at Sophia, which she eagerly met and returned. The curtain rose, and the count retired from the box. The stranger whispered to the ambassador that he had served with the count in the Polish wars, and that he knew him to be a brave soldier and a distinguished officer. The ambassador was silent; indeed, neither party seemed inclined to prolong the conversation. The ambassador proposed conducting the foreigner to the royal box, for the purpose of introducing him to the royal party. In passing along the corridor, the latter felt his blood move more rapidly at the thought of being in the immediate presence of one whose love-story was so interesting to him. He was most graciously received by the duchess, who presented him to the Princess Sophia. The name of "Larun," which she now heard, was familiar to her ears. She recollected that she had heard of his having served in the French army. She kept her eyes steadily fixed on the major, who at once understood her meaning, and that she must have received her information from the count.

"I pray be unprejudiced my daughter and myself," said the duchess; "you are a stranger, and must therefore be impartial. Say, then, may there not be some secret power in nature, which requires but to be called forth in wantonness of spirit to prove fatal? Listen to the facts. There is a very beautiful opera, 'Othello,' which I once saw performed abroad, but here we cannot have it represented on account of an absurd story, which nobody now-a-days thinks of believing."

"Don't talk in that way," said the princess; "I know the facts, and I shudder when I think of them."

"Othello," continued her mother, "was for the first time performed about fifteen years ago. There was a tradition—nobody knows its origin—that, on 'Othello' being performed, some terrible event would take place. The play had not for a long time been represented, and nothing occurred. Ultimately, however, it was again brought upon the stage, and again it was followed by a shocking catastrophe. Then the drama was cast as an opera; but the Moor was deaf to the charms of music. The opera was performed, and with the same dreadful result!"

"I can give you," said the major ironically, "an instance of a similar kind from my own personal history. I had an old maiden aunt, and a very disagreeable, mysterious sort of a personage she was. In our childhood we called her our 'plume aunt,' because she wore a large black feather in her bonnet. Well, there is a tradition in our family about the lady, precisely as there is in your own about 'Othello,' that whenever our 'plume aunt' made her appearance, one or other of us should fall sick. To be sure, we laughed and joked—but still the sickness came."

The princess smiled. "I must," said she, to the manifest dissatisfaction of her mother—"I must once more hear Desdemona's dying notes, although I myself should be the sacrifice."

The introduction to the second act was now begun. The stranger quitted the box. He looked round for the ambassador, but he was gone. He was standing in the passage, uncertain which way to turn, when he felt some one grasp him warmly by the hand. He looked round, and recognized the count. A shade of deep melancholy clouded his handsome countenance; there was a wild and shifting glance in his eyes, and his lips were compressed as if in agony. His frenzied winning smile had been exchanged for a sullen discontented expression of countenance. The most striking feature was one of dark suspicion; and the faint streaks of red that still coloured his cheeks were but the faded tints of the bloom of youth. But in spite of these ravages of time and misfortune, there was quite enough of attraction left to justify the partiality of the princess.

"Why gaze so closely," said he after a pause; "do you expect to trace the events of old times in the lines of my countenance? 'Tis all in vain. I have changed with the colour of my life. My heart—why, I only know that I have a heart from this throbbing."

"Nay," continued his friend, in a jocular tone, "what connexion is there between the throbbing and the charms of a certain lady, the favourite daughter of the house of—?"

The count instantly changed colour. He pressed the hand of his old friend closely in his own. "Hush!" he whispered, "a silence for heaven's sake—not a syllable on that subject—let us step aside. Is the Isatis suspected, major?" The major repeated the hints that had been thrown out at the opera by the wife of the ambassador.

The count stood motionless and mute for some minutes. He was obviously labouring under a violent internal struggle. By an effort he recovered his self-command. He begged the loan of a hundred napoleons. His request was instantly granted. It was not till the following morning that the count communicated to his mere to the promise which he had made to the princess, to use all his influence to have "Othello" once more performed. More funds were necessary for that purpose, which were cheerfully advanced by the major, who agreed to accompany the count to the manager of the opera. "His abode," continued the count, "is not far distant—across the corner there stands his dwelling—that little green-coloured house with 'balcony' in front."

The manager of the opera was a short, haggard-looking man, who, having acquired reputation in his earlier years as a singer, was now, in his old age, reposing on his laurels. He received the two friends with a peculiar professional hauteur and dignity, the effect of which, however, was not a little destroyed by the singularity of his dress. He wore a black Florentine cap which he never laid aside, except on the occasion of his arranging his peruke at his hairdresser's. There were strikingly contrasted with this convenient attire of the old man an ample modern frock fitted tightly to his body, and breeches that hung about his limbs in a series of folds. Everything about the manager showed that, in spite of the threescore years which he had seen, he was not altogether dead to the vanities of the world. He wore large fur shoes. He glided round the room without having the appearance of moving his legs. He seemed to move as if on skates.

"I have already been informed of the wishes of the royal family," said the manager, after the count had explained to him the object of his visit. "My only object, I assure you, is to afford entertainment and delight to the royal family; but I must beg to be allowed to substitute some other piece for that which has been suggested."

"Why not Othello?" said the count.

"God forbid!" interrupted the old man; "that would be an open attempt upon the life of one of the royal family. No; so long as I have anything to say in the matter, that fatal play shall never be performed."

"And are you, then," continued the count, "the slave of such vulgar superstitions? Why, your celebrity has reached my ears in foreign lands. Pray destroy not the image I had formed of you by such a foolish conceit."

"The old man was flattered. A complacent smile played upon his wrinkled features. He squeezed his hands into his pockets, assumed a consequential air, and glided several times up and down the room in his fur slippers."

"Superstition! said you? I should be ashamed to be the sport of any superstitious dreams; but where we have facts, superstition is not the proper word."

"Facts!" exclaimed the two friends in one breath. "Yes, gentlemen, facts. You cannot have been long in this town or neighbourhood, if you know not that matters are exactly as I have stated them to be."

"Why, I have somewhere or other," said the major, "heard on such a tale as that to which you allude—that whenever 'Othello' is performed, there is a confagration."

"Confagration! heaven forgive me, I should rather have one incessant blaze. Fire may be extinguished—insurances can be effected—but death—that is a much more perilous affair."

"Death! say you? who is to die?"

"That, alas! is no secret," replied the manager; "I whenever 'Othello' is performed—eight days thereafter one of the royal family dies."

The friends started in horror to their feet, so appalling was the prophetic judgment-like tone in which the old man pronounced these words. However, they instantly resumed their seats. "You will, perhaps, allow me," continued the manager, "to show you the chronicle of the theatre, which has been written by the successive prompters during the last hundred and twenty years."

"By all means, old man," said the count, who seemed inclined to turn the whole affair into ridicule; "let us have a look at the chronicle."

The manager glided very rapidly into his own chamber, and immediately produced a large folio volume, bound in leather and brass. He put on a massy pair of spectacles, and turned over the leaves of the chronicle.

"Now mark what follows," said he. "Here it is written—'Anno, 1740, December eighth, the actress, Charlotte Faudauer, was smothered in this theatre. The play of the evening was the tragedy of Othello, the Moor of Venice, by Shakespeare.'"

"How so?" interrupted the major, "how is it possible that Shakespeare's 'Othello' could have been performed in 1740! Thackeray was the first, if I mistake not, and at a much later period, to introduce that play of Shakespeare into Germany."

"I beg your pardon," replied the old man; "the duke, during his travels in England, saw 'Othello' performed in London, and being struck with its beauties, he subsequently had it translated, and brought out here. But my chronicle proceeds thus:—'The above-mentioned Charlotte Faudauer has performed the character of Desdemona with such marvellous success, by means of the coquet, with which she was to have been killed in the play, God have mercy on her poor soul!' The story of her murder runs thus:

"Charlotte was very beautiful. Duke Nepometh, who cherished a passion for her, was then at the head of a licentious court. She was seduced by the fate of others, whom he had, after a few years, forsaken and left to pine away as miserable outcasts, and therefore for some time repelled his advances. At last, however, having made the duke sign a certain contract, she yielded. The fate of Charlotte was precisely that of his other victims. He gradually became estranged from her. She held out a threat of making public the contract into which he had entered. The fury of the duke knew no bounds. He had in vain attempted to cut her off by poison; at last he bribed a tragedian to have the play of 'Othello' performed. He recollected that Desdemona is suffocated by the Moor. The actor's performance proved too true to nature—Charlotte never took. The duke interfered to prevent inquiry; he took the actor into his service. Eight days afterwards, however, his only son, a prince twelve years of age, died."

Here the old man turned over a few leaves of his book. "The next entry is, 'twenty-eighth September, 1742, Othello, the Moor of Venice,' and on the margin we find this note—'Extraordinary! the Princess Augusta expired on the fifth of October, exactly eight days after the performance of Othello. So died Prince Frederick, two years hence, 1744.'"

"Chance," exclaimed the major, "is all chance."

The old man read on. "The sixth of February, 1748, 'Othello, the Moor of Venice.' Horrible, Prince Albert died suddenly, on the fifteenth." Again—"the sixteenth January, 1775, for the benefit of Madlle. Koller, 'Othello, the Moor of Venice'; the doom once more fell on the head of the poor Princess Elizabeth, who had died so early—twenty-fourth of January, 1778. Coming down to more recent times, we find that 'Othello' was privately performed at the country palace on the sixteenth of October, 1793; and on the twenty-fourth of the same month, the duke died. I can give you a more recent instance still. I myself performed the character of Othello, in Rossini's opera. The theatre was crowded to the ceiling. The count was present. But a spirit of evil came upon him to breathe over us, when Desdemona began to chant her simple air. It was the same house—the same stage, the same scenes that had stood there when Charlotte's life had been brought to a close. I felt a tremor steal over me during the murder scene. With strange emotions I beheld the beautiful, happy beings, in the royal box. For six days nothing was heard of sickness at the palace; the seventh day passed over peacefully; on the eighth, however, Prince Ferdinand was killed in the chase. Here is the passage in the chronicle. The count read—'Othello, an opera, by Rossini, twelfth of March.' And on the margin, these words appeared, three times underlined—'On the twentieth, Prince Ferdinand was killed whilst hunting.'"

The parties looked at each other in silence; they would have laughed, but the grave aspect of the old man, and the striking coincidence of these terrible events, produced a deeper impression than they were willing to acknowledge. The count, however, insisted that the opera should be performed—that the command of the count must be obeyed. The old man crossed himself, and fairly writhed round upon his slippers, as he muttered, "Good heavens! what if the lovely Princess Sophia were to be the next victim!" The two friends descended the stairs, laughing heartily at the prophet of the opera, with the Florentine cap and fur slippers. There were hours in which the major found the count gloomy, absent, peevish, and impetuous in his replies. It was on such occasions that he burst forth into paroxysms of fury. He raved—he cursed in every European tongue—he wept. Having once described the progress of his passion to his friend, he exclaimed—"I must forget—I shall go mad if I do not forget. Wine here, comrades! my soul is parched—flames are raging within me—let me drown all remembrance of my guilt!"

"Text!" interrupted the major, "some one knocks. Come in." The old manager glided into the apartment, and, without a word, performed, said he; "my remonstrances have proved in vain; and yet last night I beheld in a dream a long funeral procession, each man bearing a torch, as is the custom at the burial of one of the royal family. But the object of my visit is to invite you to the rehearsal."

The count and the major, not unwilling to escape, for a time, from themselves and from each other, cheerfully agreed to the proposal of the manager.

Everything was finally arranged for the performance of "Othello." Sophia was "delighted at the prospect of once more hearing Desdemona's song." "When I die," said she, "it will be my sweet dirge." The major remembered the story of the spectre Desdemona—the forebodings of the old manager—his dream of the funeral procession—and Sophia's death song. "What?"—such was the idea that flashed across his mind—"what if the doom be again realised, and she should be the victim?"

Sunday arrived. The major and count rode out. On their return home it rained. The count invited the major to accompany him to his lodgings, that he might have a change of dress. The major, wearing a hat, and wrapped up in a great-coat of his friend, stepped out of his lodgings to go home. He had passed along several streets, when he observed a stranger following him close behind. He was a tall thin man, with a threadbare coat. He put a note into the major's hand, and instantly disappeared. It was embossed paper, richly folded, and the wax bore the impress of a beautifully cut seal. He opened the note in the street—his attention was at once fixed—he read on, and turned pale—he stuffed the letter into his pocket, hurried home, and retired to his own room. He called for a light, and there stood the accursed words, unequivocal and fatal.

"Miscreant! darest thou to leave thy wife and helpless infants to pine in misery, whilst thou parades thyself in pomp and magnificence before the eyes of the world? Why art thou in this town? By the time you carry infamy into the royal circle! Begone! By the time you have read this, the Princess Sophia knows the baseness of thy conduct!"

The major saw at once that he had been mistaken for the count. A tornado of passion was awakened in his soul. There were moments when he felt his hands upon his pistol to shoot the villain dead upon the spot. The hour arrived when the opera was to be begun. The major was pacing the steps of seeing my name blazoned in the newspapers. The huntsman said that his master had no intention of departing that afternoon; he had talked of being at the theatre in the evening. "About five o'clock," continued the huntsman, "my master went out. Close by the reformed church he was addressed (for I followed him) by a tall naggard-looking fellow, who asked my master's name was Count Zronensky; on being answered in the affirmative, the stranger inquired if he had received a letter about a quarter of an hour before. The count said that he had not. The stranger then took him aside, and whispered into his ear. The count turned deadly pale, and trembled all over. He returned instantly to his lodgings, had some luggage packed, sent for post-horses, and drove rapidly down the street towards the Jonathan Cafe."

The major went to the theatre. The overture had commenced. He took a seat from which he had a full view of the royal box. The Princess Sophia, attired in all the charms of loveliness and grace, was seated by the side of her mother. The play being the celebrated "Othello," boxes and pit were crowded. Sophia raised an opera-glass to her eye, and looking anxiously round the audience, she dropped the glass; a cloud of disappointed hope and melancholy lurked beneath her suburn ringlets; her beautifully arched eyebrows were contracted, and revealed a slight, a scarcely perceptible wrinkle of displeasure. The major often confessed afterwards that one of the most horrible moments in his life was that in which he stepped into the royal box at the end of the first act, and heard the princess whisper, "One of our allies has unkindly proved a traitor."

"The count regrets that he has been unexpectedly called away."

"Called away!" echoed Sophia, as every spark of red fled from her cheeks. "Come, come, 'tis a joke upon me. Now I know from whom this little note came." An awful presentiment arose in the mind of the major. "A very pretty note," she continued, playfully showing the edge of a letter which was placed with great care beneath the bracelet that encircled one of her lovely arms—"a right mysterious note, and you are in the conspiracy. I long to retire to my own room, that I may open it."

"Pray give me the note," said the major, raked with the most execrating agony; "it was not intended for your highness—it must have fallen into your hands by mistake."

"So much the better," replied Sophia playfully; "it may be a clue to the secrets of some folks; it was clearly intended for a lady, and it was, of course, but fair that it should fall into my hands." The note returned to his own box, and covered his eyes with his hands, that he might not see the unhappy girl. Once, however, he looked towards the royal box, and felt the certainty of the appalling doom. The diamonds on the clasp of her bracelet were glittering in a thousand brilliant rays, which entered his soul like so many arrows. Desdemona struck her harp—she raised her voice—she warbled forth her dirge. With what wondrous power did those plaintive notes strike every heart—so simple is the song—and yet how fraught with the highest tragic power! A strange fear creeps over one; the murderer is, as it were, heard stealing along in the distance; one is conscious that the inevitable power of destiny is drawing nearer and nearer—it is heard rustling around her, like the pinions of death. She has no misgivings. Gentle and innocent, the sweet girl sits by her harp. Surrounding her bosom, and its accents tremble upon her lips—accents bursting from a full and lowervest breast, for which the dagger is already drawing. He comes, not to her embrace, but for her murder. Desdemona prays for him—blesses him—and in return receives a curse.

Othello stepped upon the stage. The attention of Sophia, who had been steeping in tears, was now more intensely than ever fixed upon the opera. She glanced at her bracelet, and played with the clasp of it. A pensive smile chased away her melancholy. The major had his eyes fixed on her. Good heavens! She draws forth the fatal note, and conceals it in her dress. He sees her secretly breaking the seal—in desperation he rushes along the passage—is hurried on, he knows not why, by some invisible power, to the royal box—a tumult is raised throughout the theatre, the royal household are busting backwards and forwards in all directions—a murmur is heard—"The Princess Sophia has suddenly fallen into a swoon."

A few days subsequent to this event, Major Larun was sitting in his chamber in a state of deep melancholy. His forehead rested upon his hands, his countenance was wan, his eyes half closed. Tears trickled silently down his cheeks. He saw all the fine threads of the impending doom—invisible to any eyes but his own—that were now doubled and interwoven with each other, to be thrown over one gentle ill-starred heart. Ineffable regret was mingled with these mournful reminiscences, when he thought of the lost honour of an old companion in arms, and when the image of the heart-broken Sophia rose before him.

One of the ladies in waiting of the royal family was introduced to the major. She communicated the tidings that the princess continued seriously ill—that the physician to the household held out no hope of recovery. The oil in the lamp of life was exhausted, and the flame was about to expire. The morning of the eighth day dawned. About noon the patient rallied. She heard from the lips of the major, who had been summoned into her presence, a confirmation of all that she dreaded relating to the count. A relapse soon followed. As the evening advanced, the anxiety of the inmates of the palace became more intense. About eleven o'clock she fell into a gentle sleep. From that sleep, however, she never awoke. The doom was once more about to be fulfilled. The spirit of the murdered Desdemona again hovered over the house of —. The Princess Sophia expired a few minutes before twelve on the night of the eighth day after the performance of Othello.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Young Woman's Guide. Boston: George W. Light.

THIS is a new work by Dr. Alcott, the author of the "Young Wife," the "Young Mother," and several similar books, which are having an immense circulation in this country, but still better known, perhaps, by his "Young Man's Guide," which has gone, we know not, to how many editions. The volume now before us, we are told, is meant to correspond to that one; to be for the young women precisely, what that is for the young men. This is not only its best description and recommendation, for none who know any thing of the Young Man's Guide need be informed that it is one of the best books of the sensible, practical species ever published in this country. If there were deficiencies or errors in that work, experience and criticism must have justified the author to avoid them in this. We should not envy, for the benefit of those who associate the author's name occupy but a trifling part of this volume, the contents of which are eminently moral and practical. We predict for it a great circulation, and the more so as it is got up in the style of elegant neatness which generally characterizes the Boston press.

The Musical Magazine, conducted by H. Theodor Hach and T. B. Hayward. Boston. Otis, Broaders and Co.

THIS is the best conducted musical magazine in the country. The articles are evidently written by persons thoroughly acquainted with their subjects. The criticisms are fair, manly, and judicious, penned in a liberal spirit, and unaccompanied by professional bias. From the last number we extract the following account of Mr. Rakemann's concert in Boston:

"The most attractive entertainment to persons of a cultivated musical taste, and probably the finest musical treat of the kind ever offered in Boston, was the concert of Mr. Rakemann, on Monday evening, November fourth. This gentleman came among us well recommended, as being a thorough master of the modern pianoforte school, and of the compositions of its authors and leaders, Thalberg, Henselt, and Chopin. His performance is the first illustration of the style of this school which has ever been offered to the Boston public. His command over the instrument is truly wonderful. Whatever task he gives his fingers they seem to perform as by instinct, notwithstanding its difficulty. At one time it might be a shake for two fingers of one hand, while the other two fingers and thumb of the same hand are playing round them; at another he holds run in octaves for both hands, through the whole extent of the instrument; again, it is the quickest passage in semiquavers allegro assai for the right hand; while the left is playing quaver triplets, extending the arpeggio to the tenth, and yet the little finger of the left holds out the key note; and now a melody is played forte, in the middle, or indeed in any part, of the instrument, by the powerful exertion of the muscles of one finger; while all the others are playing an accompaniment all over the instrument, in mezzo or piano. The muscles which he uses in playing are those of the fingers, hand, and wrist, and scarcely at all those of the arms. The muscles of each finger are so fully exercised and developed as to render it entirely independent of the others in its action, so that each seems to be endued with an individual life; and this is what enables him to produce all the various effects with such smoothness and beauty. Every note comes out round and distinct, and in expression exactly what the master intended. At the same time, he makes a new use of the pedal, which greatly increases the power of the expression—he has a method of bringing the pedal to bear upon each note as he wants it. In short, he develops the character of each piece in its true light; and while we receive new conceptions of the works of the most modern composers, we are not less delighted with his delineations of the compositions of Hertz and Beethoven. Hertz's variations had a grace thrown around them which was truly charming; and Beethoven's, in the grandeur of his tone, and the beauty of his art in working them out. His accompaniment of the violin was eminently well managed and effective. His organ-playing also, and especially his management of the pedals, showed his skill on that instrument. His audience, for a first and single performance, to the credit of the Boston public be it said, was much larger than could have been expected, especially considering the winter time; and it was noticed by many as being the most select and discriminating ever recollections in the city.

Republications of the British Magazines and Reviews. New-York: Jemma M. Mason, (late Lewis.)

These republications continue to be issued in excellent style and with the greatest possible promptitude. The last number of the London Westminster Review is peculiarly rich. Bentley's Miscellany is also sustained with its accustomed spirit. The story by Peak, in the last number, is a capital affair.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The beautiful and touching lines to Minna, on the fourth page of this day's Mirror, are from the pen of a new correspondent, from whom we hope to hear frequently, if he can command sufficient leisure from his numerous professional engagements to do so occasionally with the muses. Are we not right in presuming the writer to be an old and highly valued friend, whose name terminates with an M. D. I. If so, he is doubly welcome to these columns.—A Philadelphia correspondent sends us a long tirade against the proprietors of the new Opera-House in that city. We decline the communication. We can see nothing "preposterous" or "irritational" in the undertaking. On the contrary, if carried out, in every respect, in conformity with the plan of the committee, we do not doubt it would be an ornament and a benefit to the city, besides repaying the proprietors amply for their outlay.—"Drury" wishes to know if there is any truth in the report as to the cutting-down of the salaries at the Park Theatre. Ask Mr. Blake.—We have committed to the flames the wretched personalities of "Phiz" in relation to Mr. Price.—We do not well see that the controversy between the Knickerbocker and Bentley's Magazine can be settled by the eyes of "J. D." The quarrel is a very good one as it stands.—The first American edition of Bulwer's new play of "The Sun Captain" was given extra to the public in last Saturday's number of the "New World." We agree with "Copyright" that stipends for a work which cost in London more than a guinea is "preposterously cheap."—We must decline "Y."s" letter from Washington, describing "Scenes at the opening of Congress." It is altogether too personal.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1839.

Atlantic and Pacific ship-canal.—The project of a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien, uniting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, begins to be agitated anew in this city with a spirit and ability, which we doubt not will result in directing the immediate and effectual attention of Congress to this vast and momentous enterprise. It will unquestionably be a matter of surprise to future times that an improvement so visibly pointed out by the hand of nature, so simple, and so easy to be accomplished, should have been so long deferred in this age of steam-ships, railroads and canals. The United States is the country most immediately interested in the accomplishment of this great work, and by the United States ought it to be commenced and achieved. Apart from the consideration that it would save to our navigation and that of Europe a distance of some twelve thousand miles round Cape Horn, are other considerations of a moral and philanthropic nature, which are not unworthy of being brought into the view. What an immense influence might be wrought upon the inhabitants of the whole of that part of North and South America bordering on the Pacific by bringing them into contiguous communication with the civilization of the United States and of Europe! Of what prospective importance will not the accomplishment of this work by the United States appear, when we look forward to that period, in all probability fast approaching, when our population shall extend to our Pacific frontier, and the influence of our laws, language, and free institutions, shall be felt and blessed by thousands on the banks of the Oregon! Of the practicability of carrying this grand scheme into effect, there appears to exist no longer any doubt.—Those who are still incredulous are referred to the copious and eloquent statements that are in course of publication in the Evening Signal and New World, to the editors of which journals belongs the credit of having revived this topic, and urged it upon the attention of Congress in the most efficient manner. A memorial to Congress, understood to be from the pen of Mr. Radcliff, of this city, formerly our consul at Lima, has been placed in the office of these publications in Ann-street for signatures, and we sincerely trust that it will be sent to Washington with the name of every voter in this city attached.

Lord Brougham and Count D'Orsay.—Considerable sensation was produced lately in London by a report of a fatal accident to Lord Brougham, which turned out to be a fabrication; but, as if every sort of falsehood was to be combined with the rumour, it was insinuated that Count D'Orsay had announced the sad news in a jocular manner at White's Club. This misrepresentation had been flatly contradicted by the Count and Lord Methuen, to whom he happened to communicate the intelligence, received by letter from the north; "but such denial," says the Literary Gazette, "was most unnecessary for all those who knew the habit or mutual regard and esteem in which the parties live. The feelings of Count D'Orsay are too good to allow of his making a jest upon any calamity (however fine and trenchant his wit is on other occasions); and, above all, he is about the last man in Europe who could joke on the misfortune of a friend."

Natural flowers in winter.—A distinguished florist tells us of an ingenious mode for preserving natural flowers. Let some of the most perfect buds of the flowers it is wished to preserve, such as are latest in blowing and ready to open, be chosen. Cut them off with a pair of scissors, leaving the stem about three inches long; cover the end immediately with Spanish wax, and when the buds are a little shrunk and wrinkled, wrap them up separately in paper and place them in a dry box. When it is desired to have the flower to blow, take the buds overnight, cut off the sealed end of the stem, and put the buds into water wherein has been infused a little nitre or salt, and the next day you will have the pleasure of seeing the buds open and expand themselves, and the flowers display their most lively colours, and breathe their agreeable odour around.

New-York Society Library.—The fine building opposite the Athenaeum, intended for the New-York Library, is nearly completed. We should judge it would be ready for the reception of the books early in the new year.

Ball-room scene in Ireland.—A correspondent of a London paper gives an account of a curious scene, which lately transpired in a ball-room in Ireland, and which ended in an indictment being served on one of the parties. The origin of the dispute was the law of precedence between two lovely women, Lady Frances Parker, sister to a noble earl, and the Hon. Mrs. Smith, at a public ball in the town of Youghal. The blood ran so high between the ladies that there were two supper-tables, and two sets of country dances; at the head of one was the Lady, and the Hon. Madam at the head of the other; but in the course of the evening Lady Frances Parker, with her partner, came to the head of the Hon. Mrs. Smith's set, and danced down; but the general company resented the intrusion by not turning her. The plaintiff in the case was dancing with Miss French, and seeing the conduct of Lady Frances, said that he would not dance with her, and bade a friend near him to act in the same way. Rogers overheard the conversation, and at once called Savage a "scoundrel and a blackguard," upon which Savage inflicted summary punishment on Rogers, who was put out of the room. Captain Parker, husband to Lady Frances, first sought an explanation, and Savage declared he had no intention to insult the lady. Captain Rogers took it up on his own account, and sent three messages, but Mr. Savage would not meet him. The defendant then posted him in the manner following:—"Counselor Christopher Savage having insulted a lady who was my partner at a ball at Youghal, I could not avoid expressing my disapprobation of such insolence, when he and his friends struck and abused me. Notwithstanding which unmanly conduct he has refused to give me the satisfaction due to a gentleman. I therefore post him as a coward."

Pauline Garcia.—A letter from Paris says, "Madame Maibras always said that her sister would far outstrip her in power of execution. When praised for any of her great efforts, she often exclaimed, 'Ah! wait until Pauline appears.' Pauline Garcia is superior as a musician to her sister. In fact, all the Garcias are from infancy as familiar with music, as other children are with playthings. They know no existence without it—it is their natural language, and never had melody and harmony more brilliant interpreters. Pauline has composed some beautiful trifles. I myself have heard a ballad of hers with German words, which is quite worthy of being placed by the side of Schubert's compositions. She is also clever with her pencil, and all her costumes are designed by herself. In addition to this she speaks four languages perfectly. Taken altogether, she must be considered a rare creature, and will eventually merit the praises now lavished on her by the Parisians."

A New-Zealand princess.—There is now in London the daughter of a New-Zealand chief, who has given her hand and heart to a Scotch seaman, named Wilkinson. Wilkinson resided two years in the colony, the chief of which gave his daughter in marriage to the seaman. The lady is of a copper colour, rather under the middle size; the lips are dyed a light blue colour, and her face and neck very curiously tattooed. Her age is supposed to be about twenty six or twenty-seven, and though her appearance is anything but prepossessing, except in the eyes of her husband, she is a remarkably good-tempered and docile creature, and a great favourite with all who have paid her a visit. The "princess" is very partial to good-old English fare and strong beer.

Lycæum lectures.—The course of lectures to be given at the Tabernacle, under the superintendence of the New-York Lycæum, promises to be unusually popular. The opening lecture by our correspondent, the Hon. Caleb Cushing, was attended by a very numerous and respectable audience, and the orator received a good deal of merited applause. The Hon. Alexander H. Everett was announced to lecture on Thursday, and the remaining lectures will be given by the Rev. Orville Dewey, M. M. Noah, William L. Stowe, John O. Sargent, Horace Mann, James H. Raymond, John Neal, Samuel L. Southard, Rembrandt Peale, and other gentlemen favourably known to the community for their eloquence and literary abilities.

Mr. Brackett, the sculptor.—We examined with much pleasure some of the busts and mouldings by this young artist, who, like Power, and Clevenger, and Powell, is from Cincinnati. His rooms are contiguous to the Apollo Gallery, and he has already displayed a degree of talent in his art which promises abundant success. His bust of Dr. Alban G. Smith, of this city, is remarkably well executed. The attitude is spirited, and the likeness correct. Brackett is yet destined to make a noise in the world of art. He has industry, tact and genius enough to elevate him, aided by unwavering perseverance and devotion to his art, to the highest position as a sculptor.

West's picture of Christ rejected.—This magnificent picture is removed from the Stuyvesant Institute, where numbers visited to be gratified with a view of this unparalleled production from an American artist. This country has reason to be proud of many works of art by the hands of her sons; but no one greater exists than this from Benjamin West's easel. This gem is in the possession of the grandson of this great artist, who, we understand, is about conveying it to Boston.

Mr. Mills's Lectures on Physiognomy.—The lectures of Mr. Mills upon this interesting subject at the Stuyvesant Institute have deservedly attracted large and fashionable audiences. Mr. Mills is a most agreeable lecturer, and is likely to become extremely popular. He treats the subject of physiognomy in a most original, instructive, and entertaining manner, and we advise all who would pass an hour delightfully, to attend the course advertised.

WITHIN THOSE ANCIENT ABBEY WALLS.

MUSIC COMPOSED BY JOHN BARNET.

ANDANTINO CON ANIMA.

With-in an-cient ab-bey walls 'Twas first her smile I met A mid the of co-ro-nals, Whose few for-get; I join'd the and there was an-gel smile to me Shone ly as the rays of heav'n on the deep blue sea! Shone sweet-ly as the rays of heav'n Up - on the deep blue sea!

We met again—a solemn strain
Re-echo'd from the choir,
And music gave to friendship's chain
Affection's holier fire.

I mark'd the smile forsake her cheek,
Her ruby lips grow pale,
As if to emulate a brow
Fair as lilies of the vale;
As if to emulate a brow
Like lilies of the vale.

And she is mine—if storms betide
The course my years may take,
In sunshine may the waters glide
Scarcely for her sake.

And never till the latest hour,
That I on earth shall be,
Will I forget sweet music's pow'r,
And all its charms for me;
I'll ne'er forget sweet music's pow'r,
And all its charms for me.

MISCELLANY.

The little poem called the "Fairies' Bower," appeared in the Mirror more than a year ago. Those who may have read it, will remember that the scene was laid on the Catskills, in the pleasant summer-time. The following is a season picture for the present

A WINTER SCENE IN THE "FAIRIES' BOWER."

OLD Winter hath come in his icy power,
And Beauty has flown from the elfin bower:—
No longer lingers the spirit there,
She has sought a home more bright and fair.
She hath gone with her robe of beauteous green,
That richly shone in the summer's sheen—
With her leafy crown and sweet wild flower,
And the soft moss spread in her chosen bower.
The snow-spirit sits on the elfin throne,
And the realm around her away must own:
In her fleecy robes so gaily 'dight,
With icy gems all glittering bright—
And she dwells alone, a spirit drear,
While the merry days no more appear.
Oh the music hath died from the fairy bower,
The song that woke it in happier hour—
The wild-bird's lay, and the summer breeze,
That gently stirred in the forest trees—
And the blithesome note of the merry fay,
Through the rosy hours of a summer's day.
The bird hath flown to a sunnier clime,
To come not again 'till sweet spring-time;
And the zephyr light hath wander'd by,
And gone with its airy melody;
While a sadder wail the storm-sprite sings,
And dark is the shade of its moving wings.
Oh! Winter has come in his icy might,
And Beauty dies in its withering blight—
And music sleeps in the elfin bower,
To wake no more 'till happier hour.

KNOWLEDGE AND IGNORANCE.—The man of knowledge lives eternally after death, while his members are reduced to dust beneath the tomb. But the ignorant man is dead even while he walks upon the earth; he is numbered with living men, yet existeth not.

CAPABILITY GREATER THAN PERFORMANCE.—Men are often capable of greater things than they perform. They are sent into the world with bills of credit, and seldom draw to their full extent.

LOST VOICES RECOVERABLE.—In Monday's sitting of the Academy of Sciences M. Arago made a communication respecting a new application of a process of physics to the art of healing, the medical apparatus of condensed air contrived by M. Tabarie. It appears that a stay of more or less duration in condensed air has a very beneficial effect upon persons suffering from pulmonary complaints, though the manner in which it acts upon patients is not as yet satisfactorily accounted for. M. Arago informed the academy that M. Francour, our distinguished mathematician, having, in consequence of a disease of the larynx, been visited with a total extinction of his voice, had been able to utter some words after three sittings in M. Tabarie's apparatus, and after the eleventh experiment he had wholly recovered his voice, so as not only to speak, but likewise to sing. It was of great importance to make a German sing, but much more so to render the same service to our celebrated artist, Mademoiselle Falcon, who will shortly be indebted to M. Tabarie's process for the possibility of again commanding public applause.—French paper.

CONJUGAL AFFECTION.—Crassbeck, a Flemish painter, entertaining some doubt as to the affection of his wife, who was a modest and agreeable woman, and being anxious to ascertain if she really loved him, he one day stripped his breast naked, and painted the appearance of a mortal wound on his skin; his lips and cheeks he painted of a livid colour, and on his pallet near him he placed his knife, painted on the blade with a blood-like colour. When everything was prepared, he shrieked out, as if he had been that instant killed, and lay still. His wife ran in, saw him in that terrifying condition, and showed so many tokens of unaffected passion, passion, and real grief, that he rose up convinced of her affection, disavowed her grief, and freely told her his motive for the whole contrivance, which he would not have violated truth, had he described it as a very despicable truth.

MINIATURE LANDSCAPE-PAINTING.—Van Mander relates, that Anne Snyters, the wife of John de Herre, a Flemish sculptor, painted a landscape, representing a mill with the sails bent, and the miller appearing as if mounting the stairs, loaded with a sack; upon the terrace where the mill was fixed, were seen a horse and cart, and, on the road, several peasants. The whole was highly-finished, and pencilled with wonderful delicacy and neatness, and was also accurately distinct; yet the painting was so amazingly minute, that the surface of it might be covered with one grain of corn.

BRIBERY.—Sweetmeats were formerly much used to bribe persons of quality, or judges, to whom a request was to be made. This custom at last rose to such a pitch that Louis IX. of France, issued a proclamation, wherein he forbade all judges to take more than ten penny-worth a week. Philip, the handsome, subsequently curtailed this quantity to no more than what one could use in one day.

BARONESS LIZZEN.—The true history of a person who has acquired such influence over the queen of England may not be without its usefulness. The Baroness Lizzen was born in Savoy, where her father, an humble cowherd, employed her, in early years, in attending to his cows, in milking, and other occupations of the dairy. By some accidental circumstance she was seen by the celebrated duchess of Oldenburg, who adopted her, placed her at school, and, having rendered her a proficient in languages and other accomplishments, sent her to England, with a strong recommendation to her friend and protegee, Prince Leopold, who, out of gratitude to his royal patroness, obtained her a situation in the household of his sister, the duchess of Kent, where she was first received as a waiting-woman, and afterwards promoted to the post of nursery-governess to the Princess Feodore, (now Hohenzollern), a daughter of the duchess of Kent by her previous marriage. Evidently she was entrusted with the early education of the Princess Victoria; and, having obtained a complete ascendancy over the duchess of Kent, became a very disagreeable person to all the rest of the household, more particularly to Sir John Conroy, who knew her "whereabout," and could fathom her intriguing spirit, and therefore watched her closely. In 1828, George IV. being anxious to show some attention to the duchess of Kent and the Princess Victoria, invited them to Windsor; and during their stay, at the express wish of the duchess of Kent, created the cow-keeper's daughter a Hanoverian baroness, that she might be admissible, by the side of her youthful charge, at the royal table. Her dislike to Sir John Conroy induced her to sow the seeds of discord between mother and daughter, but they did not germinate until after the death of William IV.

WOMAN'S PRIVILEGES.—AN EPIGRAM.—FROM MOLIÈRE

Three things to womankind belong,
The universe of ours all over;
And from their use, or right or wrong,
Not all the universe may move her;
The first, to tease her faithful lover;
The second, to coquette; the third—
And that which oft we discover—
To argue points the most absurd,
And, right or wrong, to have the latest word!

EXERCISE.—Hawkesworth says that exercise gives health, vigour, and cheerfulness, sound sleep, and a keen appetite.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, near the corner of Broadway. TERMS, FIVE DOLLARS per annum, payable, in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

George P. Scott, Printer, corner of Gold and John-streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR. SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NO. 1 BARCLAY-STREET, NEAR BROADWAY. PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

VOLUME SEVENTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1839.

NUMBER TWENTY-FIVE.

For the New York Mirror.

MY LAST WISH.

BY MISS VANDENHOFF.

On calmly 'neath the boud'ning billow
Let my sleep of death be ta'en;
No burial pomp—no let my pillow
Unprofaned by pride remain!
No hred mourners o'er me weeping,
Paid for every tear they shed
I'll have to mock me, when I'm sleeping
Dreamless with the silent dead.
I will not have the cypress wailing
Sadly o'er my narrow tomb;
No marble with its boasts of grieving
Of the dust that waits its doom
Shall shroud me:—no—nor eye of wonder
E'er shall scan the lowly sod
That keeps my soul and clay sundered,
And the tenant from its God!
No record I will have to hold me
In the hearts that can forget;
No—let the unfathomed ocean fold me,
When my life's pale star has set!

ORIGINAL SPORTING SKETCHES.

HARKAWAY!

ONE more extract from Mr. Mills' admirable forthcoming work, and we return the manuscript to the publisher, with the assurance that we have never read a more interesting work, not only to the sportsman but to all who relish light, piquant and graceful sketches of every-day life. The racy and pleasant story that follows will, we trust, our lady readers, and is selected from the others for their especial gratification:

THE HUNTSMAN'S WEDDING.

The Squire, as he was invariably called by the country folks, was tolling in an antique-fashioned chair, worked fancifully with figures and flowers, reading the County Advertiser, after a substantial breakfast, when the perusal of the account of his hounds' last dashing run was interrupted by the entrance of the huntsman, familiarly called "Jumping Will," looking peculiarly sheepish, otherwise bashful. He industriously stroked down the straight hair over his temples with one hand, and engaged the other with plucking a button from his waistcoat. A heightened colour had spread over his round cheeks, always rufous from health, and, altogether, "Jumping Will's" appearance had fallen from its usual carefree and knowing bearing. "The squire peeped over the top edge of the paper, and seeing his favourite servant standing, with a good-natured smile said, "Take a chair, William—take a chair. All right in the stable!"

"Right as a trivet, sir," laconically replied Will, occupying a seat.

"The kennel in proper trim?"

"Even as bricks."

"Then I don't care for anything else," replied the squire.

"But I do, sir," said Will, with emphasis upon the pronoun.

"You—you care for anything else but the kennel or stable?"

"Yes I do, sir," repeated Will.

"Ay, ay. A good cubbing season, I suppose."

"That's all in good time, sir. But what I now want is, your approval of my getting myself coupled with Nancy the dairy-maid, sir."

"What, married, William?" inquired the squire, dropping the paper in surprise, and looking at the blessing Will.

"Backed to me as a match-pie is our want, sir," was the reply from the huntsman, who, drooping his head, felt, as he afterwards described it to Nancy, "like a fox, with his earh stopped, inclined to hide himself, but did not know where."

"You want to spoil yourself, spoil the hounds, and spoil the horses, eh, William? Who the deuce is to ride the coils after you're married!" passionately asked the squire.

"Me, of course, sir," rejoined Will.

"You, you ride after being harnessed in the shafts of matrimony? Fudge! you'll not take a water-furrow."

"But I will, though, and so I told Nancy. But, bless your soul, sir, she's the very gal to see a fellow brush a rasper. She boasts and brags of my riding to all the other maids in the house, and says she never would have had me, but for the way I ride and—"

"And what?" said Will's master, as he hesitated to complete Nancy's reasons for having him.

"She says, the fine appearance I cut in the cap and pink," replied the huntsman, looking hard at the squire's face, after many attempts to raise his eyes from the carpet.

Will saw the burst of laughter about issuing from the squire's inflated cheeks, and seeing the omen of the success of his suit, he slapped smartly his doe-kin smalle with his broad hand, and a simultaneous roar proceeded from the two, which rang merrily to the roof, and was echoed far away into hall and kitchen, parlour and pantry. The fellow-servants, with the fair subject of Will's adoration, were all assembled at anxiety to learn the result of the mission, when the loud laugh informed them of the doubtless success of it, and many were the salutes and presses of the hand Nancy received, with her bright hazel eyes filled with tears of joy, from the happy crowd, who anticipated the frolic they were sure to have at the wedding.

"I tell you this, William," said the squire, "if you don't keep your promise, and ride up to my hounds as formerly—now, mark me—I'll discharge you. I'm not married, because I'm certain a wife spoils a man's riding. I did not expect you would get one until I did, at least; however, follow your inclination; but, at the same time, you must follow my hounds in proper style, or somebody else will."

"I'll do my duty. You have never had reason to complain, and you never shall, sir," rejoined Will, with emotion.

"I never have, William, never. You were a boy in my father's stable, and now you are his son's huntsman. During the time of your long service no ground for complaint has existed. My hounds have been hunted with proper spirit, and kept in perfect condition. I will have them continued thus," firmly said the squire.

"They shall, you may depend upon it," replied Will.

"Well, William, I hope, and almost believe so; but a wife is a terrible cooler for a horse, and a man's temper."

"May be for half-breeds, sir; but not for regular out-and-out blood and bone. Why! my mother was a daughter of the first whip to Lord Stanley's pack; and my father, you know, hunted the late squire's for twenty-three years, sir. So, I do think, from such a stock, no mufi should come," rejoined Will, with a glow of pride emanating from his features at the remembrance of his ancestral dignity.

"Give me your hand, William. There, I know you'll not disappoint me," said the squire, shaking the hand of his servant heartily. "Heaven bless you. Be kind to your wife, as you've been faithful and honest to me—ride well up to the dogs—and leave the wedding frolic to me. I'll prepare that myself."

Will tried to thank his master; but the words died upon his lips, and turning round he hastily left the room, brushing the tears from his rough honest face, as they coursed each other downward. Upon joining the assembled servants and Nancy, Will related all that had passed between him and the squire. Loud was the praise bestowed upon the latter by all, and when the delighted maid was congratulated as "Mrs. William Wisk, as was to be,"

"Then fresh tears
Stood on her cheeks, as doth the honey-dew
Upon a gathered lily."

It was a frosty day in the month of January; the well-heaped fire upon the hearth played fancifully, and crackled away, as log after log was added by an officious boy, whose duty generally was that of driving the cows to be milked, and otherwise attending upon them. His round cheeks bore shining marks of yellow soap, and he was dressed in his Sunday suit.

"I think that I ought to have gone to the church to see our Nance booked though," said he to himself. "Everyone's gone but me. That ain't fair! I'm left to keep up the fires. Well, then, never mind—here goes," and another large log was thrown upon the blazing pile. A large quantity of holly and ivy was stuck upon the walls of the room—a spacious apartment, called the "servant's hall"—and a fine large mistletoe was suspended from the centre of the ceiling. "Here they come!" exclaimed the boy, clapping his hands and peering out of the window.

Along the gravel drive to the house came the wedding party from the village church close by. The bride and William walked first, arm in arm, the former in an appropriate dress furnished by the squire, and the latter in a new hunting costume, complete, ornamented with a large white satin favour on his left breast. Next to them came the squire, and the rector's daughter, who honoured the happy couple as bridesmaid. Then followed about forty gentlemen, in scarlet coats, and their sporting equipments, who constantly rode with the squire's hounds, and came to the marriage of "Jumping Will," thus dressed, as a compliment to their favourite leader of the chase. Bringing up the rear were the fellow-domestics of Mrs. Wisk, and the invited guests, all decked in favours, and gaily dressed in their best apparel.

Across the huntsman's shoulders was slung a beautiful silver horn, a present from his master. His highly polished top-boots were ornamented with a pair of spurs of the like material, given by the gentleman of the hunt; together with a whip elegantly ornamented, and a cap well lined with severals. The noisy group entered the servant's hall, and Mrs. Wisk was immediately seized by the cow-boy as she entered, and taken under the mistletoe. A loud hearty smack was accomplished upon the lips of the bride, before being aware of the intentions of the young gallant.

There, "exclaimed he, I was determined to be first. Mr. Jumping Will, don't be jealous—I considered it my right."

The squire pinched the boy's ear, and with feigned anger said, "You young scound! how dare you posh upon another's manor, eh?"

"If you please, sir," replied the boy, screwing up his face and raising upon his toes as the squire elevated the grasped organ, "I had a promise for one, from Nance herself, on the wedding-day, and so I thought I'd be first and foremost."

"Without respect to the rights of precedence," rejoined his master, releasing his hold.

"None at all, sir," replied the boy; but ignorant of the meaning of the sentence rejoined to.

A capacious bowl was brought into the room by the butler, whose strained arms and fingers proved the weight of the burden being anything but trifling. Its contents smoked, and to the ceiling, a continued cloud issued of odoriferous steam, particularly pleasing to the olfactory nerves.

"Now, gentlemen, girls and boys," said the squire, stirring up the hot liquid with a ladle, "hold your glasses close, but don't touch a drop until I give the word."

In due course of time the respective goblets were filled, and all obeyed the instructions given, excepting only the cow-boy; who, stealing behind the broad shoulders of his master, cautiously tasted the tempting mixture. A look of gratification spread over his countenance, and, patting his abdominal regions significantly, gave an imprudent crack of his lips. The squire turned abruptly round, and discovered the cause of the impolite effect.

"You disobedient whelp! what did I order not a minute since!" said the squire.

"Beg your pardon, sir; but I forgot to wait," replied the confounded bacchanal, spilling the remainder upon the feet of his master.

"Wrong upon injury!" exclaimed his master, shaking the wet from his boots, and continued laughing. "Come, I'll fill your glass once more."

All were charged. The squire stood in the centre of the company, and holding his filled goblet high above his head, said in a loud voice, "Here's the health and prosperity of Jumping Will, and his pretty wife; may they live in uninterrupted happiness, peace, and plenty." Loud was the shout which rang from the circle of sincere friends, upon the completion of the sentiment. Clear after clear rang far and wide as each continued to express the real fervour entertained.

"Now for one more," said the squire, "as a finish." Far away that shout was heard; in the clear frosty air it went over hill and valley, wood and dell, as merrily as the occasion merited; and, as it died away in a scarce audible echo, the hounds in the kennel, not far off, answered the cheerful sound, by breaking into a sudden musical cry. "That's as it should be!" exclaimed the squire, "you hear those dumb animals prompting you to speechify. William—come, let's have it over."

The huntsman stood forward, and with slight exertion to obtain confidence by a preliminary cough, he commenced—"My kind master, gentlemen, and friends, if I try at a long speech, I shall either run far and wide as each continues to express the real fervour entertained. "Now for one more," said the squire, "as a finish." Far away that shout was heard; in the clear frosty air it went over hill and valley, wood and dell, as merrily as the occasion merited; and, as it died away in a scarce audible echo, the hounds in the kennel, not far off, answered the cheerful sound, by breaking into a sudden musical cry. "That's as it should be!" exclaimed the squire, "you hear those dumb animals prompting you to speechify. William—come, let's have it over."

The huntsman stood forward, and with slight exertion to obtain confidence by a preliminary cough, he commenced—"My kind master, gentlemen, and friends, if I try at a long speech, I shall either run far and wide as each continues to express the real fervour entertained. "Now for one more," said the squire, "as a finish." Far away that shout was heard; in the clear frosty air it went over hill and valley, wood and dell, as merrily as the occasion merited; and, as it died away in a scarce audible echo, the hounds in the kennel, not far off, answered the cheerful sound, by breaking into a sudden musical cry. "That's as it should be!" exclaimed the squire, "you hear those dumb animals prompting you to speechify. William—come, let's have it over."

The huntsman stood forward, and with slight exertion to obtain confidence by a preliminary cough, he commenced—"My kind master, gentlemen, and friends, if I try at a long speech, I shall either run far and wide as each continues to express the real fervour entertained. "Now for one more," said the squire, "as a finish." Far away that shout was heard; in the clear frosty air it went over hill and valley, wood and dell, as merrily as the occasion merited; and, as it died away in a scarce audible echo, the hounds in the kennel, not far off, answered the cheerful sound, by breaking into a sudden musical cry. "That's as it should be!" exclaimed the squire, "you hear those dumb animals prompting you to speechify. William—come, let's have it over."

Hundreds of fine venison, barons of beef, fresh-killed pike from the store-pond, speckled trout, hares, rabbits, pigeon-pies, partridges, pheasants, plum-puddings, and other dainties too numerous to mention, were in due time placed upon the long table, squeaking from the ponderous mass upon its surface. Then followed such a confusion of noises, out-babbling Babel. Knives and forks rattled, plates clinked, chairs and benches were taken, and the feast commenced in earnest. The squire sat in the centre of the guests, and was the very life of the scene. He talked to one, laughed with another, hallowed to a third, and if the etiquette observed in refined society was disregarded, more good-humour, fun, and frolic existed than in the automaton circles of freezing fashion, for an age.

Large, round jugs of foaming ale quickly disappeared, and were as soon replaced. In the middle of the table, just opposite to the squire, stood a huge wassail cup of antique form. It was filled to the brim with spiced wine. Taking hold of the sides with both hands, the squire raised the vessel to his lips, and, as was his custom after a feast, said, "I drink to the friendship of my guests." From him the cup was passed regularly round, and each drank from its contents, varying the toast to "the friendship of my friend, or master," as the case might be.

The table was quickly cleared when the dinner was over, and numerous bowls of punch were introduced upon it. Bottles of port, "old as the hills," and Madeira bright as the beams of the bride's laughing eyes, were also placed in rows at proper distances. Now the smart joke and merry jest was cracked. Light was the laugh which momentarily came unrestrained from the hearts of the assembled carousers. Pledge after pledge was exchanged, and nothing was there but delight and revelry.

About an hour after the dinner, all rose to clear away for the country dance and romping reel.

The village Orpheus was mounted upon an empty barrel in the corner of the hall, and lustily he commenced scraping a rapid movement. The squire led off the bride in the first dance, and enjoyed the spirit of it as much as any one. "On with ye! Give them a back forward, William," hallowed he, and the huntsman obeyed the instructions by strutting the company with a "Yoiks, yoiks for'ard," and concluded with a long musical wind upon his horn. On danced the merry company, until, from want of breath, they were obliged to pause.

"Now for a glass of punch all round, and a song from William," said the squire. Loud were the approvals to this suggestion; and, seating themselves, all were attentive for Jumping Will's song; who, without hesitation, in a fine, round voice, commenced:

Let smiles and bright eyes beam on me,
To glad my fleeting hours;
I love thee, as a honey bee
Loves bright and blushing flowers.

Nay, let no pouting curl thy lip,
No tear-drops dim thine eyes;
But from the morn of life let's sip
Joy's sun-beams as they rise.

A SEASON AT CHELTENHAM.

The season in London for the year one thousand eight hundred and ——— was over! The metropolis was half deserted! Genter and his myriads of myrmidons listlessly went to the leafy glades of Berkeley square. One-half of Howell and Janette's establishment was closed on half-pay, and the remainder making out half-yearly accounts, and all things which of right ought to happen at the commencement of the dog-days, had happened, and yet Lady Jemima Sigh-away and her fair daughter Celestina had not made up their minds as to what part of the world they should bend their steps, or raimers proceeded back in the direction of Montpellier.

[illegible]

Lady Jemima and Celestina were promenading one fine morning along the pretty walk at the end of which the old church cuts so pretty a figure, when Lady Jemima suddenly left her daughter, and proceeded back in the direction of Montpellier.

Our heroine—she—was not a little surprised to find her heroine, and being so, she must expect no description of her from us—she must necessarily be “all that Fancy painted her ‘lovely and divine’”—continued her walk, her eyes bent on the ground, whilst her pale soul, being off duty, was allowed to amuse itself by kicking pebbles out of the path of its fair mistress. How long she might have pursued the silent tenour of her way we know not, but an inexpressible misfortune befel her—happily, the misfortune was remedied as quickly as it happened—she was met by a handsome youth as an unmarried lady would wish to become her lover first, and her husband afterwards. Now these little contre-temps often in water-places produce sudden intimacies, and without teasing the reader with the hows, the whys, the wheres, and the wherefores, he or she, as the case may be, must be pleased to imagine them, and believe that Augustus Philip—in short, a constant visitor at any Lady Jiminia Swaynham’s—is this, it was a regular habit of the lady, to have a young man, who was afterwards joined there, as Augustus Philip, was determined to be a young gentleman of fortune and family, though unknown to fame and the world of fashion.

long unknown to land and sea, Celestina was rapidly drawn to disclose the M. C. had given the last assembly for his benefit, and still Mr. Augustus Phipps had made no regular declaration of the approval which he entertained for the heavenly Celestina. He flattered and talked and walked, wrote sonnets to his mistress's eyebrows, wrote in her album, but none of these things could satisfy the insatiable thirst of mystery in the conduct of Augustus which was truly alarming. The ever-watchful Lady Jimena, with that maternal solicitude for which she was so remarkable, and which so infinitely became her, thought it her duty to interrogate her daughter upon the subject, and give her that advice which she should demand. But Celestina, who on the morning which she should have devoted to herself, had been so long absent, and which she attributed to herself from the society of the other sex, and have the privilege of calling their own, the Lady Jimena and her sensible daughter had a long and confidential tête-à-tête on the subject of Augustus Phipps, and as we were in the confidence of both ladies, we happened to know that Celestina was oppressed with the necessity to the appearance of her father, and that she affectionately feared that her father had feared Augustus seemed oppressed with some secret grief, that she had often attempted to obtain his confidence, but without success; she had tried rallies and the "soothing system," but all in vain—Augustus seemed hurt and mortified, but never indulgent. Lady Jimena hinted that Celestina was suffering under a guilty conscience. But to this supposition Celestina would not listen for a moment; she had a perfect reliance on the honour and integrity of her lover. The result of the conference between mother and daughter was, that the gentleman should be compelled to comto an explanation, and that immediately.

Augustus Phlips now made his appearance at the lodgings of Lady Jemima as usual, to spend the morning with his beloved. He was ushered into the parlour, and found Lady Jemima seated at her dressing-table, her countenance pale and sad. Her usual salutations had passed, Augustus asked for Celestina, upon which Lady Jemima observed, "Mr. Phlips, you must excuse a mother's anxiety, but I am afraid that you are too much in the society of Celestina for her peace of mind. My daughter is a good and affectionate girl, and it is my duty to see that her happiness is not trifled with; besides, my dear sir, to speak plainly, there is a gentleman in Cheltenham to whom I should have no objection to see my daughter married, and I am sure that my dear daughter is anxious to comply with my wishes. I will keep back by the note-book any further intentions, (this was perfectly true, extraordinary as you may deem it) therefore—" "Allow me to interrupt you, my dear madam," said Augustus Phlips, and, without waiting for her allowance, he did interrupt her, and made a full, fair, and open declaration of his love, admiration, and adoration of the delectable Celestina Sighaway, and thereupon begged permission to lay himself and fortune at her feet. He gave a most satisfactory account of the state of his affairs, promised a handsome settlement, and hoped for her ladyship's promise to repeat the same to Celestina herself.

Thus the highly gratified mother graciously accorded, and after allowing Augustus to imprint a gallant kiss on the still unfaded cheek of his future mother-in-law, she took her departure, and promised to send her daughter to him.

In the course of a few minutes Celestina made her appearance, "blushing rosy red." Far be it from us to intrude our unbidden feet into those sacred bowers "where lovers breathe their vows and ladies listen;" no; we must put a bridle upon our pen, and only request our fair readers to let go the reins of their imaginations, or, enjoying the "Pleasures of Memory," recall their experience, or, if they are unable to do so, we have no doubt that the "Pleasures of Hope" will give them exactly to understand what Augustus Phipps said, and what Celestina replied.

The lovers were walking that evening in the shady leafy paths which are the glory of the Montpellier. Celestina affectionately danced on the arm of her Augustus, while a shade of melancholy came over his lofty brow. "My Augustus," softly whispered Celestina, "what distresses you? Confide in your Celestina."

Augustus trembled—"I dare not."

Augustus whispered in her ear! * * * *

A loud shriek resounded through the groves of Montpellier! Augustus Phipps rushed wildly from the grounds, and immediately left Cheltenham! Celestina had fainted upon the grass, and was humanely conveyed to the private apartments of the fair quakeress, and in due time recovered, but the secret which Augustus Phipps imparted to her, was sacred from the mouths of all for ever!

Reader, we overheard it, and will inform thee, but tell it to no one—Augustus Phipps was a TEETOTALLER!!

FOUR BON VIVANTS.

Three Cabbies, in company with three other bon vivants, made an excursion. The first had a false set of teeth; a second, a glass eye; a third, a cork leg; but the fourth had nothing particular, except a remarkable way of shaking his head. They travelled in a post-coach, and while at the first stage, after each had made merry with his neighbour's infirmity, they agreed that at every following place they would all make a dash for it. When they came to the second stage, they were all so quiet; and as the coachmen stood gawping round when they first alighted, "Od ro," cried one, "how the man squints!" "Why, don't thou," said a second, "here be another squinting fellow!" The third was thought to be a better squinter than the other two, and the fourth better than all the others. At the third stage, the man singularly affected with the squint; they went one degree beyond the superlative. At dinner, they appeared to have cork legs, and their stumping about made more diversion than they had done at breakfast. At tea, they were deaf; but at supper, which was at the Ship at Dover, each man resumed his character, the better to play his part. A coachman remained concerned at the party, and asked the three to go to the Cabbies, and tell them to wait. "Here, you fellows," take out my teeth," "Teeth, er," said the man.

After some hesitation, the man did as he was ordered. This was no sooner performed than a second called out, "Here, you, take out my eye!"

out my eyes," said the waiter, "your eye!"

"Heavens," said the waiter, "your eye!"

"Yes, my eye. Come here, you stupid dog; pull up that eyelid, and it will come out as easy as possible."

This done, the third cried out, "Here, you rascal, take off my leg!"

This he did with less reluctance, being before apprised that it was cork, and also conceived that it would be his last job. He was, however, mistaken. The fourth watched his opportunity, and while the frightened waiter was surveying with rueful countenance the leg, tooth, and leg, lying on a table, cried out, in a cheerful, low voice, "Come here, you stupid dog, and take off my eye!"

Turning round, the waiter, who had been looking like that of mandarin upon a democracy, peeped at the man swearing that the gentleman up stairs were certainly all devils.

CARDINAL WOLSEY.

Cardinal Wolsey was "an honest poor man's son" of Ipswich, born in 1473, and this poor man was generally supposed to have been a butcher. On referring to "Fifrides Life of Wolsey," this circumstance may fairly be doubted. Shakespeare, however, calls Wolsey "this butcher's cur;" and a painting of a dog gnawing the blade, or, it was properly called, the spade—a bone of a shoulder of mutton, was placed in a window at Oxford for the purpose of mortifying the future cardinal. Wolsey was a weakly man, but he had the advantages of his birth at defiance, and he proved this truth—that birth was not necessary to qualify a man for distinction, even at that period, in the world. He soon distinguished himself, taking his bachelor of arts degree at Oxford when he was only fourteen years old. He afterwards became tutor to the sons of the marquis of Dorset, who presented him to the living of Lymington, in Somersetshire. He was now twenty years of age, and, in 1493, he was recommended by Sir Amias Pavlet, a justice at that place, on a charge of getting drunk and making a riot at a fair. Fides seems to hint that he was hardly used on the occasion. For this indignity, however, Wolsey revenged himself when he became lord chancellor of England, by keeping the justice in close confinement in the Temple for several years. Wolsey was also said to have got himself into difficulties by his extravagance in the building of Magdalen College, and by the building the noble tower of that college. If this be true, it affords a strong proof of the cardinal's great and enterprising mind, and of that fondness for beautiful architecture which will carry down his name to the latest posterity. The present occupier of the see of Canterbury seems to have imbibed Wolsey's taste and magnificence in architecture, softened by the refinement of the age, and kept in check by the consciousness of the eyes of the people. Wolsey's conspicuous Having been made chaplain to Henry VIII., Wolsey obtained great preferment, and acquired that ascendancy which is generally possessed by strong minds over those who are either weak, voluptuous, or indolent. His royal master gave him several bishoprics; and at length he was made archbishop of York, lord high chancellor of England, and prime minister. In this situation he managed the affairs of the kingdom, and conducted the negotiations with the cardinal, and the kings of France and Spain loaded him with favours, in order to gain him over to their respective interests.

ARTAXERXES.—This opera was written and composed by Dr. Arne about the year 1762, some twenty-four years after he set Milton's Comus to music. Miss Brent was the original Artaxerxes, for which Arne expressly composed the beautiful song, "In Infancy," in the key of C, (for Tenducci was of the Velluti school), and which Madame Vestris rendered so popular when she sung it a few years since.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

LINES ADDRESSED TO A PRISM.

Sent to the late M. David, the eminent French sculptor—By Amelie Opie

Go, fair dispenser of celestial light,
And charm my distant friend's admiring sight;
On his lone path a clearer lustrè shed—
O'er every object rainbow glories spread—
And, brightly beaming in his hours of gloom,
With wreaths of radiance hance his dark'ned room!
Oh! may new shapes before his genius rise,
When all the mingling colours meet his eyes!
Oh! may the influence of thy soul of fire
Still new creations with new zeal inspire,
Till life for him shall with fresh prospects glow,
And cheerful smiles bedeck his pervasive brow!
Thy rosette rays perhaps his skill may move
To mould new groups of beauty and of love;
The colder blue may bid his hand impart
The name of truth, and truth shall gladden his heart
But every tint may inspiration bring,
Till o'er him Fancy waves on soaring wing.

Now let the Muse, ere yet her dream disperse,
Prolong her lay to moralize her verse.
Say, whence those colours, so exquisitely bright,
Which shed around souls so sweetly cheering light?
Those flowers, those hues no earthly power bestows—
From heaven itself the gorgeous splendour flows!
And from that only fount, the Eternal Throne,
Where in full power the Godhead rules alone,
Must come whatever cheers the glowing heart,
Or in the sculptor's or the poet's art;
The breathing marble and the poet's lays
Have the same source as thy prismatic rays.
Then be this lesson to each bosom given—
Man's dearest gifts and hopes all spring from heaven!

MAHOMET AND THE REVEATERS OF THE ARAB.—A GERMAN in the service of Abd el Kader gives the following as the belief which is prevalent in that part of the globe, on the subject of the world to come:—"They believe that when the soul reaches the other world, it is conducted before the tribunal of God, who sits under a magnificent tent, with Mahomet at his left hand. All who under a pair of scales are held to be worthy of Paradise, are sent to the deads of the earth. If the scales-bearer wishes well to the latter, he presses upon the scales which hold the good works, that the one which contains the bad may not sink too much. The believer, who is found worthy of being admitted into Paradise, is conducted, to his tent, where he finds his horse and his weapons, and reposes on magnificent cushions, where food and drink are sent him. He is surrounded by his friends and relatives. The tents are white as lilies, and set up in luxuriant valleys, surrounded by beautiful mountains, and flowing with milk and honey. The coolouses and mountains are full of game; and that he may pursue the pleasures of hunting, the blessed Mussulman is never in want of gunpowder. Thus does the unividing believer float on in an endless stream of life and felicity. But if the scales-bearer is unworthy of Paradise, whose all the scales which Allah sends him the bad actions, sinks too deep, Mahomet leaves the transgressor to the severity of an offended God, who condemns him to the torments of hell, when he finds himself in a furnace heated with coals, in the midst of Christians and Jews. The soul unceasingly repeats the creed. At last this state of things ceases up on the day of the resurrection, when the wicked, with horrors that exceed the faithful is among the abandoned. They ask their unfortunate fellow-believer the cause of his exile, his name, and that of his family. They then go to the members of the latter, who are in Paradise, and induce them, by touching representations, to intercede with the prophet. He, touched with the misery of a Mussulman, proceeds to the tent of Allah, and obtains for him, by his prayers, the keys of Paradise, and the keys of binding and loosening; thus hastens the keys of Paradise and of hell: go and release the condemned. Upon this Sidi Mahomet sends to Tartarus an order to release the sinner, who cannot, however, as he is blackened with the smoke, enter Paradise at once. Houries are called to wash him with precious oils and ointments, and to pour healing balsams into his wounds, though he has torn him from the rest, a black spot always left on the forehead of his face."

his ears.

IN HEAVEN.—How short is the earthly history of a family! A few years, and those who are now embraced in a family circle will be scattered. The children, now the objects of tender solicitude, will have grown up and gone forth to their respective vocations in the world. In twenty years more, the parents will be no longer in the family circle. Their names will no longer be heard in their present dwelling. Their domestic loves and anxieties, happiness and sorrows, will be a lost and forgotten history. Every heart in which it was written will be mouldering in the dust. [And this is the saddest thought that ever came into the mind of man.] How short is the history of the strongest feelings of our hearts! If we, how shall we dare pour forth our affections on subjects so fleeting! How can such transitory beings, with whom our connexion is so brief, engage all the love we are capable of feeling. We should not cultivate feelings that will so soon be forgotten. We should not love as if we were to die. If we be God, this is not all. Of this he has given us perfect assurance in the Gospel of his Son. Though to the eye of unenlightened nature the ties of domestic love seem scattered into dust, the spiritual eye of faith perceives that they have been gathered into a golden wreath, and that in far happier circumstances, in the regions of everlasting love and bliss. Though the history of a family may seem to be forgotten when the last member of it is laid in the grave, the memory of it still lives in immortal bloom, and when the circle is wholly dissolved on earth it is again completed in heaven.

CONTENT, DISCONTENT.—If we estimate things wisely, rich men are more liable to discontent than poor men. It is observable that men of the highest fortune are apt most easily to resent the smallest things; a little neglect, a slight word, an unpleasant look doth affect them more than reproaches, blows, wrongs do those of a meaner condition. Prosperity is a nice and squeamish thing, and it is hard to find any thing able to please men of a full and thriving estate; whereas a good meal, a small gift, a little gain, or good success in his labour, doth produce in a poor man a very solid pleasure: whence contentedness hath place, and is needful in every condition, be it in appearance never so prosperous, so plentiful, so pleasant.

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

WHO GOVERNS?

BY HEINRICH ZSCHOKKE.

CHAPTER I.—THE BOOKKEEPER.

"I am a lost man, Colas!" said Monsieur Larmes, as he hurried home from the bureau of the Admiralty, in which he was a book-keeper, and threw himself in a chair. "I am a lost man! I can take care of you no longer, my poor fellow!"

Colas Rosier, who had never seen his master in such agitation, was struck dumb with surprise. And indeed, if he lost the support of Monsieur Larmes, he would be as friendless as any mortal could well be. The old man had been a second father to him, had superintended his education, given him employment as a copyist under him, and promised to make him the heir of his hard-earned savings.

"A lost man!" exclaimed Colas, at last; "what have you done?" "Nothing; it is because I will not do something. If I could trust to your discretion—remember, a single word may cost you your liberty, perhaps your life. But you must promise to be as silent as the grave." Colas promised everything that was required, and the old man went on. "There is a deficit of more than half a million in the accounts of the marine department. The matter cannot be hushed up any longer. Monsieur de Gatsby has ruined himself by his extravagance, and is now trying to lay the blame on some one else. Why he chose me, I am sure I cannot tell. He offered me a first forty, and then sixty thousand livres, if I would write him a letter, and acknowledge that the guilt was mine. He offered to pay me ten thousand francs a line for such a letter. When I, like an honest old fool as I am, hesitated, he grew furious, and threatened, if I refused, to charge me with the crime, to save himself. Now I do not know what to do. He is rich and powerful; all he has to do is to accuse me of the robbery, and I am a prisoner in the Bastille for life. He has given me twenty-four hours to consider the matter. During that time, I am to remain a prisoner in my own house, and it is already surrounded by agents of the police."

"And what will you do?" asked Colas, anxiously. "I trust in God! He will not suffer the innocent to be oppressed. When I am in the hands of justice, I am at least safe from assassination. Then will I speak out, be the result what it may. Till then, remember your promise, and be silent."

Much more was talked of between them, during which Colas's anxiety and grief increased to such a pitch, that Larmes was unwilling to prolong the conversation. He ordered his young pupil to attend to the business in hand, and shut himself up in his room to arrange his papers, for he looked upon himself already as a dying man.

CHAPTER II.—PAULINE.

Colas looked pale and anxious enough as he crossed the court of the hotel in which Larmes resided. This hotel belonged to the Count d'Oron, one of the gayest and most fashionable noblemen in all Paris. It was said that Prince Soubise was paying court to his daughter, and the prince's visits to the house were doubtless very frequent; but, in fact, the attraction he found there was not the young comtesse, but her attendant or lady-companion, Pauline de Pons. Pauline, an orphan dependant on the count's bounty, cared very little for all the honeyed compliments the prince bestowed on her so liberally; but, though blind to his attractions, she had eyes enough for the blooming beauty of her young neighbour, Colas. She always had some business to transact with him; there were always papers to be copied or documents to be drawn. Colas, in his simplicity, never dreamed that he had made so flattering a conquest, and indeed hardly knew what love was. She happened to be standing at her window, as Colas crossed the court. She was startled to see him look so pale and sad. "Bet, bet!" she whispered. He did not hear her. "Colas!" she cried, and beckoned to him. He ascended the stairs, still sighing and moaning. "For heaven's sake, Colas, what has happened?" cried she, as he entered, and she saw that he had been weeping. He kept silence, and sighed again.

"Speak, speak!" she continued, "do not leave me in this uncertainty."

Colas shrugged his shoulders as he replied, "Mademoiselle will excuse my speaking further. All I can say is—that I must leave you. I quit the house, and probably Paris, to-morrow morning."

Pauline turned pale at this unexpected announcement, and sunk powerless on a chair. She repeated her questions, but he would not answer them. "Have you so little esteem for me," she asked, at length, "that you will not even condescend to tell me why you leave us? Colas, if it is so, I would hate you from the very bottom of my heart—if I could. But go—you were the only friend I had in the world, and though you may find many others, you will find none to take such interest in your welfare as I have done. Go!" and she hid her face in her handkerchief, and began to sob.

Poor Colas did not know what to say. "Ah, Pauline, if I go, it is no fault of mine. How gladly would I stay! You know not how dear your sympathy is to me! But—"

"O hypocrite," was the answer, "my sympathy dear to you while you take such pleasure in tormenting me? Relieve yourself of your grief. I will be a sister to you in your sorrow, and you shall be my brother—there is my hand upon it."

Colas kissed respectfully the little hand that was extended to him, and vowed to its owner, in the simplicity of his heart, to look upon her always as a sister; of course he had now no secrets from her, so he told her the whole story, under the most solemn promise of absolute secrecy. Pauline was alarmed, but not half so much as her new brother. She was in love, and to love nothing is impossible. "Be easy, good Colas," said she, "there will be no necessity for your leaving us. Something or other can be done to save your guardian. If I could only think of any plan—but go, now, and leave me alone. It must be done, and I will think over some way of doing it." Colas left her, as she requested, but turned as he went out, and said anxiously, "Sister, sister, if you betray my secret, I will never be your brother again!"

CHAPTER III.—PRINCE SOUBISE.

Meantime Prince Soubise's carriage drove up, and he was ascending the stairs as Pauline left her room. The prince thought he had never seen her look so lovely; and it might well be, for her cheek glowed with the consciousness of first love. She conducted him to the parlour, and regretted that he had missed the count, who had just driven out with his family.

"You regret it, Pauline, and I am rejoiced at it. May I never meet with a worse misfortune than that which gives me the sole enjoyment of your society!"

Pauline was used to his way of talking, and paid little heed to this and many similar compliments. She was thinking what could be done for poor Larmes. She had intended to speak to the Count d'Oron, trusting to his sagacity and influence, but he was indolent and selfish. The prince's visit suggested other ideas. He, the favourite at court, who had the ear of the all-powerful minister, Cardinal Bernis, may even of the monarch himself, he and no other could save him.

"My good lord," she said, "I beg of you, no more trifling! I want to speak to you about something serious."

"How lovely Pauline!" was the answer, "do you really think love trifling?"

"Yours, at least."

"If my affection for you is not real, then there is nothing real under the sun; then is your beauty, Pauline, and the magic grace of your form, unreal and deceptive."

"Pray, prince, why do you talk so to me—is it to kill the time? or to prove to me that you are the most graceful, insinuating man in all Paris! I know that already—everybody knows it. If I could put any confidence in your professions of esteem for me—if I have any claim—"

"Tell me what it is!" cried the prince, and then followed a host of protestations, which we will spare our readers. Pauline told him the danger of the old bookkeeper, professing to take an interest in his fate, from his having been so long a neighbour of hers, and very wisely saying nothing about his young protégé. "And now, prince," she added, "you are the only person who can save this innocent victim. Your intercession with the cardinal—"

"No, no, he is not to be trusted, he is De Gatsby's patron—but there is another way. And now, beautiful Pauline, I must leave you. I seize with eagerness the opportunity of being of some service to you." And he kissed her hand, and hurried off.

CHAPTER IV.—MADAME DE POMPADOUR.

He repaired at once to the apartments of Madame de Pompadour. Every one knows that this lady was for many years mistress of the affections, and of the kingdom too, of his most christian majesty, Louis XIV. At the time of our story, she was five-and-thirty years old, but his majesty still wore her chains. She was all-powerful at court; or if some leading man, like Cardinal Bernis, for instance, ventured to form a kind of opposition party, it was done in the most moderate and cautious manner. The first noblemen in France paid court to her, and even Voltaire felt proud when she looked on him graciously. But among them all, there was none she smiled upon as graciously as on Prince Soubise. In fact, this prince, though he had reached the ripe age of forty, was a very agreeable man, polished, witty, seductive. The royal favourite, with all her prudence and self-command, could not help eyeing him more favourably than her other worshippers. He had the tact to make her believe that he loved her with a violence that he found it hard to conceal, and was consuming with a secret passion that never existed. The marchioness could not help pitying him in secret, and he played the hopeless yet constant lover to perfection, laughing in his sleeve the whole time.

"Have you forgotten anything, rover?" she asked as he entered, for he had left her not an hour before.

"Alas! my dear marchioness," replied he, as he kissed her hand, "in your presence I forget even myself."

"To the point, if you please, prince, for the sphere of that self of yours is so extensive, that I am at a loss to know whether you include in it France only, or all Europe."

"You are severe to-day, yet in your irony you have spoken only the truth. I really was going to talk about myself—that is, about France—that is, about you."

"You are growing poetical—pray, speak in plain prose."

"Well, then, in prose be it. Do you know where that abusive street ditty was first composed, in which acurrility supplied the place of wit?"

"What, that silly stuff about me! At the cardinal's, I suppose."

"You are nearly right—at his tool's—at De Gatsby's. The villain is now about to receive the reward of his foul slanders—he is in a fair way to be sent to the galleys."

"Can this be possible?"

"There is an enormous deficit in the accounts of his department—people talk of a million and over. This is what I forgot to tell you."

The prince went on to tell the whole story, colouring it a little here and there as he proceeded. He spoke at last of the danger in which Larmes was placed, and depicted his age, his innocence, and his sufferings so movingly, that the sensitive marchioness was forced to shed tears.

"That must not be," she cried; "he shall not be made the victim of that monster. Do you pledge yourself to the truth of what you have told me?—if so, I must see the king at once. He is too noble to allow such crimes to go unpunished."

"And his good angel is always at his side. Allow me to kiss the hand of that angel, to sanctify my own sinfulness."

He retired, and the marchioness repaired to the royal presence.

CHAPTER V.—THE KING.

"I have been expecting you for some time, my dear marchioness," said his majesty.

"I was told your majesty was engaged with the British ambassador."

"Yes, but I found the thing a terrible bore; so I turned him over to the cardinal. But what is the matter? You have been weeping. Are you not well?"

"I am always well in the presence of my sovereign."

"Good marchioness! But sit down, and I will help you string pearls. I have got a capital story to tell you about Mademoiselle d'Antun; it is almost too good to be true. I have laughed myself out of breath at it. But I must know why my Antoinette has been weeping. Has anything happened to displease you?"

"Yes, sire, I am displeased at the wickedness that exists even under the best of monarchs." The king was anxious to know more, and the marchioness exposed all the villainies committed and planned by De Gatsby. She was deeply moved by the recital, but his majesty was not in the least.

"Why," said he, in great surprise, "is that all? What is that to us? The courts will take care of it to-morrow. Now listen to my story about Mademoiselle d'Antun."

"I beg leave simply to suggest, sire, that to-morrow will be too late. If De Gatsby has in his hands Larmes' written confession, and Larmes himself disavows, nothing can be done."

"You are right. We must send word to the cardinal."

"He is De Gatsby's special friend, as I am told."

"Then to the lieutenant of police. He might send an agent to Larmes and learn the particulars; after which we can act accordingly."

"Excellent, sire: I must admire your sagacity as much as I do your goodness of heart. I did not reflect that if the police can get hold of Gatsby's own handwriting, he is caught in his own trap."

"I suppose not, but you are a mere child in these matters of business. The lieutenant is still in the palace." He touched a bell, and gave orders for the lieutenant to come before him in his private blue cabinet, to which he repaired himself. "You must stay here," said he to Madame de Pompadour; "I want to have a good laugh with you over Mademoiselle d'Antun."

By this time it had grown late. Poor old Larmes sat at home, sad, yet resigned to his fate, when a knocking was heard at the door, which was opened by an agent of the police. This visit was not rendered more agreeable by the glimpse afforded through the open door of half-a-dozen soldiers waiting outside.

Larmes turned pale and trembled at the sight, and our good Colas shifted from one foot to the other, in a perfect fever of apprehension.

"You had this morning," asked the police agent, in a very official tone, "a conversation of a very peculiar character with Monsieur de Gatsby?"

Larmes bowed in silence.

"You have in your possession a paper, which he wished you to copy?" The old book-keeper was so thunderstruck at the omniscience of the police, that he could make no answer.

"Have the goodness to answer my question, and to deliver up the paper." It was done. "And now, be good enough to come with me; a coach is in waiting outside."

"Where are you taking him?" cried Colas in despair; "he is innocent. Take me with him! I know all about it."

"Not so," said Larmes; "no one shall suffer but myself. I know why I am made prisoner. My accuser, Monsieur de Gatsby. Now I am ready."

The agent shrugged his shoulders as he answered, "I have no wish to interfere in any difference you may have with Monsieur de Gatsby. You will doubtless have the honour of an interview with him presently, for he is under arrest as well as yourself. Meantime you and the young gentleman there must follow me."

"Do you hear that?" shouted Colas; "Gatsby is arrested.—Now I see it.—now I know it all! We are safe! 'Oh!' cried the young enthusiast, raising his hands and eyes to heaven, 'Oh, thou incomparable, precious, heavenly!—Pauline, he was going to say, but he corrected himself, and added—'police!'"

Several ministers of state were with the lieutenant of police. The old book-keeper told his story. De Gatsby denied everything, till his own handwriting was produced, when he confessed his guilt, and begged abjectly for mercy. That very evening, Colas slipped away to thank his new sister, for their preservation. That same evening, at a ball, Pauline pressed the delighted prince's hand gratefully, and told him, "You have done a heavenly action!" That same evening, the prince lay at the feet of Madame de Pompadour, and told her, "I must worship you, for you are more than an angel!" and that same evening, the marchioness praised the king's goodness till he thought himself a god.

The next day, De Gatty's imprisonment was the talk of all Paris. The culprit soon recovered his courage, and persisted in denying his guilt. This changed the affair into a long and tedious law-suit, the end of which Larnes was not permitted to see; anxiety and fear had shaken his frame too sorely. The question for Colas was now, what he should do? for something must be done to support him. "Well," said Pauline, "why don't you become book-keeper in Monsieur Larnes' place?"

"Heavens! Pauline, what are you thinking of! how can I pretend to aim so high? It is true, I need to do all the dirty when my old friend was sick, for months at a time, but I know he tried often without success to get me one of the lower clerkships."

Pauline said nothing, but it was not long before she met the prince, and addressed him. "Do you know, prince, that fear and anxiety have destroyed the old book-keeper Larnes; so that, after all, he has fallen a victim to De Gatty's malice?"

"Not a word, charming Pauline."

"Why do you not complete your good deed? He has left an adopted son, Nicholas Rosier, who used to act as his assistant. Why not use your influence, but there is no one to speak for him."

"How—no one to speak for him, when no pity and sympathy for him flow from such lips? What is the young prince's name?" Pauline gave it to him, and at the most favorable time, when as good as his word, and that him about De Gatty's villany, and speaking with much sympathy of the honest old man whom he had brought so near to perpetual imprisonment, perhaps to death.

"Near to death did you say, gracious lady?" said the prince. "Fear and trouble of mind were too much for his feeble frame. He stands in the presence of God, and names with gratitude among the angels the name of that earthly angel who rescued him from destruction."

The marchioness was moved. The prince said it, and went on in the same strain, while an actual, tota fide tear glittered in his eye. This affected her still more. "Has he left any family? The king is generous." On this hint, Prince Souville spoke with real enthusiasm of the talents and integrity of his adopted son, the vacancy, etc., etc. "But, alas! he added, 'the poor young man must suffer, because he has no friends.'"

"Prince," said the marchioness, with much emotion, as she clasped his hand, "I have always known you as an agreeable companion, but never before as a man of a generous and feeling heart. Do not try to hide your tears; they do you honour. The young man shall have the place." She went straight to the king and preferred her request. "The minister has just been here with a parcel of nominations he wants me to sign," was the answer. "As if your protégé's name is among them." The marchioness obeyed, and found the place given to one Meuron.

"Let us leave it as it is," remarked his majesty; "the minister understands these things best." But Madame de Pompadour was in earnest; and the next minute the name of Meuron was stricken out, to make room for that of our young hero, Nicholas Rosier.

(To be concluded in our next.)

ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPTS.

SCENE FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRAGEDY, ENTITLED

JOANNA, QUEEN OF NAPLES.

SCENE.—The Council Chamber. The Queen and Nobles discovered.

Fra Roberto. I MAY not hold my peace.

Your highness must absolve me from offence,
If, in my high and holy agency,
I press my counsel on your close observance.
I stand accountant to a mightier power
Than princes hold—whose stubborn will Doth laugh to scorn e'en heav'n's supremacy,
And mock—

Joanna. Again this insolence, proud priest!

Who gave thee charter for this contumely?
Think'st thou thy reputed sanctity,
Which erst commended thee unto our grace
And favour, doth yield thee leave and licence
To rebuke thy sovereign? 'Tis fitting then
That thou unlearn the treasonous lesson, taught
By superciliousness; and know, that we
Have passed the term of tutelage too far,
To need such counsel; though it do proceed
From the preceptor of Andros!

Fra Roberto. Reputed sanctity!

My pupil, and my prince, can well avouch,
That I have laboured with untired zeal,
To work his welfare here—his happiness
Hereafter. Our holy church can witness,
I have never shunned the stern enforcement
Of inexorable duty. The voice
Of conscience can attest, how holily
Hath been my life. If penitence, and pray'r,
And self-abasement, mark a hallowed life,
The foul detraction then doth much belie me.
If it hath led your highness to believe
My sanctity is questionable.

Joanna. Thou dost defame me more, imagining
I can give ear to foul detraction's tongue.
My lords o'th' council, we have weightier things
Than cholerous words from most irreverend lips,
To task your time with; and pray such succour
As your wise prudence shall accord to one,
Whose sex argues a judgment weak, whose age
Lacks your sage learning and experience.

Del Balzo. Which ever hath been tax'd to prove our zeal
In your good service, and the loyalty
We owe.

Joanna. My royal grandire, Robert of Taranto,
Conveyed to me the sovereignty of Naples,
Provençe, and Piedmont—the which his holiness,
By solemn edict, then confirmed; barring
The claim of Hungary to the succession.

It was his pleasure to affiancé me
To be Andros' bride. A full assembly
Of the nobles swore allegiance to me.

As queen in my own right—the power to rule,
Participant with none; y'et, 'twas my will
Our well-beloved consort, and our cousin,
Should share in all authority of state.

The royal treasury unlocked, lay open
To his control. The golden grants o'th' realm
Were in his gift, to lavish as he listed,
Upon the well-deserving; and lastly
Gave to his guardianship my faithful people;

Craving no bond for that thrice sacred trust,
Saving his simple pledge of faithfulness,
In his fulfilment.

Fra Roberto. And that same pledge, (your pardon for the sin
Of an unbidden utterance,) that very pledge
Hath been by acts redeemed, and those gainsayers
Of his fair honesty, and great deserving,
Would find it but a business for their thankless tongue,
(Which oft have tasted his munificence.)
In voicing forth his praise, than poisoning
Your gracious ear to his disparagement.

Del Balzo. This frontless insolence smacks of such treason—
Fra Roberto. Treason, Del Balzo! (aside to Del Balzo)
Scan but thy soul, thou'lt see conspiracy
As justly imaged there, as though it were
The reflex of thy thought.

Del Balzo. Might I advise, my lords, in place of beads,
The links of fetters were fit rosary
For his devotion.

Joanna. No more, no more!
'Twere time this conference were closed, my lords.
Listen, Sir Frar. None hath doubted yet
Andros' wish, and will, to advantage
Our true subjects: but, to unlearned clerics
We needs must instance the subtle practices
Of Eudoxius; who, by perverting
And corrupting the pious emperor

Valens, soon wrought out an emperor's ruin.
O'er me those parties. Here, my lords, are proofs,
How far you frar hath misled your prince,
Whose faith was fixed in his pure agency.
Here is a schedule of our revenues,
Showing our exchequer drained of coin;
The nation creditless; her strength unnerved;
Her name a by-word with confederate states;
As one that asketh alms.

There are petitions from lone widows, wailing
For the heritage of their young offspring,
Wrong from their hands by hard rapacity
Their pray'r for right and for redress, might stir
The sculptured marble of Nero's statue.

Here, a solemn protest from the best blood
Of our nobility, against contempt,
Endured from a plebeian's arrogance.

Here, a memorial, setting forth how certain
Universities have closed their portals;
Their large endowments, by our will bestowed,
Withheld, and the full tide of our largess
Diverted to the channels of base bribery,
Or stolen to slake the thirst of rebel faction!

I'll read no more; the catalogue of crimes
Would weary patience's self. And there, my lords, Stands the (pointing to Fra Roberto) one framer of this foul list.
Though once we owned him as our friend and father,
From this time forth, Naples shall know him not.
We do pronounce him here a banished man;
For after ages never shall record
Joanna's name, and write, "An immodest
Public good upon the altar of self-gain."

[Rises and comes forward.]
We dissolve the council; and pray ye use
All speed, with preparation for our travel
To Aversa, where we shall make a brief sojourn
For better health. With hawk, and hound,
We'll play the huntress, till the time doth call
Us home again, to hold our coronation. [Exeunt all but Fra Rob.]
Why dost thou linger, knowing our resolve?

Fra Roberto. That thou may'st listen to a prophet's words:
The last perchance these lips may vent to thee:
When fell disease lies prostrate on his couch,
By potent opiates made insensate,
The master-hand of skilful surgery,
Wields the keen knife, and with one active stroke
Severs the nerves, and parts the quivering flesh.
But, unskilled rashness mangles when it wounds;
Wrenching the lacerated sinews, only
To rack the victim with protracted pain.
Thou hast done. More merciful the deed,
Had the sharp weapon of opprobrious censure
Laid bare the canker of his heart, unseal'd
Of other eye than thine. It is extreme
Of torture, to make the heart's deformity
A common spectacle, to gladden those
Who find would have it cease to beat for aye.

Joanna. Better to sear up the poisoned gangrene,
And burn it to the quick, than doom the victim
To deserved death; and, lest thou should infect
Our realm past cure, we send thee hence.

Fra Roberto. Joanna thou hast brought sterility
And blight upon my soil, when all was bloom;
And planted there a tree, which, up-as-like,
Shall branch its funeral sadness o'er the land,
And taint its every breath with pestilence!
Venom shall lurk in every withered leaf,
Its shelter madness, and its shadow death!

Joanna. Has thy long life so idly profited
By heavenly precept (taught so oft by thee)
That the fierce flaring of thine angry eye
Should quench contrition's holy tear, and turn
All by-gone virtue to vindictiveness?
Lacks thy frail mem'ry a clamorous voice,
To tell the history of past humilities,
That thou'lt put on the port of vengeful pride?
Where then the looks, uplifted to the skies—
The lips, which breathed the purity of prayer—
The voice, which hymn'd thy matin-worshipping—
The knees, which bent before salvation's sign.
But mock'ries of eternal majesty!
If it be so, there is no hell too hot
For thy unmatched hypocrisy!

Fra Roberto. I play not now the hypocrite to thee,
Confessing that I did but counterfeit.
The book of truth is not more true than this.
My holy life hath been a varnished lie.
As the smooth surface of the frozen stream
Conceals the whirlpool, my calm, cold look
(The saintly semblance of humility)
Hath been the icy screen of passion's vortex.

The studied wretchedness of this coarse raiment,
Rags which would shame a beggar's ownership,
Subject to my control and secret sway,
The throned master of the ermine purple.
The palm, held forth for charity's demerit,
Was but the mesh to snare mankind. To get
The golden ducats in its ample grasp,
Which now doth swell my store to surfeiting.
But 'tis enough—I cast the viceroy off.
Thou'd'st rather I should be thee open foe,
Than feign to be thy friend; is it not so?

I read mine answer in thy mute contempt,
'Tis in the language of thy look. I grieve,
Alas! that eyes so bright, and lips so lovely,
Should herald hatred, and reproachful scorn.
Thy silence seals thy fate. Yet, ere I go,
I fain would ask, most fair expositor
Of foul misdoings—if perchance thy wit
Can find interpret for me this poor scroll.

Fra Roberto unfolds a letter—holds it before her and points to the signature. Joanna starts, as if paralysed with terror: after a short pause, he folds up the letter—Joanna still fixed in the attitude of gazing at it, unconscious of its removal.

Fra Roberto. Thus do the stars, which gem the canopy
Of kings, wax dim: overshadowed by the cloud
That carries lightning in its murky centre,
To blast the foe of Fra Roberto.

Joanna (kneeling.) Innocent! As God shall judge me.
INNOCENT! [Scene closes.]

THE FINE ARTS.

THE APOLLO GALLERY.

FOURTH NOTICE.

We have promised to close our notices with a brief review of a class of subjects, which, in most exhibitions of the works of living artists, is the most extensive, but in this is not so. Portrait painters will always be employed; their art ministers to the affections, and their works are exhibited only as specimens of skill, while all other branches must exist by orders from persons of taste and wealth, or by sales. The Apollo Association purchase pictures with their funds, and that is probably the cause of the large number of works in this exhibition which are offered for sale, and of the small number of portraits. What there are, however, are, with few exceptions, good. We shall notice a few which have attracted our attention particularly.

No. 68. Portrait of Ex-Governor William L. Marcy, painted for the city of New-York, by William Page. This is a picture which requires to be examined with attention on many accounts; and we shall express our opinion of it with candour. It is, we believe, the first full-length portrait, of the size of life, painted by this artist, who may still be called young, but who has obtained a reputation in his brief career beyond the average of our older painters. It was painted for the city of New-York, and the subject is one of those whose names are familiar to the whole political world, which, in our country, means our whole population. The subject, however, is not a favourable one for a picture, being neither handsome, well coloured, nor graceful of person. The artist has of course been expected to produce a specimen of art of the highest order, but his subject was unfavourable to such a result. The consequence has been, as might have been anticipated; all the skill of the painter has failed to create a pleasing picture, though he has made a faithful copy of the man. At the Apollo, the picture appears to the best advantage; in its place, at the City-Hall, it was badly lighted, and was too near the spectator; but with all the advantages of its present position, it is not a picture that will add to the reputation of the artist, though the generality of those who make observations on it mistake the cause, and some will find fault with the painter, when in reality the picture is well composed, well drawn, and well painted. 'Tis not a grand and effective picture, but it is possessed of many good properties; it will not strike the multitude of those who look at it as anything extraordinary, but the few, who bring a knowledge of art to the judgment, will not be offended by a few faults where there is so much truth and intrinsic merit.

No. 70. Full-length portrait of William Henry Harrison, by Bass Otis, of Wilmington, Del. (For sale.) A specimen of art very creditable to Mr. Otis, and should be secured for some public institution in the West.

No. 80. Portrait of the Artist's Wife, by G. Marsaglia. A fine picture, but too high on the wall to be seen to advantage. Margis's portraits are always highly finished and bear close examination.

No. 73. Cabinet portrait of a Young Lady, by C. C. Thompson. A sweet little full-length, and, as we happen to know, a perfect resemblance to the original.

No. 74. Small full-length portrait of a Young Gentleman, by J. E. Chapman. Such portraits as this will never be put in the garret. The time will come when Chapman's little pictures will be worth their weight in gold.

No. 101. Half-length portrait of a Gentleman, by Waldo and Jewett. These artists exhibit three pictures, and they are all good. We shall mention only one remark we have generally made on looking at their portraits of gentlemen—they all look like gentlemen.

No. 106. Group of Children, by W. R. Hamilton. A picture of much merit, but not faultless; the flesh of the children is chalky, and the foliage in the back-ground too gaudy and raw; but there are many parts beautifully painted.

No. 112. Portrait of a Lady, by Henry Inman. There is a richness and depth of colour in this portrait which we admire very much. It is decidedly the best of Inman's portraits in the room.

No. 115. Portrait, by A. Fisher. The pictures exhibited by this artist are unequal in merit, but they manifest great improvement in colouring since the last fall exhibition.

No. 93. Portrait of a Lady, by F. Alexander, of Boston. One of this artist's carefully finished pictures, but it wants decision and firmness of handling. No. 107. A study from life is excellent.

No. 252. Not so good as the others.

No. 130. By S. S. Osgood, of Boston, is evidently a portrait, though not entered as such. It is a well-coloured picture of a boy liberating a pair of young birds from his hat. A portrait painted as this, and several others of young persons, which we have not mentioned particularly in our hasty remarks on this exhibition, will always retain an interest after they have ceased to bear any resemblance to the originals.

In the department of miniatures the number of specimens is small, but there are a few of extraordinary merit. No. 170, by Henry Wenzler, is remarkable for high finish. The drapery is beautiful. No. 172, by W. C. Ross, a. s. a. a. miniature painter to Queen Victoria, is a work of great merit, but we think not superior to what some half dozen of our own artists produce every day. No. 173, by Daniel Dickinson, of Philadelphia, is very sweetly painted. Nos. 174 and 176, by George A. Baker, jun., are creditable specimens of a very young artist, who is fairly on the way to eminence in his profession. No. 180, by George H. Hite, a capital likeness of a public favourite.

Here we must close our notice of this very interesting collection. We are sorry to learn that it has not been so well attended as it deserves; but the association must not be discouraged, they have secured the goodwill of the artists, and we know that the institution has been of great advantage to several in the course of the year; what other institution, indeed, we might ask, has ever put three or four thousand dollars a year into the pockets of American artists? We look for the first annual report, which is to be made at the close of this exhibition, on the sixteenth instant, as a document in which the friends of the fine arts will be deeply interested. It should be extensively circulated, that the objects of the association, and the result of the first year of their experiment, may be understood everywhere.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW WORKS.

MRS. MATHEWS'S LIFE OF HER HUSBAND.

AMONGST the extraordinary effects of the popularity of my husband's "At Home," were the applications made, under every kind of pretext, letters being sent to him from all sorts of professions and trades about town. One man offered him snuff for himself and friends, if he would only mention the name and shop of the manufacturer. Another promised him a perpetual polish for his boots upon the same terms. He was solicited to mention every sort of exhibition, and to puff all the new quack medicines; and patents, from surgeon's instruments to mangles, called for his public approval. There was no limit to these requisitions. Lozenges were to be tasted, razors to be used, razor-strops to be tried. "The wince sent for him to taste, though said to be 'of the finest quality,' nevertheless required a 'bush,' which was expected to be hung out nightly at his 'house of entertainment,' for value received. Patent fathers, the price of which was to be liquidated by his praise: wigs and waistcoats, boots and boot-looks, 'ventilating hats,' and bosom friends—all gratis! And an advertising democrat one day presented himself, offering to teethe our whole family if Mr. Mathews would draw his metallic teeth into notice. In fact, he was inundated with presents and petitions, so that our cottage sometimes looked like a bazaar; and I had frequently occasion to exercise my ingenuity in contriving how and to whom I might convey the generally useless articles forced upon our acceptance. In fact, we eventually paid for them by purchase or presents, and to the parties from whom they came, in order to smooth down their disappointments at my husband's declining to comply with the requests with which they were accompanied.

THE DEAD ALIVE.

Mr. Plunket, and about forty other gentlemen, after dinner one day, at the time when Queen Caroline formed so frequent a topic of discussion, had grown rather warm upon it, when Mr. Shehan, since editor of a Dublin paper, wishing to turn the channel of the conversation, and longing to draw out Mr. Mathews, proposed the health of John Philpot Curran! "Pooh, pooh," said Mr. Plunket, who was at this moment rather matter of fact in his perceptions, "the man's dead! what do you mean by proposing his health?" "I differ with you entirely," replied Mr. Shehan; "and I return to my toast." "Them," said Mr. Plunket, "maybe you'll back your assertion with a bet!" "With all my heart," replied Mr. Shehan. "How much are you inclined to bet?" "I'll bet you five pounds," answered Mr. Plunket, "that John Philpot Curran is dead." "Done!" added Mr. Shehan; "I'll bet five pounds that he is not!" So, gentlemen, I repeat my toast. The "health of Mr. Curran" was accordingly drunk with cheers, which were reiterated on the rising of Mr. Mathews, who happened to be present to humour the joke against Mr. Plunket. He began by returning thanks in the tone, look, and manner of Mr. Curran, and in his phraseology, for the "honour done him," and afterwards delivered a most eloquent speech on a subject upon which Curran could never have spoken, the trial of Queen Caroline—taking the bias of Curran's politics, and presenting altogether such a fine specimen of his style of oratory, and such a personification of Ireland's celebrated wit, that he completely impressed his hearers with the actual presence of him, and induced Mr. Plunket (albeit not fond of parting with his money on such occasions), in an enthusiasm of wonder and delight, to push over the bank-notes to Mr. Shehan, exclaiming, "I've lost, fairly lost! Curran is not dead, and can never die while Mathews lives!"

STANDING IN ANOTHER MAN'S SHOES.

Not only did he (Mathews) object to the gaze of strangers, but any other person looking fixedly at him, or any part of his dress, was equally disagreeable to his feelings; yet often, as if by a fatality, he had something about him that seemed to invite the notice he disliked. He constantly wore a miniature eye as a shirt-pin, which naturally attracted observation of people while they listened to him. From the weight of its setting, it always appeared as if it were in danger of falling out; and when warned of the probability of this happening, he would hastily (and as I knew, impetuously) button up his waistcoat to hide it from further remark.

A droll incident occurred to him after his visit to Sir Roger Gresley. On the following day, having returned to his inn at Litchfield, he was visited by one of the gentlemen whom he had met the evening before. Mr. Mathews was always restless and depressed on his days of performance. This was one of them; and he willingly would have dispensed with the company of his new acquaintance. As the visit lengthened, he paced up and down the room, from time to time, with some impatience. The visitor, however, was immovable. At length conversation began to flag. The restlessness of my husband increased, but the gentleman seemed rooted to his chair. It was evident too, that while Mr. Mathews walked about, the eyes of the visitor were directed to his feet. He thought that his lameness caused this pointed notice, and sat down abruptly. Still the eyes gazed with undiminished interest; and no admirer of a Cinderella foot ever appeared more fascinated than did this gentleman with those of my poor husband. Again he started up; again he walked and talked. The gentleman answered, but seemed to grow absent. Still, however, his eyes "glared," as my husband angrily termed it, at his feet. At last, quite unable any longer to endure this persevering investigation of his pedal peculiarities, he suddenly informed the visitor that he must excuse him, as he had the business of the night to arrange. The gentleman again looked anxiously at the feet of the now really enraged owner of them, (who showed by his manner how much he was annoyed,) hesitated and blushed; but at last timidly observed, "Those shoes of yours are very peculiar, Mr. Mathews!" A snappish "Yes, sir," was all the reply of the master, whose anger was increasing every instant. "I had, I think, a pair like them," "Probably," was the only word jerked out in answer. "Indeed I did not think a second pair was to be found of the same make." My husband looked daggers as he observed his visitor's eyes still riveted upon his feet. "You, perhaps, remember," he continued, "where you bought them, Mr. Mathews; for I really shall be glad to get a pair ready!" No reply was given to this, but an impatient movement of said feet into another position. At last, pressed to account for the manner in which he procured these "admirable shoes," he cast his own eyes upon them, and to his surprise, perceived that they were not his own, but, as the gentleman said, a "very peculiar pair," and much too large for his very small feet.

The truth at once flashed across his mind:—"These shoes, sir, perhaps, are yours?" The owner of them, for such he was, bowed, coloured, and said: "Why, Mr. Mathews, if you'll pardon me thinking so, I must confess I believe them to be mine. I had them made after a plan of my own, for shooting shoes, and missed them this morning with great regret, my servant bringing me a pair much too small for me, and I suspect that the wood better fit your feet than mine." The matter was clear, and they both laughed heartily. The most extraordinary part of this unconscious felony was, that the person wearing them did not perceive the bad fit of the shoes, or find himself inconvenienced with their weight, for the soles were embossed with nails!

LOVE.

FROM SHERIDAN KNOWLES'S NEW PLAY.

I said it was a wilful, wayward thing,
And so it is—fantastic and perverse;
Which makes its sport of persons and of seasons,
Takes its own way, no matter right or wrong;
It is the bee that finds the honey out,
Where least you'd dream 'twould seek the nectarous store,
And 'tis an errand masquer—this same love—
That most outlandish, freakish faces wears
To hide its own! Looks a proud Spaniard now;
Now a grave Turk; hot Ethiopian next;
And then phlegmatic Englishman; and then
Gay Frenchman; by and by, Italian, at
All things song; and in another skip,
Gruff Dutchman;—still is love behind the masque!
It is a hypocrite!—looks every way
But that where lie its thoughts!—will openly Frown at the thing it smiles in secret on;
Shows most like hate, e'en when it most is love;
Would fain convince you it is very rock!
When it is water! ice, when it is fire!
Is oft its own devil, leech, a thorough cheat;
Persuades itself 'tis not the thing it is!
Holds up its head, purses its brows, and looks
Askant, with scornful lip, hugging itself
That it is high disdain—till suddenly
It falls on its knees, making most piteous suit
With hail of tears, and a burst of sighs,
Calling on heaven and earth for witnesses
That it is love, true love, nothing but love."

FROM BULWER'S NEW PLAY, ENTITLED, THE SEA-CAPTAIN; OR, THE BIRTHRIGHT. THE LOVED ONE.

Violet. O for some fairy talisman to conjure
Up to these longing eyes the form you pine for!
And yet in love there's no such word as absence!
The loved one, like our guardian spirit, walks
Beside us ever—shines upon the beam—
Perfumes the flower—and sighs in every breeze!
His presence gave such beauty to the world
That all things beautiful its likeness are;
And aught in sound most sweet, to sigh most fair,
Breathes with its voice, or like its aspect smiles

THE CAPTAIN'S STORY.

Norman (to Lady Arundel). Gentle lady,
The key of some charm'd music in your voice
Unlocks a long-closed chamber in my soul;
And would you listen to an outcast's tale,
'Tis briefly told. Until my fourteenth year,
Beneath the roof of an old village priest,
Nor far from hence, my childhood wore away
Till waked within me anxious thoughts and deep
Throughout the liberal and melodious nature
Something seem'd absent—what I scarcely knew—
Till one calm night, woe over earth and wave
Heaven look'd its love from all its numberless stars
Watchful, yet breathless—suddenly the sense
Of my sweet woe swell'd in me, and I ask'd
The priest, why I was motherless!

Lady Arundel. And he?
Norman. Wept as he answered, "I was nobly born!"
Lady Arundel (aside). The traitor!
Norman. And that time would bring the hour.
As yet denied, when from a dismal past
Would dawn a luminous future. As he spoke
There gleam'd across my soul a dim remembrance
Of a pale face in infancy beheld—
A shadowy face, but from whose lips there breathed
The words that mine but mothers murmur!

Lady Arundel. Oh!

My heart, be still!
Norman. 'Twas at that time there came Into our hamlet a rude, jovial seaman,
With the frank mien boys welcome, and wild tales
Of the far Indian lands, from which mine ear
Drank envious words. Brief—his legends fired me,
And from the deep, whose billows wash'd the shore
On which our casements look'd, I heard a voice
That woo'd me to its bosom: Raleigh's fame,
The New World's marvels, then made old men heroes.
And young men dreamers! So I left my home
With that wild seaman.

Lady A. Ere you left, the priest
Said naught to make less dark your lineage!

Norman. No:
Nor did he chide my ardour. "Go," he said:
'Win for thyself a name that pride may envy.
And pride, which is for me, will own thee yet!

Lady A. (aside). I breathe more freely!

Norman. Can you heed this gently

The stranger's tale? Your colour comes and goes.

Lady A. Your story moves me much: pray you, resume.

Norman. The villain whom I trusted, when we reached

The bark he ruin'd, cast me to chains and darkness.

And so to sea. At length, no land in sight.

His crew, dark, swarthy men—the refuse crimes

Of many lands—(for he, it seems, a pirate)—

Call'd me on deck—struck off my fetters: "Boy,"

He said, and grimly smiled: "not mine the wrong

Thy chains are forged—come from gold, the gold of those Who gave thee birth!"

Lady A. A lie! a hideous lie!

Be sure a lie!

Norman. I answer'd so, and wrench'd

From his own hand the blade it bore, and struck

The slunderer to my feet. With that a shout,

A hundred knives gleam'd round me; but the pirate,

Wiping the gore from his gash'd brow, cried, "Hold!

Such death were mercy!" Then they grapp'd and I found me

To a slight plank; spread to the wind their sails;

And left me on the waves alone with God!

Violet (taking his hand). My heart melts in my eyes: and

He preserved thee!

Norman. That day, and all that night, upon the seas

Toss'd the frail banner between life and death.

Heaven lull'd the gales; and, when the stars came forth.

All look'd so bland and gentle that I wept,

Recall'd that wretch's words, and murmur'd, "Wav

And wind are kinder than a parent." Lady.

Dost thou weep alone?

Lady A. Do I! Nay, go on!

Norman. Day dawn'd, and, glittering in the sun, behold

A sail—a flag!

Violet. Well, well.

Norman. It pass'd away,

And saw me not. Noon, and then thirst and famine;

And, with parch'd lips, I call'd on death, and sought

To wrench my limbs from the stiff cords that gnaw'd

Into the flesh, and drop into the deep:

And then, methought I saw, beneath the clear

And crystal lymph, a dark, swift-moving thing,

With watchful glassy eyes—the ocean-monster

That follows ships for prey. Then life once more

Grew sweet, and with a strain'd and horrid gaze,

And lifted hair, I floated on, till sense

Grew dim and dimmer, and a terrible sleep—

In which still—still—those livid eyes met mine—

Fell on me, and—

Violet. Go on!

Norman. I woke, and heard

My native tongue. Kind looks were bent upon me

I lay on deck—escaped the ghastly death;

For God had watch'd the sleeper!

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with Accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR. SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NO. 1 BARCLAY-STREET, NEAR BROADWAY. PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

VOLUME SEVENTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1839.

NUMBER TWENTY-SIX.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

THE MAN WITH THE LONG FACE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "YANKEE NOTIONS."

The first time that I saw the man with the long face, was at church. It was a fast-day, and the sermon was long; the subject, of course, the miseries that flesh is heir to. I will not say, moreover, that I had not a small debt to pay the next day—but no matter for that: just as the minister was saying "Sore afflictions," I happened to turn my head a little to the left, and saw a man with a strange face. I could not help looking at it, for it was a face to catch one's eye in an instant. "Thinks I to myself, 'that is a long face—a decidedly long face—a very long face.'" I looked again, and thought it longer still. I did not exactly like it, and kept looking, in hopes it would shorten, but it continued as long as ever. "Bless me! what a long face!" said I to myself. "I have not seen one like it for many a day." By and by the minister came to "thirtenthly," and the long face grew longer still. I looked another way, but some strange influence was upon me; my eyes involuntarily wandered back again and the same long face was before me. The sermon concluded, for everything human must come to an end. The congregation dispersed, and the long face disappeared in the crowd. "Thinks I to myself, 'I wonder who the man with the long face can be?'"

I thought no more of the matter, and did not see the man with the long face again for a week, when I unexpectedly met him as I was taking a walk in the Mall. He was coming out of the graveyard on the Common, and cast a longing, lingering look behind at the dead's heads on the tomb-stones. I started at seeing him, and called to mind the anxiety which the first sight of him had occasioned. I gave him a long stare. His face was quite as long as at first, nay, it was longer; and everything about him seemed to be longish. He had long black whiskers, a long nose, a long chin, long legs, a long walking-stick, and long skirts to his coat. It was nearly evening, yet there was sunshine enough to show that it was a strange shadow. He took a long walk round the Common, and then disappeared down Winter-street.

I cannot tell how, but this second apparition of the man with the long face gave me quite a shock. I am very critical in the matter of faces, and never pass a man in the street without spying something peculiar in his physiognomy and forming conjectures and theories upon it. What matter for study there is in faces! There are sweet faces, and sour faces, and wry faces, and vinegar faces, and square faces, and flat faces, and triangular faces, and pippin faces, and dough faces, and wooden faces, and weazel faces, and hatchet faces, and horse faces, and pig faces. And what amusement it is to study a miscellany of faces, such as you will find in the street, at church, on change, in an auction shop, or the General Court. In fact, I always find an infinite deal of history in a face, and read it on all occasions, just like a book. The cheeks are crimson covers, the eyes asterisks; the forehead is blank margin, and the nose a running title.

Now of all faces under the sun, I have the greatest aversion for a long face. I am rather short-faced myself, and have not a long-faced friend in the world: in fact, I never liked to have much to do with long-faced people. It always seemed to me that long faces never harmonized with the beauty of nature and the perfection of the great system of the universe; so that I am fain to believe there is some physical mistake, some natural anomaly in the production of long faces. However, be this as it may, the man with the long face took a strange possession of my fancy, and I dreamed of him that night. "Thinks I to myself, 'I wish he would try to make his face shorter.'" I fell to guessing and reasoning with myself whether this could be done by any mechanical contrivance, and I thought that were I on decent terms of intimacy with the man who had the long face, I should make bold to recommend a jack-screw or a fifty-six for this purpose.

It was but three days after that I met him a third time! He was on horseback: this horse was black, and the longest-faced horse that I ever saw. I was so much alarmed at their appearance that I popped down a street to get out of the way; but the same afternoon I came again suddenly upon him on turning a corner! He was on foot, with his long stick, long boots, and long-tailed coat. His face was longer than ever, and he was followed by a very long-faced dog with a long tail. "Thinks I to myself, 'What can all this mean? Will that long face never shorten? Was ever such a long face seen before? I will ever so long a face be seen again!'" It looked something like a vinegar cask bottom upwards, and was really a face not to be regarded with composure.

I thought a great deal, and made many inquiries about the man with the long face; but the more I thought about him, the more I was puzzled; and the more I inquired, the less I knew. Who could he be? What could be his business? What could he mean by going up and down the streets of Boston, making day hideous! And above all—how came he by that long face? There was no satisfying these queries. Nobody knew where he lived, whence he came, or what he did for a living. "Thinks I to myself, 'I wonder if he is a lawyer; for lawyers are said to have long heads, and why not long faces? I wonder if he is a doctor; for doctors' faces are apt to lengthen by sympathizing with the faces of their patients. I wonder if he is not a minister, for they can put on long faces whenever they please. I wonder if he is not studying the longitude. I wonder if he is a rich man. I wonder if he is in debt. I wonder if he owns bank stock. I wonder if he lives on the interest of his money.'"

By this time I was frightened, and hardly ever went out without seeing him. He was uppermost in my thoughts, and always in my dreams at night. It was strange nobody could tell anything about him, though he was to be seen in the most public places. I never failed to meet him on change whenever the stocks fell, and every time I met him, his face was longer than before. At the post-office he was sure to be found when any ill news arrived. When the banks stopped payment, the man with the long face was uncommonly busy: he might be discovered in every quarter; and wherever a knot of quidnuncs gathered at the corner of the street to gabble about nothing, the man with the long face was sure to make one of them. He used to go to evening lectures, temperance meetings, revivals, anti-slavery meetings, etc., as a regular amusement. Once I met him coming out of the Marlboro' House, at which time I am positively certain his face was longer than common. Again I fell to inquiring about him. Some thought they had seen him, some did not recollect they had ever seen him, and some rather guessed they had heard of him. Some suspected they knew him, and some rather calculated they did not know him. Some were positive he was a Boston man, and others thought he might be, but could not say for certain. Strange it was, that the intelligence was no clearer respecting this notable personage, for no two accounts agreed. "Do you know the man with the long face?" This question elicited a thousand different replies. Almost every one had seen long faces—yes. But "do you know the man with the long face?" Here they were posed. Some had seen a man with a pretty long face; others knew a man with quite a long face; others knew a face that might be called decidedly long, etc. All this was nothing to the purpose, for no one of my informants could identify the man with the long face. One said he lived in Long-lane; others said he came from Long-island. One had heard of his making a long speech; another had heard him sing a hymn in long metre; and another had seen him smoking a long fine cigar. Here I was sadly puzzled again. "Can all these accounts relate to the same man?" said I to myself. "What can his name be? It must certainly be Long, or Longman, or Longfellow, or something of the sort. But then, that long face—when—how—where—why!—what can be the explanation of it? Is there not a mystery in it? Who, in the name of wonder, can the man with the long face be? Is he Belphegor? Is he Mephistopheles? Is he the wandering Jew? Is he the Man in the Iron Mask?"

It was in vain to ask questions, for nobody could give any answers but such as perplexed me. The man with the long face was as great a mystery as ever, and continued to haunt me wherever I went. It popped upon me as I turned corners; I came slap upon him as I stepped out of the door; he jostled me in passing, elbowed me in the crowd, stared at me through windows, dogged me at the heels and faced me at every turning. Once I met him in Flagg alley, where there seemed no chance of escape; but I bolted into the door of a shoe-black, skulked through the yard, gained the rear of the Union Bank, and escaped for that time. On another occasion he had nearly caught me in the Roxbury omnibus, but I had the presence of mind to slam the door in his face, ring the bell and start the horses at full speed. I had numerous other hair-breadth escapes, and so unremittingly was I haunted with this terrible and mysterious apparition, that wherever I went, whichever way I turned or cast my looks, I was sure to see the spectral form of the man with the long face!

I could no longer endure it, for the matter had got to an alarming crisis, and I was fully persuaded that I should either go mad or be spirited away by the man with the long face before many days. I ran to my physician. "Doctor," said I, "I am dying!" "Dying! with what? fever or poison?" "Neither, doctor—I am dying of a long face!" "A long face?" "Yes, doctor, the man with the long face will certainly be the death of me, unless a remedy can be devised. Have you any medicine for a macropsopophobia? Or can you catch the long face and cut it a foot shorter? These may save me—nothing else can. I may dodge my pursuer a hundred times, but he will inevitably snap me up in the long run."

But the doctor gave me little encouragement. He talked of blisters, bleeding, and water-gruel. "Poh, doctor!" I exclaimed, "how is it possible for bleeding and water-gruel to drive away a long face? I want a more decisive remedy." The doctor did not know of any; and as to cutting the long face shorter, he assured me he had no skill whatever in the art, for the faces of his patients always grew longer under his care. "Bless me! what shall I do!" exclaimed I, in despair. Things grew worse and worse: the man with the long face hung harder upon me than ever. I saw his figure in the clouds, among the embers in the fire-place, on the frost of the window-panes, in the figures of the carpet, in snow-wreaths, volumes of smoke, and the steam of the tea-kettle. Sometimes his long profile was to be seen on the edge of a slice of pudding,—sometimes in the bread and butter, and sometimes it was visible on the top of a cup of coffee, or the bottom of a pewter porringer;—there it was, staring straight at me, a long—long—long face, like lengthening sadness long drawn out!

One evening I was sitting in a room at the Exchange Coffee-house, where I had gone by appointment to receive some money. It was eleven o'clock, and my gentleman had not made his appearance. It was pretty clear that I should come short of my cash; and as I had set my heart upon receiving it punctually, I was terribly in the dumps at the disappointment. I waited and waited, but to no purpose. The money did not come. I grew fretful and sulen, walked up and down the room, listened at the door, went to the head of the staircase, called the waiter, inquired, but could get no intelligence of the man with the money. I waited a little longer, but in vain: all was silent. "Tis of no use," said I to myself: "he won't come to-night. People who pay money always come punctually if they come at all."

So saying, I concluded to go home. I put on my hat and gloves, and had got half-way to the door, when I thought of the man with the long face! The first thought of him gave me a start. "It is a late hour," said I to myself; "the streets are lonely; and what if I should meet him on my way home?" The suggestion made me falter: I drew back, took off my hat, and sat down by the fire. "If I should meet the man with the long face!" said I to myself, "what would be the consequence? It is past a doubt that he has a design upon me; and what better opportunity could he have for putting it in practice than a dark midnight in a lonely street?" I thought of it, and the more I thought, the more alarmed I felt. I rang the bell. "Waiter, some wine." I caught up the poker and gave the fire a rousing stir. "If I should happen to meet him," said I, "ought I to face him boldly, or endeavour to escape by flight?" There seemed to be strong arguments on both sides, and I could not make up my mind. "If he should appear to-night," I continued, "his face will undoubtedly be longer than ever: as long as—as—" At this moment the waiter came in with the bottle. "Waiter," said I, "have you seen the man with the long face this evening?" The waiter shook his head, but I fancied he looked uncommonly grave. "Waiter," said I again, "if the man with the long face should call, say I am not here." The waiter gave a nod and departed.

I poured out a glass and swallowed it. "I can't think," said I, "what the man with the long face wants of me." I poured out another. "Well," said I, "I'll face him bravely if he comes." I sat looking in the fire for some time. The clock struck twelve. "Tis time I was at home," said I; "another drop and I'll go." I took a third glass, put on my gloves, and was just reaching for my hat, when my eye wandered to the further end of the room, and, behold! there stood the man with the long face!

I started,—dropped my hat on the floor. The man with the long face stood still, looking straight at me. I sunk into a chair: he also sat down. I then made a movement to spring up and rush out of the room; but he made a movement likewise, as if designing to intercept me. He was close to the door, and I saw there was no escape but by passing within reach of him; so I sat down again in despair. He sat down too. I turned away my head and looked into the fire for a quarter of an hour, hoping he would be tired of waiting, and go away; but on looking again towards the door, there he sat in the same spot! I rang the bell, and the waiter came in. "Waiter," said I, "the man with the long face; what does he want of me?" "Don't know," said the waiter; "never middle with any gentleman's amusements." "You don't!" said I, in alarm. "Never," replied he. "I wish I knew what he wanted," said I. "I wish you did," returned he. The waiter departed, and I continued in as great perplexity as ever. The man kept his station by the door, and showed no inclination to be going. I sat a quarter of an hour longer, but he did not stir an inch. "This is too bad," said I to myself. "I will ask him what he means by intruding upon a gentleman's privacy in this manner." Twenty times was the worst upon my lips, and I was just going to speak, but some strange influence sealed up my mouth, and I could not utter a syllable. I rang the bell again. "Waiter," said I, in a firm tone, "I wish the man with the long face would go about his business." "I wish he would," replied the waiter. "Then, for heaven's sake, tell him so," said I. The waiter nodded and went out again. I looked towards the door, but the man with the long face sat there still!

Now a new terror seized upon me, for it was as plain as daylight that there was a conspiracy on the part of the waiter. Yes, I was fully convinced that there was a conspiracy to entrap me. "What will be the end of all this?" thought I. "There is surely no help for me unless I can help myself." I thought of bolting out of the window, of climbing up the chimney, and various other methods of escape, but none of them appeared practical. My terror increased; the perspiration began to stand on my forehead, my joints began to grow uneasy, and I filled another glass of wine. I sat some time longer: the house was perfectly silent, and all I could hear was the sound of put, put, put, put, in the fire. But the man with the long face would not go. "What shall I do to get rid of him?" exclaimed I to myself. At this moment a thought struck me. "I'll take another glass," said I, "and then turn round, look him point-blank in the face, and stare him out of countenance!"

No sooner said than done. I tossed off another bumper, turned manfully round, and fixed my eyes full in his long face. My antagonist did precisely the same, and looked equally hard at me. I looked as stern and frowningly as I possibly could, and so methought did he. I scowled at him, and he scowled at me. I shook my head menacingly, and so did the man with the long face. I showed him my teeth, and he showed me his; and when I winked, he winked back again. It was all to no purpose! I could not beat him. His face grew longer and longer; my alarm and perplexity redoubled. His forehead rose up, his chin sunk down. "Mercy on me! what a long face!" exclaimed I. The candle seemed to burn blue and send off long streaming volumes of smoke. The tongue and poker stretched up into a most extraordinary length. I was terribly frightened; everything before me was cloudy and indistinct, even to the candle with its long wick and long flame. "It is all over with me," I exclaimed, in horrible trepidation. The man's long face continued to grow longer; now his chin stretched down to his breast, now to his elbows, now to his knees, and at last he was all face—nothing but one long, dismal, frightful, hobgoblin phis! My hair stood on end, and my teeth chattered: I could stand it no longer. I seized the bottle in a paroxysm of frenzy, and hurled it with furious force and unerring aim at the phantom before me. A terrible crash was heard: the long face disappeared in an instant, and the floor was covered with the fragments of an immense looking-glass plate which had been demolished by the missile!

I have not seen the man with the long face from that time to this. And I may as well add, that I got the money I expected the next morning. It is moreover remarkable, that every face I have seen has appeared a great deal shorter since the above adventure. If any person can explain this affair, I shall be happy to see him, —unless it be the man with the long face himself.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

LEOPOLD ROBERT, THE FRENCH ARTIST.

Few artists of France have excited so much interest as Leopold Robert: he enjoyed a popularity in his lifetime which is not always the lot of genius, and which it might be supposed would have dissipated the morbid sensibility to which at last he became the victim, and that, too, at the very moment when his fame was highest, his hopes brightest, and his reward most sure. Born in the village of Chaux-de-Fonds, in the canton of Neuchâtel, of parents whose humble situations in life served but to exhibit more clearly his high and original qualities of mind, but which were calculated also to begot cheerfulness—it is a question for the philosopher to answer, how he could have so early yielded to such continued and engrossing melancholy. It is strange that his younger brother, Alfred, also terminated his existence at a very youthful age, exactly ten years before Leopold followed his fearful example. One brother, Aurèle, an artist of no mean repute, still remains, and is now the only hope of this once happy family. Leopold, at sixteen, was placed at Paris, under the care of M. Girardin, brother to the well-known engraver of that name, and himself a professor of the burin. Here he made a considerable progress; but his was not a genius to be satisfied with limited attainments.

He became a diligent pupil in David's studio, and continued one of his most devoted disciples until, in the year 1816, the celebrated painter was condemned to exile. This event determined the young artist to return to his own country; and there his portraits, remarkable for vigour and truth, attracted the attention of M. Roulet Mézerac, of Neuchâtel, who generously insisted on the youth's accepting from him the means of pursuing his studies at Rome. Leopold did so, but justly and honourably returned to his friend the money he had advanced; and not only repaid his excellent parents what they had disbursed from their small purse for his first improvements, but devoted the produce of his splendid abilities to ensure their comfort, and improve the condition of two dear sisters, whom he loved with all the deep enthusiasm of his ardent nature. He still resided at Rome, and one of his patrons of art in that city gave, as a subject for his pencil, "Corinne improvisant to cap Ménéce." It was in vain that, after grouping the foreground to the admiration of all who beheld it, he entreated permission to substitute two Neapolitan figures on the promontory—finding it impossible to bring in the formal dress of England, so as to be in keeping with the scenery; the "patron" would have the stiff cloths coats of the British. The young artist boldly declined the commission, and produced a picture, exhibited in 1824—"L'Improvisateur Neapolitain." The simplicity of this picture is delicious; the attitude of the improviser, who is seated on the height of the cape, is at once one of energy and repose; the lazarone, whose gaze is directed towards the principal figure, and who occupies with him the centre of the picture, is such as can be only seen in Italy. The scenery is perfect; and the other figures are in beautiful keeping with the scene and situation. It is impossible not to feel, while observing the composition of the picture, how admirably the painter managed to elevate the character of the people he represented.

He continued to produce picture after picture with unabated vigour and increased reputation; and there is every reason to believe would still have been an ornament to society, and an honour to his country and profession, had he not formed an attachment which, though unsuspectedly encouraged, was not returned. Some have said that the melancholy with which his original disposition was combined, and that so he destroyed himself; but his brother's letters published in Paris, lead to no such conclusion. The event which deprived art of one of its brightest ornaments occurred at Venice, and a simple stone at Lido covers the remains of Leopold Robert. But his monuments are multiplied throughout Europe; and the four great pictures now engraved, or engraving, by M. Prevost, will spread his fame even to those cottage homes of England where art is already multiplied by means of the graver's magic burin.

TALLEYRAND.—The following we quote from the November number of Frazer's Magazine.—"Talleyrand was as eccentric as he was clever. In his mode of living he displayed his eccentricity, even more than in his political character. Sometimes he would drink only water at his meals; at others, he would take an almost immoderate quantity of wine. He had a great dislike of medicine; and it was with difficulty, when he was unwell, that his niece, the Duchesse de Dino, could induce him to take an expectant pill. Although few men were more disgraced by nature than himself, he was occasionally coquetish in his dress, and wore a coat which a dandy, for its tightness, would have chosen for the display of his shape. From parsimony, however, he was always desirous of seeing his servants in roomy clothing; for in the event of change, the livery would serve the successor. I was waiting one day at his house in Hanover-Square, whilst the Portuguese ambassador was closeted with him, when the tailor brought home one of the gaudy liveries which were to be worn on the occasion of the approaching visit of the Duke of Orleans. One of the footmen having put it on, he was sent by the chamberlain to ask me what I thought of the new livery. 'Why,' said I, 'my good fellow, it is not a nice one, you have got; it is a sack!' 'Yes, sir,' replied the man, 'I know that; but it is done purposely. If it were to fit closely, the prince would refuse all the liveries, so the tailor has made it very loose to please him; but when he shall have seen me in it, and confirm the order, the tailor will trick him by taking it in.' ' * * * The last time that I saw Talleyrand was a few days before his death. He was then very ill, and told me that he felt convinced his end was drawing near. The library, which was the room in which he usually received his morning visitors, was nearly filled with poets, deputies, and men of letters, waiting for his appearance. At two o'clock, he hobbled into the room on his stick; and, although in an evident state of suffering, entered into conversation with his habitual residents. It was in a private conversation, in an under tone, that he told me how ill he felt; but I heard him tell several persons that he was as well as usual, although some of the newspapers had announced that he was dangerously indisposed. In a few days more, the actor of many parts made his bow to the audience, and retired finally from the busy stage of this world.

GRACE DARLING.—Among the announcements of forthcoming novelties, we perceive one of which we cannot approve—one, indeed, from which it seems two most respectable publishers expect to reap a harvest; and who have, consequently, each given "note of preparation," that Grace Darling having been sitting to their artists, is about to be transferred to their engravers. The story of "Grace Darling" is interesting, beyond doubt; the act which has made her celebrated was daring and heroic; and Mr. Yates may have done wisely in bringing out his representative at the Adelphi, to obtain the popular voice; but it is ill done, we think, to make so much of it. Heroism is not heroism, unless it becomes famous! The poor fellow who rushed back on board the Philippa, a few months ago, to save a poor child—not his own—did a nobler act, and incurred far greater peril than did Grace Darling. His name is unknown. It is pandering to an unhealthy desire thus to make her so notable, and can produce no possible good. Some penny print-sellers have, however, been beforehand with the publishers to whom we refer; in many of the shop-windows may be seen a rock, a ship among the breakers, a boat, and a young woman with garments let loose by the wind; all representing the scene which the artists engaged by Mr. Moon and Mr. Achermann may present better, but cannot describe with greater effect, for the benefit of those whom it is intended to gratify, and who are expected to buy the published pictures of it; 'tis, at best, "a pitiful ambition!"

PAPER HANGINGS.—A few years ago, our neighbours the French were greatly inferior to us in the manufacture of paper hangings; but now, through the non-employment of artistic skill on our part, and the great exertions to obtain excellence which have been made on theirs, we find ourselves considerably in the rear. Machinery will not do all. Art must be called in to aid; and we hope soon to see a great change of feeling from that which now exists in this respect. An individual has recently opened a manufactory at Hoxton, for the execution of paper hangings by hand, where, by the distribution of labour, and duly training the workmen, he is able to make the cost much smaller than could be expected. Want of taste in the designs (easily to be accounted for) is apparent in the specimens we have seen. Surely good artists may be found in England who will stop (!) to lend assistance to such undertakings! It was by inducing aid of this sort that Wedgwood benefited society, made a large fortune, and obtained a noble reputation. At all events, the existing "Schools of Design" may be expected to supply some individuals able to advance greatly the character of our manufactures generally.

QUEEN ELIZABETH'S STATUE.—A short time ago a statue of the "Virgin Queen" was discovered in the cellar of a house adjoining St. Dunstan's church. It was immediately released from its ignominious concealment, and has just been restored to the position it must have originally occupied. It is now placed in the avenue of the church. The pedestal is fixed over the eastern side of the church; underneath is a block of black stone, on which is engraved the following inscription:—"This statue of Queen Elizabeth formerly stood on the west side of Ludgate; and was presented by the city to Sir Francis Gosling, knight, alderman of the ward, who caused it to be placed here."

CAMPBELL, THE POET, AND TURNER, THE ARTIST, were dining together, with a large party, a few years ago. The poet was called upon for a toast, and, by way of a joke upon the great professor of the sister-art, gave—"The painters and glaziers." After the laughter had subsided, the artist was of course summoned to propose a toast also; he rose, and with admirable tact and ready wit discharged the debt of his craft to the author of "The Pleasures of Hope," by giving—"The paper-stainers!"

EXTRACTS FROM KNOWLES'S NEW PLAY.

LOVE—WHENCE COMES IT?

No telling how love thrives! to what it comes!
Whence grows! 'Tis e'en of as mysterious root.
As the pine that makes its lodging of the rock,
Yet there it lives, a huge tree, flourishing,
Where you would think a blade of grass would die!
What is love's poison, if it be not hate?
Yet in that poison, oft is found love's food.
Frowns that are clouds to us, are sun to him!
He finds a music in a scornful tongue.
That melts him more than softest melody—
Passion perverting all things to its mood,
And, spite of nature, matching opposites!

PROOFS OF LOVE.

Are you in love—"I'll prove it to thy things.
And first and foremost, you deny it, sir;
A certain sign, with certain accidents—
As dulness, moodiness, moroseness, shyness.
I'd stake my credit on one single fact
Thou hearest out to admiration—
A lover is the dullest thing on earth.
Who but a lover—or his antipodes,
A wise man—ever found out that the ace
Of his tongue was to hold it! Thou must be in love,
And for one sovereign reason, after which I'll give no other.

LOVE AND ADVERSITY.

Fortune, farewell! and pride go with thee! Go!
Welcome adversity! Shake hands with me,
Thou tester of true hearts! whose lonely fare
No flatterer sits down to—hollow friend,
Foe, masking thoughts of scorn with smiling face—
But truth and honesty! affection stanch!
That grasps the hand before it scans the glove,
And greets the lowly portal with a grace
More winning far than his, who thanks the gate
That spreads with pride, to let a monarch in.

LOVE—GOLD.

Were there before us
All—who in this bid and vast mart
Of merchant-travellers—this land of England—
Worship the yellow gold—how one great truth
Should shake the sceptered Mammon on his throne!
Here, in our souls, we treasure up the wealth
Fraud cannot hide, nor waste destroy,—the more
'Tis spent, the more we have,—the sweet affections—
The heart's religion—the diviner instincts
Of what we shall be when the world is dust!

LOVE INCURABLE.

The wounded body heals,
The pain is over, all is sound again;
A scar reminds you of it—nothing more!
Not so the heart; you lacerate it once!
Habit may dull, pursuit engross—divert—
But never are you ransom'd from the three
Love your meridian light, and all come again,
Fresh as at first, to make you write anew.

A MISEN'S WARNING.

Mice!—Zounds, how can I
Keep mice!—"I can't afford it,—they were starved
To death an age ago!—the last was found
Some Christmas three years, stretched beside a bone
In that same larder—so consumed and worn
By pious fast—'twas awful to behold it!
I canonized its corpse in spirits of wine,
And set it in the porch—a solemn warning
To thieves and beggars."

A FIRST PASHION.

You must not play
With a first passion, once it has taken root.
For it strikes deep—to the foundations even
Of the heart—entwining with the fibres, there
Of life itself, that, pluck the other up,
These haply come along.

A STORY.

A storm! a storm! Those pitch-black clouds that speed
In wild career to meet the sun, as though
In envy of his light to blot him out,
Come right against the wind—a token they Bring thunder!

A MISEN'S LAMENT FOR HIS MONNY.

Little deers! you see them
Tucked up in bed and fast asleep—my heart aches
That such a happy and united family
Should be dispersed upon the world, and never Come home again!

MAN.

Man, sir, is but a plant,
Although he holds no rank in botany;
And as with change of climate plants will change,
Thrive more or less, or take no root at all,
So man discovers strange diversity
Transferred to sun and soil not native to him.

SIGNS NO PROOF OF LOVE.

I will coin signs for you, fast as the mint
Come ducats. Shows are all uncertain things,
Unless the cheek, indeed, grows lank and pale—
Yet that may be with frequent lack of dinner.
So, 'tis betwixt the heart and appetite!
Or for a sign would be infallible.
And him to show it, I would see it on!

A LOVER'S EXCLAMATION.

O thought of joy—
To see thee, hear thee, touch thy hand, and glide
By thy dear side down the blessed time!

THE STORY OF DAVID DUNBAR.

It was a mild evening in August, neither cold nor warm; we had been journeying through North Wales, and had selected, as our resting-place, the little town of Tan-y-Bwlch. Resolved to see as much as possible of the surrounding country, in our own way, we strolled up the path leading to the Hall, and looked from the terrace along the picturesque Vale of Festiniog. Each moment of our stay added to the beauty of the scene; a soft mist, so transparent that every object appeared through it, was creeping up the opposite mountains, as it were from the very depths of the valley towards the clouds that seemed to hang on the projecting or towering rocks, as if weighed down by the purple vapours of heaven's abundance. The broken rocks, the thickets below the trees, and the valley, creating beauties, and producing effects which, though I well remember, I may not attempt to describe.

well—fast, and ever quickly than I desired, these enchantments vanished; the mist thickened, though all immediately around us remained clear—the clear gray tint of an autumnal twilight. We followed the upward path, and the mist, which had been so long gathering about the base of some slaty rock, every feature of which was garlanded by creeping plants. Suddenly, we emerged on a platform of soft green turf, commanding another view of the valley, more limited than that we had gazed upon a few minutes since. The hills were all shrouded in mist, and the mountain upon had risen, but its light looked to us so thin and pale, as hardly to deserve the name; and we were half inclined to murmur at the change, when the tones of a voice, once familiar, and still well-remembered, made no rock sound. The gentleman and lady were standing close together, little more than a dozen paces from us; the gentleman had just required of his companion,

"And what in the perspective?"

There was nothing remarkable in the words; they might relate to landscape, or might have wronged the soul, and they had reference to those prospects of the future which we create, and Time destroys. And yet what a multitude of memories they brought upon me! The speaker, I knew, could be no other than David Dunbar, whom I had known about five years before, and who everyone said would hereafter rival Turner, and paint as well as Claude. Whether such anticipations were just, I could not say; I thought his pictures were wonderful, but admired still more the honest, manly, and unassuming way in which he spoke. He looked like a tree—a boarding deck—a waterfall—a light—or the shadow of a cloud upon a hill—were to him sources of exquisite enjoyment: there was no affectation in this, it was genuine joy that illumined his fine eyes and made his whole countenance radiant—flushing his cheek and brow. He luxuriated in the beauties of creation—Nature was not only his every day, but his holiday book: he read it—his eye was its alphabet, and he was never weary of its study. He was led by his fine susceptibilities of the good, as well as of the beautiful. His religion had found its temple in the universe, and never did he point out a beauty, or direct attention to a particular object which attracted his admiration without adding, "And this enjoyment is given me by the Almighty!" He never prayed but to praise, and was abundantly grateful for the power of noting the graces or glories of creation on his canvass. How delightful to meet him at a distance, and to find him so ready to converse! He was so full of the speak of the wonders we had both seen to pass over the valley prompted the joyful exclamation of recognition that commanded his attention. He rose—advanced a step to meet me—held out his hand, as frankly, as kindly as ever; the smile on his expressive mouth was unchanging—"but his eyes!" I looked up to meet their welcome—alas! the eyes of David Dunbar were sightless. "I was blind," he said, "when I met you, and I was full of your remembrance." You did not hear it then? I said, "I saw, and sat down on the green bench from which he had risen."

I could not speak, but I looked mournfully into his face ; I dared not ask, " How was it ?—

"Total eclipse !"

to him whose life was light!

After a pause, his companion said, "You have not introduced me." How glad I was she spoke! the silence of those few moments had grown insupportable. "My wife, my Mary," he answered, and then continued, "When this affliction came, she would have me—I told her it was very foolish; but I suppose she thought I was a fool. And she said, 'I will do as I like.' " He then added, in that tone of deep tenderness which goes straight to the heart—"She does love me—she is, as much as mortal can be, eyes to the blind." How hard it was to look at him and command words. I had seldom seen even a picture of more than ordinary interest, that the idea of what David Noverk would say or think of it had occurred to me. I had never doubted upon a beautiful scene without thinking of David; for though he had been absent for three years, the remembrance of his riches for all things excellent was fresh in my memory.

He was totally blind—no ray of outward light illuminated him; the sun—the moon—the river—the ocean, hill, dale, tree, and forest, were to him but history. And yet how happy was it to feel, while looking on his sightless countenance, that though sorrow and pain had been there, their bitterness was past; every feature expressed not only resignation, but cheerfulness; and when I turned my gaze on her, who, to use his own beautiful application of the language of the poets, "had been the blindest of the blind," with my whole heart, and could not wonder that stricken as he had been in the days of his youth, he was still the happy-spirited being I had so long known, so highly esteemed.

She seemed a fitting object for a painter's love—her beauty was unobtrusive, but insinuating without design; one glance told more there was much to see, and much to note; for every emotion vibrated through her features; and yet it was a pencilled, rather than a painted, loveliness—a beauty, shadowy enough for dreams, yet endowed as I afterwards found, with tenderness, truth, and virtue; the three best and truest attributes of women—the first being the foundation of all gentleness—the second, of true bravery—the third, a circlet of glory over the domestic hearth—her true throne. I could not allude to her husband's misfortune; but he told the tale himself as one tells of a fearful trial, not only past, but overcome.

He had been but a few weeks returned, rich with the accumulated knowledge of the south—his folios filled with sketches, his brain with high ideas and fine imaginings, which he was only restrained from working out immediately by his desire to visit "his Mary"—a young lady whom he had long and deeply loved.

sketch of the future—and before he went out of the father's house to kindle a scene which the old gentleman wished to possess—she had whispered her consent to become his wife—he said, when better days should come and he should gather in the golden harvest of a noble fame. At which she laughed, and promised to tell him that evening a secret he little dreamed of. He brouched across the river, and she followed him, and he pointed to the figure as he sat under the verandah, and she began to read—time out of joint, and the love's sweet deceptions—to seem to read—when we are watching, ay, with a beating heart, every movement of the one we love. I saw the sketch—it was his last—by the time he had reached the point from which the view was to be taken, it suddenly began to rain, and some few mutterings of thunder, sent him to take shelter in a neighbouring cottage, and overtook him on his return on this excursion. It was strange, he thought, that the disturbance of the weather should hardly despoil the name of a thunder-storm; a few were by a heavy leaden hue, edged here and there by a dark copper colour, as if some malignant spirit had flung that peculiar glare from his torch upon them. There was no wind among the trees, no ripple on the river—all was hushed—and as he sat watching the heavens, and gazing at the smiling landscape, he saw the dark clouds slowly towards each other, heard distinctly the splashing of the drops of rain as they fell, slowly, and almost singly into the water. A shrill continued to pour her gushing tide of song from amid the foliage of a white thorn tree, regardless of the rain and darkness—'I never,' he added, 'could wish a storm to terminate; its beautiful variety of the tints it throws upon the earth had for me an ever increasing charm.' He was then struck by the glorious tranquility of my mind, and the blessed confidence in my Mary's future, and far beyond my hopes, which had already crossed my exertions, made me as assured of happiness as human being could be. My dreams were of the future—the perfecting of love, and the achievement of fame! How delicious to an enthusiast in both! It is impossible to trace the progress of the lightning—yet certainly, at the moment when the clouds sprang apart, I saw the flash, which deprived me of sight for an instant, and of consciousness for a time."

"Do not speak of it, dearest," murmured his wife; "it does you harm."

"No, no, it does me good. I am wiser—better—happier—than I was then. It taught me a knowledge, which else, I should have never acquired—a knowledge of the unfathomable depths of woman's love."

Mary blushed; but it was not in nature not to feel gratified at such a tribute. She thanked him by a pressure of the hand which he felt, and understood—

"But we may talk of happiness," he answered, "I must tell the secret which Mary promised me on my return; that she had been made rich, by the death of a distant relative, of whom I had never heard—that she——"

But his wife would not suffer him to continue.

"Well," he exclaimed, "for this one evening, I must be an egotist. I must tell my friends of the advantages of blindness. Sounds have become to me even as sights. I see a landscape in the voice of every thicket that sings; the nightingale is my moon; the blackbird, my thunder; the plover, my wild uncultivated heart; the robin, my English cottage; the sparrow, my pet, my wise school-boy; the very grasshopper, my fresh green meadow. I associate other sounds with Italy; and each natural perfume peoples my garden with flowers. I have even been able to detect the most unpleasing reality. I shall never think my wife grows old, or my friend ugly. If I cannot see new objects of interest, I can imagine them without the danger of having the ideal destroyed by the real. I can tell the tree under which I stand by the rustling of its leaves. Believe me, the world has no blank for a well-regulated and industrious mind—nor is there any darkness so profound which the imagination cannot illuminate. I bless God for the past; I bless Him greatly for the present; and I know I shall have to bless Him for the future. I wish to see my beautiful spots in the world, and to be inquired of. What in the circumstances?" Mary should be compelled to answer—"Nothing striking; I create something that shall please me."

MUSIC IN SWEDEN.

The ancient Swedes were influenced in their pleasures by customs as extraordinary as those which governed their laws. All the people, civilized or savages—barbarians or demi-barbarians, which may arise from the climate of that country, were ignorant of dancing, and the Swedes in not knowing this kind of diversion, had, as the suggestion of their legislators, interdicted it, and those following the profession were denounced as persons infamous and dangerous to the state; previous to the reign of Gustavus Vasa, a law was in force, banishing all musicians from the kingdom, and authorizing their destruction, wherever they were met with.

This assassination," says Archibald, (History of Gustavus Vasa, vol. 1, p. 107), "was the most atrocious murder ever witnessed in the world. The murderer was only held bound to give the heir of the deceased, one pair of white shoes, one pair of gloves, and a three year old calf. But even this miserable indemnity, granted as a sufficient compensation for the loss of a father, a son, or a brother, was sometimes illusory, and the heir could lay no claim to it, until he had submitted to a humiliating trial, worthy of those barbarous times. They plastered with grease the tail of the calf, which being brought to the top of a hill, the claimant took the tail in his hands, the murderer then struck the calf, and he was obliged to run swiftly; if the heir succeeded in retaining the calf, he was entitled to his inheritance; otherwise he let it slip from him, he lost all right, and remained exposed to the sneers of the spectators. All these horrors which took place before the reign of Gustavus Vasa, vanished in 1523.

This prince abolished laws against the use of the fiddle, and he called his court foreign musicians and introduced into Sweden the art of dancing, before unknown in that city. This diversion frequently took place in the halls of the palace after the repast, to the sounds of the royal orchestra. Music is now considered by the Swedes as an important part of their education, especially amongst the females. Professor H. H. B. has written a treatise on the subject, and are loaded with honours, by classes the most elevated in society. In the mountains, the shepherds use a kind of long trumpet, made from the bark of the birch, which they call "Mir. This instrument is sometimes four feet long, and sends forth a piercing sound, which may be heard at a great distance. It is used, though the noise made by this trumpet is very disagreeable, to frighten away the wild beasts, yet it is not irredeemable.

POETRY.

THE ITALIAN PICTURE.—BY THE HON. MRS. NORTON.

It is the music of her native land—

The airs she used to love in happier days ;
The lute is struck by some young gentle hand,
To soothe her spirit with remembered lays.

But ah ! her heart is wandering from the notes,
Her ear is filled with an imagined strain ;
Vainly the softened music round her floats,
The echo it awakes is all of pain !

The echo it awakes is of a voice
Which never more her weary heart shall cheer—
Fain would she banish it, but hath no choice,
Its vanished sound still haunts her shrinking ear—
Still haunts her with its tones of joy and love,
Its memories of bitterness and wrong,
Bidding her thoughts through various changes rove—
Welcomes—farewells—and snatches of wild song

Why bring her music? She had half forgot
How left, how lonely, how oppress she was;
Why, by these strains, recall her former lot,
The depth of all her suffering, and its cause?

Know ye not what a spell there is in sound ?
 Know ye not that the melody of words
 Is nothing to the power that wanders round,
 Giving vague language to harmonious chords

Know ye not how, afraid yet full of joy,
The breathless heart lies listening in its home—
(Like a fair maiden who with welcome coy Hears the quick footsteps of the loved one come,)

Waiting the notes on whose impassioned wings
Thought, soul, and sense are blindly borne away,
The sounds on which the spirit heavenward springs,
Then trembling sinks to earth and dies away !

Oh! keep ye silence! He hath sung to her,
And from that hour—(faint twilight, sweet and dim—
When the low breeze scarce made the branches stir—
Music hath been a memory of HIM!

Chords which the wandering fingers scarcely touch
When they would seek for some forgotten song—
Stray notes which have no certain meaning—such
As careless hands unthinkingly prolong,—

Come unto HER, fraught with a vivid dream
Of love in all its wild and passionate strength—
Of sunsets glittering on the purple stream,
Of shadows deepening into twilight length—

Of gentle sounds, when the warm world lay hushed
Beneath the soft breath of the evening air—
Of hopes and fears, and expectations crushed
By one long certainty of dead despair!

Bear to the sick man's couch the fiery cup,
Pledged by wild feasters in their careless hours,
And bid his parched lips drink the poison up
As though its foam held cool refreshing powers :—

Lift some poor wounded wretch, whose writhing pain
Finds soothing only in an utter rest,
Forth in some rude made litter, to regain
Strength for his limbs and vigour for his breast :—

But soothe ye not that proud forsaken heart
With strains whose sweetness maddens as they fall
Untroubled let her feverish soul depart—
Not long shall memory's power its might enthrall ;

Not long ;—though balmy be the summer's breath !
In the deep stillness of its golden light
A shadowy spirit sits, whose name is DEATH,
And turns what was all beauty into blight ;

And she, before whose sad and dreaming eye
Visions of by-gone days are sweeping on,
In her unfaded youth shall drooping die,
Shut from the glow of that Italian sun.

*Then let the organ's solemn notes prolong
Their glory round the silence of her grave,
Then let the choral voices swell in song,
And echo through the chancel and the nave ;*

For then her heart shall ache not at the sound,
Then the faint fever of her life shall cease,
Silence, unbroken, calm, shall dwell around,
And the long restless shall be laid at peace.

THE VOICE OF THE GALE,—BY THOMAS J. CHARLTON.

'Tis the voice of the gale : I have heard it, at night,
Sweep the depths of the sea with its terrible might ;
And the sound of its wailing seemed fraught with the cry
Of thousands who sunk mid the waters to die.

'Tis the voice of the gale : I have heard its deep moan
Through the desolate halls of some fabric o'erthrown ;
And the accents of those who once gladdened its hearth
Seemed again to return to the place of their birth.

'Tis the voice of the gale : mid the desolate plain,
In the forest's dark gloom, I have heard it complain,
Like the tones of some spirit that hovered in air,
And mourned for the children of sorrow and care.

'Tis the voice of the gale, which, to fancy's fond ear,
Seems filled with the accents of those ever dear—
My friends, my companions, my kindred—all those Who have sunk to the sleep of a lasting repose.

Yes; oft, mid its moanings, we dream they are nigh,
And fancy we hear their soft voices reply.
'Tis a vision of bliss, till, by reason o'erthrown,
We hear the rude breath of the tempest alone.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

LETTER FROM M. ALEXANDRE VATTENMARE
TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

DEAR SIR—In handing you the annexed documents, which I trust will find their way through the press to the notice of all Americans who have at heart the intellectual welfare of their country, I cannot refrain from taking occasion to express to the New-York public my sincere and heartfelt acknowledgments of the kindness with which I have been received here. Although the errand destiny of my profession naturally led me to follow the footsteps of the illustrious artists who have preceded me in this land, which in itself and its institutions possesses attractions tantamount to the prospect of gain, I have come here in pursuit of other objects, the hope of attaining which has been my chief consolation during this period of my wanderings, and of separation from my family. I allude to that system of exchanges, for which I claim to be viewed not merely as one who amuses society, but who has laboured for more than twenty years to prove himself one of its active and useful members; I allude also to the gratification of those tastes for objects of antiquity and of art which have tempted me to form unrivalled collections of coins and medals, and to which one thousand European artists have contributed those original drawings recently exhibited at the National Academy of Design, where they were constantly visited with the deepest interest by all the artists in this vicinity. It gives me pleasure to add that I have already received many admirable native American designs, and the promise of many more from sources which warrant the highest expectations, with which I trust one day to form an AMERICAN ALBUM, similar to the Album Cosmopolite, and in proof to the Old World of the genius which has arisen to assert the magnificence of art in the New

In returning my thanks to these gentlemen for their zealous co-operation, I would also acknowledge the kindness of those who have aided me, and who have promised to lend their best efforts to the furtherance of the object detailed in the petition below. To it I have devoted much of my life and fortune. In it will be found advantages for this country above those already secured by its adoption in the various countries of Europe. It may be applied not only to the formation and enrichment of national collections, but of those of states, of local societies and of individuals. It has been called the locomotive of civilization; and when this system of exchange of the superfluous and the useless objects of one country for the necessary and useful ones of another shall have once found circulation in this vast land, rich in natural resources, in inventions, and, I am not indisposed to believe, in objects of art, with what activity will not Europe hasten to correspond to this quickening of international intercourse.

Engagements, which I owe it to a numerous family to have accepted, now lead me to Havana and to New-Orleans. But my project is now in better hands than mine: enlightened and patriotic gentlemen have promised me and the country it is destined to benefit, that it shall reach Washington in due time, where I doubt not it will find warm advocates; and you, sir, in giving my petition and the accompanying documents a place in your journal, have led me to hope that your brethren of the press will not deny it one in the columns of the various papers which disseminate intelligence throughout this mighty land. I remain, sir, yours most respectfully,

ALEXANDRE VATTENMARE.

New-York, 6th December, 1839.

To the Honourable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

The memorial of Alexandre Vattenmare, Elector of the Department of the Seine and Oise, (France,) respectfully sheweth,

That, at the instance chiefly of your memorialist, a system of exchanges has been commenced between the governments and literary institutions of the different nations in Europe, by which the books, natural productions, and works of art possessed by the one are transferred for an equivalent value to another which may need them. This system has been urged by the following considerations, which form parts of memorials he has had the honour to present, and which have been acted upon by the legislative bodies of his native country, and have been successful in uniting others in the joint efforts to extend and diffuse knowledge beyond the limits to which race, language, or political boundaries, have a tendency to confine it.

All the great establishments founded by governments to promote science and the arts—museums, collections, galleries, libraries—possess, besides the riches they spread out to view, others which their own abundance condemned to actual sterility. These are duplicates, which are necessarily, but with regret, consigned to dust and oblivion.

There is not a great city in Europe that does not reckon myriads of such valuable but useless treasures. In 1835 the library of Munich had two hundred thousand duplicates; that of Jena, twelve thousand; that of St. Petersburg, fifty-four thousand. At Vienna, thirty thousand, among which are a great number of innumabula,* were shut up in warehouses. The section of entomology of the Jarselin museum alone, in the latter city, has twenty-five thousand duplicates. Everywhere, in fact—far as enumeration, however long, would suffice to exhibit the state of things—there can be found, side by side with the collections open to the student and the curiosity of the public, entombed collections, forgotten libraries, unknown museums, whose treasures are useless to science, and lost to the world.

* Works printed previous to A. D. 1820, which, from their rarity, are of great value.

In this way these public establishments have remained strangers to the great movement of progress and generalization which characterizes the present epoch.

Science overleaps the boundaries which political systems interpose between nations. All the men consecrated by its worship are brethren. Among them remains no distinction of country, no political divisions; from one end of the world to the other, they understand each other's tongue, the discovery of one is the triumph of all; and, thanks to this fraternity of talent, to this federal union of intelligence, science is elevated, and daily extends the empire of civilization.

In his travels throughout Europe, your memorialist, if he be permitted to speak of his own efforts, has laid the foundation of a general system of exchange. He obtained from the learned, from the directors of public establishments, from ministers, and, in some cases, from the sovereigns themselves, the assurance that they are anxious and willing to enter into a well-regulated system for the exchange of duplicates. Nay, the system does not remain an unproductive project; already, within four years from the date at which it was first presented to the world, nearly two millions of volumes of books have been withdrawn from dust and oblivion, and placed in situations where they have assumed their real value. In France alone, where, although first proposed, the system was last adopted, six hundred thousand volumes have been forwarded to a central depot, either for internal exchange, or to draw duplicates from foreign countries. The progress of the plan has had the effect not only of calling into activity the buried treasures of former ages, but has, by a very unexpected result, led to an interchange of modern productions. The enlightened publishers of the kingdom of Saxony, where, at Leipzig, is seated the great literary mart of the Teutonic race, have seen that their interests are to be promoted by its operation, and have pressed upon the government five copies of every work which they emit from the press, seeing that the trifling donation, acting as an advertisement, returns in profit a thousand-fold.

The same proposal has been made in France. The publishers of Paris have offered to place five copies at the disposal of the government, on condition that three of them shall be exchanged for literary or scientific productions of other countries.

In the United States the law already requires the deposit of two copies of every new work, a condition of copyright which is considered a hardship, but ill-observed, because no benefit is derived by the proprietors from the act. The volumes thus deposited rot in dust or are consumed by the worm. But should an additional number be distributed at the cost of government, a cost well repaid in a valuable return, to the enlightened countries of the old world, a demand would infallibly arise for American books now unknown, except within narrow limits, or confined in circulation to the United States alone.

Of all countries in the world, America will have the most to gain in entering into this plan. The libraries of Europe, splendid, copious and rare, have been the slow accumulation of nearly four centuries. Few in the United States can date back half a century. If our best endowed public institutions possess works which show the present state of science, and the triumph of modern literature, they are wanting in all that can be called the history of art, of science, and of the gradual progress of the human mind, from the time that Faust and Gutenberg first called into action that mighty engine, which has established the future liberties of the human race upon the basis of intelligence universally diffused, and everywhere accessible.

It may be said that the United States, whose literary collections are but of modern origin, and duplicates of books have been rarely accumulated, has but little to offer in the way of exchange. This is, however, far from being the case. Wanting printed books, the natural productions of the country, specimens of the animal, the vegetable, and the mineral kingdoms, more particularly the fossil remains of a more early period of the earth's existence, are sought and acquired for with avidity in Europe, and would command returns tenfold of any value that the cost of obtaining them on the spot would amount to. Thus, it is said to be notorious, that several skeletons of the mastodon, the mighty brethren of those which ornament the collection of the Jardine des Plantes, and make rich the museum of Philadelphia, have been marked, and the locality recorded. There is no museum in Europe that would not consider such a skeleton cheaply purchased by thousands of duplicate volumes.

In the United States, where a general government combines in union a number of sovereign states, the central administration may not feel the duty, or see it to be within its limited authority, to enter into any system of exchanges for its own account, except so far as the law of copyright, or the gift of individuals, places in its power. But it is, by the constitution, the organ of communication with foreign countries; and the seat of government is the focus in which is annually collected the wisdom of the separate states. To your honourable houses, therefore, your memorialist first directs his appeal. No sordid motives influence him in his petition; from its successful result he can reap no other benefit than the consciousness of having performed a duty which he owes to his species, and strengthened the bonds which link in friendship the long separated races of the family of man.

Your memorialist does not venture to do more than to bring his project, with the written sanctions which it has already received from all that is highest in station in European governments, from those of France and England to that of Turkey, before you. If the United States as yet produces no very great numbers of original literary and scientific works, they are more prolific in inventions in the useful arts than any other nation, and are remarkable for improvements in the engines used in agriculture, in manufactures and in practical mechanics. Models of these would be in great request in Europe, and would command a rich return.

He would therefore limit his prayer to a request that his memorial be referred to an appropriate committee for consideration, in order that it may report such measures as its wisdom may judge expedient in the premises. Were he to venture any suggestion on the subject, it would be, that the librarian of Congress, under the direction of the Joint Library Committee, be authorized to open correspondences with the executive of the several states of the Union, and with the representatives of foreign powers, for the purpose of obtaining catalogues of such articles as might be available for exchange on the part of the United States, or disposable as a return on the part of foreign nations; and that for the purpose of making a beginning, the copies which are now by law directed to be deposited in the Department of State of every copy-right book or engraving, with the printed reports of the two houses of Congress, be placed at the disposal of the Library Committee, for the purpose of exchange. Convinced that a beginning alone is necessary, and that the advantages of his project will develop themselves in a manner to encourage and repay any more extensive action, your memorialist refrains from any further suggestion.

New-York, 4th December, 1839.

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

WHO GOVERNS?

BY HEINRICH ZSCHOKKE.

CHAPTER VI.—A QUARREL.

COLAS was, as we may suppose, not a little astonished when he heard of his appointment. His first step was to wait on his superiors in the department.

"I took particular pleasure in bringing your name before his majesty," said the minister, "knowing your application and ability."

"I have but small claims on you," said the chancellor of the department of state, "though I must admit it cost me some trouble to get you nominated. I did all I could for you, and was lucky enough to overcome the minister's objections." The other heads of departments held the same language, and Colas was astonished to find that he had so many friends at once. Pauline confessed to him that Prince Soubise was his true benefactor, and charged him to wait on the prince at once. The prince told him to pay his respects to Madame de Pompadour, and that lady felt more satisfied than ever with her exertions, when she saw what a very handsome and agreeable young man she had interested herself for. So Monsieur Rosier (it will not do to call him Colas any longer) entered on the duties of his new office. He was active, industrious, and intelligent, so that in a very little time he gained the goodwill of his superiors, and more especially, since he had succeeded in obtaining his office without the aid of any ostensible friend or patron. It was supposed he must have some powerful secret influence at court, and this led every one to treat him with peculiar consideration.

Colas enjoyed his good fortune with moderation; he was too phlegmatic and good-natured to be ambitious. Punctual and regular in his habits, it was only of an evening, after the duties of the office were over, that he allowed himself any relaxation. Once, he happened to look in at a ball, very fashionable among the beauties of the bourgeoisie, when the first person that met his eyes was Julia, the pretty Julia as she was generally called, daughter of the book-binder who worked for Colas's department. Our hero had had frequent opportunities of seeing her, and she now gladly claimed him as an acquaintance, more especially as he was anxious to escape from the importunities of an English gentleman, who was paying court to her most assiduously. He was an attaché to Lord Albermarle's legation, which was now in Paris actively engaged in bringing about more friendly sentiments between the two great rivals. Colas took triumphant possession of this Englishman's pretty partner, without regard to the black looks and muttered threats of the disappointed stranger. When the ball was over, he sat down in one of the pasteboard bowers to drink a glass of punch, the fashionable beverage of the day. It chanced that Julia's rejected suitor, our English friend, was seated near him, talking politics with some of his countrymen, with an ardour still more enflamed by love and wine. The only acquaintance Colas had was a Monsieur de la Bonnaye, a gentleman attached to one of the offices at court, with whom he was slightly acquainted. As soon as he took his seat, the patriotism of his spirited neighbour grew doubly eloquent. He cursed all France and all its inhabitants, and could find nothing endurable in French policy, French manners, or French cookery. Colas, we have said, was blessed with an easy and phlegmatic temperament, so he sipped his punch quietly, regardless of the storm of words that was raging around him. The cooler he seemed, the warmer grew his adversary. At every outbreak against France and Frenchmen, he fixed his eyes sternly on our hero, as though to give him to understand that it was meant as a personal affront to him. His friends could not pacify him. "It is true," said he at last, "England does not succeed well in her negotiations with France. Our sovereign, if he wanted to obtain anything from the French king, ought to have sent, not a peer like Lord Albermarle, but a lady of light reputation, to negotiate with him. There are a thousand prettier ones in London than your faded Pompadour."

Our hero's patience was at end, at this gross insult to his benefactor, and he could not help saying, as politely as he could, however, "You seem to forget, sir, that you are in France." The answer was a request to mind his own business, enforced by a smart blow across the nose. The next moment swords were drawn on both sides. The friends of each party hastened to interpose, but before they could do so, Colas had received a flesh-wound in the breast. At the sight of blood, both English and French escaped, from fear of a visit from the police. Monsieur de la Bonnaye was the only one left, and he got a coach to convey our hero home, as he felt weakened by the loss of blood, though the wound was not dangerous. Monsieur de Bonnaye, a warm patriot, and a courageous one withal, kept inveighing against the arrogance of the British all the way home. He said, "I am surprised that our cabinet can tolerate their haughtiness so long. If it depended on me, war should be declared to-morrow." This idea was balm to Colas's wound. His mind was made up. He seized his friend's hand, and told him confidently "Be satisfied. In less than a fortnight, all the English shall be ordered to leave Paris, and war shall be declared."

His friend smiled, and thought of the power of punch; Colas, however, was thinking of the power of Pauline. The whole of the next day he was forced to keep his bed, he had lost a good deal of blood, and was in a high fever. He wrote a line to Pauline, to inform her that illness prevented his waiting on her, not doubting but that she and the whole town were talking of his accident. There he was greatly mistaken, no one had thought of mentioning it. As soon as she could, Pauline invented an excuse for not waiting on the countess, and hurried over to the sick bed of her newly-adopted brother. Old Mark, Colas's faithful servant, one of Monsieur Larmes's legacies, discreetly withdrew to the door, to stand sentinel during the interview.

"How do you find yourself?" asked Pauline. "What is the matter? What has happened? Who is it that wounded you? What did you quarrel about? Does your physician allow you to talk? When did the affray take place? Where did it happen? Do you feel weak? Who is your physician?" and so on, with twenty more. Colas began at the very beginning, and took care to mention the pretty Julia in such a way as not to arouse any feeling of jealousy in his listener, and to let her see clearly that the Briton had insulted, attacked and nearly slain her devoted servant, through unfounded jealousy.

"Oh, the wretch!" cried she; "if he was a Frenchman, he should be sent off to the Bastille at once, but he is attached to the embassy. We must see a little what we can do." "There is nothing to see about, dear Pauline; when I meet him, I shall run him through, or he shall me."

"A pretty way to make me comfortable! If you were unfortunate, I should never survive it; and if you kill him, you would have to leave us, and for ever."

"The best thing to be done is, to order all the English away. I hear the cabinet are undecided between war and peace. Cardinal Bernis is for peace, and so is Prince Soubise. You must have a talk with them. We must declare war against these arrogant islanders." No sooner was war suggested, than it was approved of by both of them. Both rejoiced in the prospect of revenge, and perhaps it was pardonable in a lady so very much in love as she was, to be willing to destroy all England in revenge for her lover's blood having been shed.

The first time Pauline was alone with the prince, she led the conversation skilfully to the subject that engrossed her mind. "Do you know, prince," said she, "that young Rosier, the book-keeper, you were good enough to patronize, has sealed his devotion to you with his blood?"

"With his blood?" replied the astonished prince; "I have not heard a word of it." So Mademoiselle de Pons had to tell the whole story, omitting all mention of the pretty Julia, and of the blow on the nose, which was entirely too prosaic a circumstance to be admitted in a story wherein her lover figured as the hero. She gave the prince to understand that Colas's virtuous indignation had been weakened by the calumnies uttered against the prince and the marchioness; what the slanders were against him the prince was left to conjecture from what was said of Madame de Pompadour. Soubise was more particularly anxious to know what had been said about him. Pauline pretended confusion, as though she was ashamed to repeat anything so very improper; and the more obstinately she refused, the more was he convinced that the language of his slanders must have been horrible. "And can you make common cause with such men, prince?" cried Pauline, "with men who laugh our country to scorn, and so foully slander the most amiable of French noblemen, in the very heart of France?" The matter made so profound an impression on the prince, that he forgot to bestow on Pauline any of his unmeaning compliments. "But from whom do you learn all these particulars?" he asked. "Why, it is the talk of the whole city!" was the answer. "You, of course, would be the last to hear of it, as people would be unwilling, of course, that anything so unpleasant should reach your ears."

The prince covered her hand with grateful kisses. It is true he had been opposed to the war, because he was opposed to the Duke of Richelieu, who wanted the chief command of the army. But now his views were changed. To make sure of the facts, however, he sent for De Bonnaye, and ordered him to tell the whole story of the quarrel. The prince heard a confirmation of what Pauline had told him, but nothing that related to himself personally. He made further inquiries. De Bonnaye shrugged his shoulders and professed ignorance, but was malicious enough to hint, out of revenge against the Britons, that very probably he was spoken of still more abusively than the marchioness. The prince hurried to the Duc De Richelieu's.

"I have read your last memoir on the claims of England," said he, "and you have conquered me with the pen, as you will soon conquer the Britons with the sword. We must send the embassy home, and a declaration of war at their heels." The duke was astonished, but he embraced his late enemy, and they sat down to consider what was to be done to bring round the king and all the court. Prince Soubise undertook to win over Madame de Pompadour. This was no difficult task. The words of the Englishman, "there are a thousand prettier ones in London than your faded Pompadour," settled it at once.

Three days afterwards, the English embassy received their passports, and war was declared.

Mademoiselle de Pons received the first news of this important event from the mouth of the prince himself. She was ready to embrace him for joy. He saw her delight, and imagining it to proceed only from the overflowing of her affection for him, clasped her in his arms, and imprinted his first kiss on her lips. She checked him with a show of anger, which moderated his triumph but could not dispel his illusion. Colas received the news with joy. "Are you satisfied?" asked she, smiling.

"Surely!" was the answer, as he embraced her, "here is my all!—And yet, there is one thing—a patent of nobility. Then I shall be authorized to—" He did not finish the sentence, but Pauline understood him perfectly.

The next time the prince lay at her feet, begging pardon for his rudeness, and asking if he had forfeited all claim to her regard, "Prince!" said the cunning beauty, "your talents and virtues will always secure my regard, but—do you know, I have of late been forced to doubt your generosity!"

"For heaven's sake, explain!"

"You were prompt enough at dismissing the haughty Englishmen, but have never wasted a thought on the gallant youth who shed his blood for you. I thought it very probable you would recommend him to the king for a patent of nobility, knowing his courage and good behaviour—but it seems he has been forgotten."

"Do you mean Rosier?"

"I mean the man who stepped forward to defend your honour, when every one else was silent; the man who yet suffers from the wounds he received in your cause."

"How severely and unjustly you judge me! If you had only asked, I have told you that I have already taken steps for M. Rosier's obtaining not only a patent of nobility, but the cross of St. Louis, and perhaps the papers are signed already."

Mademoiselle de Pons, completely taken in, advanced a step nearer to the prince, and said, "Then I have really done you injustice! It is now my turn to ask pardon." A reconciliation followed of course, and the prince, when he left, was ten times more smitten with her than ever. He did not forget that he had purchased this reconciliation with a small bribe. He had never dreamed of doing anything for Rosier; but then, to win Pauline's smile, something must be done for that. The prince found it easy to persuade Madame de Pompadour that the handsome young man, who had defended her good name so gallantly, deserved the spurs of knighthood. And lo! the patent and the cross of St. Louis appeared. The book-keeper, with his children and his children's children, became one of France's nobles. A title of yesterday, however, is of small esteem, and a couple of louis will buy an old one at any time. A skilful herald, from the resemblance of the names Rosier and Rosni, traced his family back to that of the Duke of Sully, Baron de Rosni, and a family tree, whose roots sunk deep into the tenth century, grew up at once, for the washer-woman's son.

"What more do I want?" said he to himself, "I have plenty of ancestors—and nothing is wanting but the children and children's children so particularly specified in the patent. I must see how these are to be obtained, for this is a matter which heraldry cannot help me."

(To be concluded in our next.)

ORIGINAL FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LONDON.

Theatres—New pieces—Jack Sheppards—Knowles's new play.

For some time past the theatres have been, as worthy Master Shallow phrases it—"barren, marry, barren, barren!" Not that there has been any scarcity of "new pieces," and one or two of them have not been altogether destitute of merit and pleasantry in a small way, though bearing about the same proportion to the nobler and more permanent creations of the drama that a mushroom bears to an oak. The great majority, however, cannot be classed in the family of healthy fungi; but are rank, noxious, baleful—the unwholesome excrescences of weak, spurious, stagnant intellects. There are no less than five "Jack Sheppards," the discreditable offshoots of a discreditable "romance" (!) by the author of "Rookwood"—exhibited, at the present time, at an equal number of minor theatres. Doubtless you will, in due time, have one or two of those marceaux transmitted across the Atlantic, when you will have an opportunity afforded you of sympathizing with heroic housebreakers and tender prostitutes, and of witnessing brutal murders and daring burglaries perpetrated, "in prime style," by characters every way worthy of such actions. Pierce passions and great crimes, and their fatal and retributive consequences, have ever formed the staple of the drama; but a deliberate exhibition of all that is mean, miserable, loathly, base, vile, and monstrous in man, is certainly a new mode of "holding," as it were, the mirror up to nature."

But enough of such despicable, tough, poisonous trash. Let us rather hasten to, and dwell upon, the healthy emanations of higher minds for nobler ends.

Two new five-act plays, the one entitled "Love," by James Sheridan Knowles, the other, "The Sea-Captain, or the Birth-right," by Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer, have been produced at nearly the same time, and both, we rejoice to say, have met with most unequivocal and decided success. This is gratifying, and as it should be. True, a few waspish partisans are endeavouring to elevate Knowles by depreciating Bulwer, and vice versa; but why should this be? Is not the world wide enough for us all? Let them study and imbine themselves with the spirit of our Uncle Toby's address to the fly. Success to both! There is little fear of their jostling each other in the boundless world of nature and of fashion; and though a man may feel a preference, it is not to say that he "loves Bulwer less because he loves Knowles (as a dramatist) more."

In noticing their respective efforts it is but just and proper to give the first place to the veteran author of Virginia. Knowles has secured to himself a high place in the ranks of British dramatic literature. The breath of popular applause, or the caprice of criticism, can now but little affect his station. All know that he has many faults, and deficiencies not a few; but then he has beauties and capabilities to make you forget both. Who thinks of his inverted phraseology, his abortive attempts at humour, and his laboured epigrammatism, when they get into the full sweep of his pathos and his passion? And what man, for many a year, has made, in the noble province of the drama, so many and so good contributions to the national stock of intellectual enjoyment? True, he sometimes nods—say sleeps, but so does Shakespeare; and his "Begger of Bethnal Green," and "Brien Borome," are to his better efforts what the "Comedy of Errors," and "Love's Labour Lost," are to the more wondrous creations of the unapproachable bard. But it would require pages to enter into a disquisition on his merits and demerits—the former being in the proportion of ten to one—and, for the present, his present performance suffices.

Knowles's new play bears the brief and vague, though still attractive, title of "Love." "Love and Pride" would have been more to the purpose, had not Bulwer hit on that before in his Lady of Lyons; and, in truth, the relative positions of the principal parties in the two pieces are not very dissimilar, the peasant standing in pretty much the same position, though not at such an immeasurable distance, to the merchant's proud daughter in the one, that the serf does to the lovely and haughty countess in the other. We must, however, give a brief outline of the plot, studding and relieving the details thereof with such gems, in the shape of extracts, as come in the way.

The Duke of Carinthia, it appears, has a most fair daughter, the Countess of Eppenstein; he has also a handsome, valiant youth about his court, named Huon, who, although born a serf, has been reared, nurtured, and educated as a gentleman. The old duke, being long past the hey-day of his blood, has become oblivious that Cupid is a potent divinity; and never having had the good fortune to read Burns, to the effect that

"Love will venture in,
Where it dare nae wad be seen,"

he most indiscreetly appoints the said Huon instructor or tutor to his fair daughter. They hear music and read poetry together—they are both young—they have souls and eyes, and the natural consequences ensue—they look and love. The passion of the countess is repressed by pride, and that of Huon restrained by the deepest respect, and sense of his degraded station; not that he himself acknowledges the degradation, for he has the soul of a freeman, but he is fully sensible of the light in which he is viewed by others, and of the hopeless distance between himself and the lady of his love. When first discovered, Huon is reading to the countess. The book he reads is rather liberal for the age and country, and ventures to vindicate the common rights of men. The proud and sensitive, because self-conscious countess, warns the serf to "see her station," when he spiritedly, yet affectingly replies—

Huon. "I cannot, for the fair
O'erstepping height before.

Countess. What height?

Huon. Thyself!

That towerest 'bove thy station!—Pardon me!

O! wouldst thou set thy rank before thyself?

Wouldst thou be honoured for thyself or that?

Rank that exalts its wearer doth degrade

Riches impoverish that divide respect.

O! to be cherished for oneself alone!

To owe the love that cleaves to us to nought

That fortune's summer—winter—gives or takes!

To know that while we wear the heart and mind,

Feature and form high heaven endow'd us with,

Let the storm pelt us, or fair weather warn,

We shall be lov'd! Krags from their thrones cast down,

Have blessed their fate that they were valued for Themselves and not their stations, when some knee,

That hardly bowed to them in plebeian

Has kissed the dust before them, stripped of all!"

The countess feels the truth and beauty of those sentiments, though she dares not acknowledge that she does so, and, to hide her love, carries her affected scorn to such a height as to humble the hapless and hopeless serf to the earth.

In the second act of the play a hawking excursion takes place; in the course of the sport a violent storm comes on, and Huon, taking shelter under a tree, is struck and stunned by the lightning. The smothered affection of the countess bursts forth; she is surrounded by close observers, and a few rather unequivocal expressions partially betray the secret she is so desirous to conceal, and creates suspicions which are not to be lulled by her subsequent affectation and indifference after the danger is over.

As soon as the duke is informed of this, the purlind but violent old gentleman becomes outrageous, and, not having studied the book above alluded to on the common rights of man, he determines, as the easiest way of settling the matter, to kill his serf at once, but is restrained by a wiser head than his own reminding him that such a procedure might kill his daughter also. He then fixes upon banishment, but is told that love may cause his daughter to share that banishment. Sadly puzzled at this, but determined on something desperate and deadly, he at last resolves upon matrimony, and determines to oblige Huon to wed Catherine, the daughter of a serf, in order that the countess's love may be changed into hatred.

The hapless Huon is then summoned, and made acquainted with his lord's will and pleasure, with which, however, he resolutely refuses to comply. The duke then very deliberately unsheathes his sword, and gives Huon the choice of death or matrimony. He chooses the former, and desires his master to strike home. At this point the countess enters unperceived, and the duke finding that his serf rather courts death than shuns it, does not feel at all inclined to oblige him with his quietus, but allows him an hour for "calm!" (gy.) "reflection," threatening him at the same time that a bench and oar in the galleys shall be his portion in case of refusal, and then makes his exit. Huon calls after him—

— "My lord, come back!

My lord! what now my mind, be sure 'twill be
At th' end of the hour! of the day! of my life! My lord!
He does not hear, or will not! Most sweet cause
Of most insupportable misery
Wouldst thou not weep at this! *Couldst thou look on
And keep pride sitting in thy woman's eye—
The proper throne of pity—which for me,
The melting queen has yet refused to fill;
But to a stern usurper all abandoned!*
Wouldst thou not weep?"

The countess then interposes, and inquires the cause of this violent outburst of grief and passion. Huon hands her the paper containing him to Catherine to read. The conflict which takes place in the bosom of the haughty lady is terrible. At last, after a violent struggle, she gives way, and exclaims—

— "Huon, I die!

Huon. Heavens!—Mercy!

Countess. (bursting into tears) It is over!

Do not speak to me! Let my tears flow on!

Huon. Flow they for me?

Countess. I told you not to speak.

Huon. Sweet heaven! your voice is tears;

Your looks are tears; your air, your motions, all

Are tears! floods! floods! to those that course your cheeks,

And fall more bright than diamonds on the hands

Which now I clasp to thee in supplication,

That thou wilt deign this once vouchsafe me audience,

To give my fatal passion vent before thee—

For years pent up within my wretched breast—

And then I'm mate for ever!

Countess. Huon, peace!

I know thou lov'st me.

Huon. Thou know'st it, dost thou?

And say'st it!—and mildly say'st it!

Not with a tone of scorn—not with a threat,

Not accent yet of cold indifference

For the poor serf who, body, soul, and all,

Not being worth a tittle of thee, yet dares

To love thee!—dares to wish for thee!—yes, wish,

Although he knows thee out of reach of him

As the sun!—as the stars—a million, million times

Beyond the sun! The poor despised serf,

Despised of himself!—of these—of every one—

Thou see'st he loves thee, and then deign'st to say it!

Say it with pity, with most tender pity!

Behold! 'st him kneeling at thy feet, and know'st

The passion throws him there, and suffer'st him

To stay there!—Let him die there! Let him die

At thy feet!"

This is worthy of the author of the "Hunchback"—of the author of the scene between Julia and Clifford. There may not, it is true, be much of measured melody in the versification, but it is instinct with life and passion. Huon speaks like a man who is thinking more of his mistress than of how many syllables go to the formation of a line of blank verse.

The countess, in order to save the life of Huon, exacts a promise from him that he will obey her in whatever she may command. The devoted lover pledges his word, and she requires of him his signature to the paper, and assent to the marriage with Catherine. Huon is thunder-stricken, but his pledge is given, and the marriage is solemnized in the strictest privacy, by a monk of the countess's selection, no one being present (the duke has been seized with a sudden fit of illness) except Huon and the closely veiled bride and bridesmaid. Immediately after the completion of the ceremony, Huon mounts horse, leaves a widowed bride behind him, gallops no one knows whither, and the "places that have known him know him no more." The curtain falls on the death of the old duke and the despair of the countess.

Between the third and fourth act, a considerable space of time is supposed to have elapsed, and Time has wrought his usual changes. Huon, on his departure, had entered the service of the Empress of Austria, and by courage and conduct had surmounted all the obstacles which lay between him and fame and honour. He is now the favourite knight of the empress, and travels in her suite to the scenes of his love and degradation, in order to be present at a tournament which has to take place, in which, by the will of the late duke, the most successful knight is entitled to claim the hand of the countess. Some fine scenes ensue. The change in Huon is well described by the countess.

"He comes! Who stops him thus untimely! Oh,
How changed he is! The fiery hardboiled
Of the life he hath of late made consort of,
Hath given another spirit to his eyes
His face is cast anew, as circumstance
Could alter Nature's modelling, and weak
Improvement on her mould. Is that the man
Was once my father's serf, and I did scorn?
Fell ever at my wayward from that brow?
Or stoop'd that knee, for me, to kiss the ground?
Would they do it now! Fell ever at my feet
That form, as prostrate as the hand of death
Had struck it to the floor? 'Twould take that hand
To lay it now there—and a wave of mine
Had done it once! If he confesses hold
Of any other, never shall he learn
His hold of me! but if he strives in love,
I bless my stars I have the 'vantage ground."

A noble scene follows. The countess elicits from Huon a confession of his past and present love for her, and then at last bursts forth the long-stifled avowal.

—"Twas heart for heart!
I loved thee ever! Yes, the passion now
Thrills on the woman's tongue, the girl's had told thee
Had I been bold as fond!"

This candid confession, which the lady doubtless anticipates will throw her lover into most unequivocal raptures, is met by Huon, whose secret marriage hangs heavy on him, with the chilling word "misery!" The countess, who, having her own reasons for thinking little of this obstacle, and forgetting that Huon is not in her secret, is stung to madness by his dejection and supposed coldness. She reproaches him with being false to his vows to her, with entertaining a secret passion for the empress, and, (most unworthily,) with the baseness of his birth. This arouses his strong yet gentle nature, and he finely says—

—"Madam! men's natures are
Their blood—they have no other, high or low.
If base the current hitherto of mine,
It ceased with me. Born in thy father's house
A serf, I left it one, to seek my fortune,
Make it or mar it, to my own right arm,
No other patron than my own right arm,
And my own heart and head to guide and nerve it;
And with their help I see that house again,
An independent, self-exalted man;
While many a son, who left a noble home,
With blood untainted for a thousand years,
Returns to it no better than he left it.
Is my blood base?"

Countess.—No, Huon! mine was base
To let me call it so.
And then she touchingly adds—
Alas! alas!
And hast no better welcome for my love
Than that sad word thou spok'st?"

At the commencement of the fifth act, the heart-broken countess seeks an interview with the empress, and, while the tournament for her hand is going on behind the scenes, lays her coronet at the empress's feet, and avows her intention of ending her life in a nunnery. Before taking leave, however, of worldly passions and feelings, she reproaches the empress with having withdrawn from her the affections of Huon. The empress answers in rather an equivocal strain, declaring that it is her intention that Huon should marry. The countess declares that he shall not, and, at last, on the Prince of Milan's entering to claim her hand as the successful competitor in the lists, she owns that she is married to Huon, unknown to him—that his veiled bride was Catherine the countess, instead of Catherine the serf. Of course an abundance of joy, gratitude, etc. etc. is the result of this declaration. Huon is elevated in rank by the empress, and the piece concludes amid an overflow of love and happiness, to the satisfaction of all parties, the audience included, who testified their sense of the pleasure they had derived from the production by the most rapturous approval, and uproarious vociferations for the author. Mr. Knowles, however, seeing how matters were likely to go, had, like a discreet man, effected a retreat from the theatre, thus escaping the necessity of bowing and returning thanks for the obligation he had conferred.

THE SEA-CAPTAIN, OR THE BIRTH-RIGHT

Such is the title of the author of Pelham's new production. The scene is laid in the south-west of England, on the romantic shores of Devon, about the time when

The new world's marvels made of old men heroes,
And young men dreamers!"

and the plot, which is rather winding and intricate, is worked out with much skill, and considerable knowledge of stage effect. Indeed, whatever may be Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer's deficiencies in other respects, a want of acquaintance with that somewhat mechanical but very essential requisite, stage effect, is not one of them. His incidents are for the most part judiciously managed, and his characters grouped with the eye of an artist. In his plays, and still more so in his novels, we are dragged restlessly over improbabilities, ay, and impossibilities too, by the mere management and fascination of the story. In the present instance, the action hinges upon the doings of an always unpleasing and repulsive character, whether in reality or imagination—an unnatural mother. In so far, Sir Edward has been unfortunate in the selection of this portion of his materials. An unnatural mother is the greatest discord in nature; and however circumstances may plead in extenuation, no skill can effectively relieve, no poetry spiritualize the deformity of her character.

We have not space for the details of the plot, but it may suffice to say that the Lady of Arundel, in early life, contracts a secret marriage far beneath her station. Her husband is murdered by a pirate named Gausson; and the boy, after an attempt on his life also by a poor relative, (in whose way he stands,) or as he himself describes himself—

—"A beggarly poor cousin!
Up from the cradle, a poor beggarly cousin!
Batt for my lord—convenience for my lady—
Jibe for the lackey."

is brought up in secret by an old priest. A wayfaring mariner visits their dwelling; his tales of distant climes beguile the boy, and he leaves the priest's quiet roof for the ocean, and eventually becomes a sea-captain. In the meantime, the Lady of Arundel has contracted another marriage in her own sphere of life; her lord dies, and leaves her a son, on whom she dotes, and whom she brings up before the world as the rightful heir, to the exclusion of her first-born. Of her second son she says—

"I have high hopes for Ashdale—bright desires—
Wild schemes—the last son of a race whose lords
Have sought their mates beside the glory of kings,
He stands before me as a dream of glory
Haunting some young ambition; and mine eyes
Pierce to the future, when those bones are dust,
And see him princelike of the lion tribe,
Whose swords and coronals gleam round the throne.
The guardian stars of the imperial isle.
Kings shall revere his mother."

In the course of events, therefore, when the pretensions of her eldest son are likely to reveal her early indiscretion, and blast the hopes of her doting, the unnatural passion is developed, and various violent attempts are made to obtain possession of and destroy the proof of Norman's birth. In a moment of self-abandonment, however, produced by her first-born's noble conduct, she owns him for her son—retraction, or the desire of retraction comes too late—and the "proud Ashdale" is suddenly converted into the "younger brother." This his haughty, or rather petty spirit cannot brook, and matters have a very stormy appearance, when every thing is at last satisfactorily settled by the signal generosity of Norman, who waives his claim in favour of his younger brother. This sketch gives but a very faint idea of the intricacies of a plot in which, in addition to the above materials, three great instruments of mischief,—a priest, a pirate, and a pretty young lady—are mingled. There are also ruins, moonlight, murder, intended assassination, and other exciting causes, to keep alive the attention of an audience, and in this at least the author succeeded to admiration, the applause being most hearty and enthusiastic.

But it would be unjust to infer that this was all at which he aimed, or in which he succeeded. The play abounds in beautiful and striking passages. The hero, too, is a fine, gallant fellow; but it must be admitted that the heroine is a rather commonplace heroine; that is, she is a miracle of beauty and virtue, but, alas! somewhat insipid withal.

We must, however, find space for an extract or two; and first,

A SAILOR'S LOVE.

"Lady,

Ye who have dwelt upon the sordid land,
Amidst the everlasting gloomy war
Of poverty with wealth—ye cannot know
How we, the wild sons of the ocean, mock
At men who fret out life with care of gold.
O the fierce sickness of the soul—to see
Love bought and sold—and all the heaven-roofed temple
Of God's great globe, the money-change of Mammon!
I dream of love, enduring faith, a heart
Mingled with mine—a deathless heritage
Which I can take unscathed to the stars,
When the Great Father calls his children home;—
And in the midst of this Elysian dream,
Lo, gold—the demon Gold!—alas! the creeds
Of the false land!"

In the following pleasant invitation, the worthy captain, with professional forgetfulness, altogether overlooks the unpleasant effects of "gales" at sea upon young ladies

"My bark shall be our home —
The gale shall chant our bridal melodies;
The stars that light the angel palaces
Of air, our lamps — our floor the crystal deep
Studded with sapphires sparkling as we pass —
Our roof all heaven."

In addition to his sea-picture, Norman gives the following glowing description of the south-western portion of the new world

"Nay, he soothed, and think
Of the bright lands within the western main,
Where we will build our home, what time the seas
Wear the gaze;—there the broad palm-tree shades
The soft and delicate light of skies as fair
As those that sleep on Eden;—Nature there,
Like a gay spendthrift in his flush of youth,
Flings her whole treasure in the lap of Time
On turfs by fancies trod, the eternal Flora
Spreads all her blooms; and from a lake-like sea
Woods to her odorous haunts the western wind!
While, circling round and upward from the boughs,
Golden with fruits that lure the jovous birds,
Melody, like a happy soul released,
Hangs in the air, and from invisible plumes
Shakes sweetness down."

But our space prevents the indulgence of further quotation. At the fall of the curtain, there was a tremendous call for "Bulwer!" When in this absurd, vulgar, and annoying custom to have an end! In the present instance, however, it was quite impossible for the gods in the galleries to resist the temptation of seeing a baronet bow from the boxes.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Fall of Aztlan, and other poems. By A. Alexander, Esq., Washington. Published by W. M. Morrison.

This poem, as we learn from the preface, supposes the existence of a comparatively enlightened people upon the western shores of our continent, at a period long anterior to its discovery by Columbus, and in a locality which, though in other respects entirely arbitrary and fanciful, is not materially different from that to which the inquiries of Humboldt and others seem to have determined the original residence of the Texique and Azteque tribes. These traditional fathers of the aboriginal races of Central America are supposed to have come from the north, impelled probably by some great civil or natural catastrophe, and to have established themselves in that beautiful region, where they founded and bequeathed a name to the present city of Mexico. More recent inquiries have traced these apparent vestiges of ancient civilization in other and widely distant parts of the same continent; and the classical name of Aztlan, or Aztlan, has been transferred, at will, from the vicinity of the gulfs of California and Mexico to the shores of the northern lakes. Upon these dim traditions our author has founded his poem; and he has truly displayed no ordinary degree of creative power and poetical art. His versification, though irregular, is melodious; and he occasionally displays a mastery of language not often equalled. We assure our readers that this work is infinitely superior to nine-tenths of the volumes of original poetry that have appeared during the last five years. The following we give as a specimen of the versification:

"And they have gone—they twain—their only guide
Love, the all-trusting, or the pathless tide:
And if 'tis easier for the faithful heart
To dare, to die—do anything than part,
Safe shall they roam; for they at least shall be Spared from that last, that worst necessity;
Not all unblest to find, where'er they range.
The heart still changeless where all else is change!
And though its passion through its dim-eyed lore,
Their prosperous course to happier climes explore,
We will not urge the theme with fruitless quest;
Enough to know they lived, and loved, and rest!
Life's chief contentments in their lot fulfilled,
The heart which throbb'd, the hand which toil'd are still'd,
And all their fate beyond to fame unknown,
Must rest as darkly as must once our own.
But that fair coast from which they urged their flight,
How sank on Aztlan the fatal night!
Did one wild roar the sudden doom declare
Of myriads waking to a brief despair,
Or swelling floods devolve their gradual strength,
Where hope might strive awhile, to sink at length!
All this remains untold—the sudden deep
Rolls dark and voiceless o'er their final sleep,
And vain the hope from earth, or wind, or wave,
To wrest th' ill-dreaded secret of the grave,
Till death itself those solemn truths unspare,
Whose fateful shadows idly mock us here!"

Memoir of the late Charles Matthews. By Mrs. Matthews. Vols. third and fourth. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

The first two volumes of this work were given to the American public some five or six months since, and we took occasion at that time to express our very favourable opinion of the work. It abounds in anecdote, interesting reminiscence, exciting incident, and delightful sketches of character. The anecdotes of Ingleton are immitably amusing. The letters of Matthews, and the whole tenor of his life, give a view of his character truly honourable to his memory. Mrs. Matthews has executed her biographical task with much ability, and left us little to wish for in addition to the ample details she has presented. There is no species of biography more instructive to the student of human nature than that of individuals connected with the stage. The "Life of Matthews" must always occupy a conspicuous rank among works of this class.

The Governors. By Lady Blessington. In two vols. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

We look upon this as much the best novel that has yet appeared from the pen of Lady Blessington. Some of the scenes are quite sprightly and entertaining, and the characters are life-like and neatly sketched. We have never been among the admirers of this lady's writings, but if she continues to give such evidences of progressive improvement as we find in the work before us, we do not doubt we shall in time regard them as very tolerable.

Tales of the Grotesque and Archaic. By Edgar A. Poe. In two vols. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

The title of this volume faithfully characterizes the contents. To the lovers of imaginative writing, it may be commended as one of the most extraordinary and original works of the day. Mr. Poe is a man of true genius. His sketch entitled "Ligeia," in this work, is quite equal to any of the minor prose pieces of Bulwer. We have not had time to pursue the whole of the work, but that which we have read has been sufficient to convince us that the book is a good book, and one honourable to American talent. We commend it heartily to the public.

Mrs. Mason's republication of British Reviews and Magazines.

We have frequently had occasion to call the attention of the public to those admirable reprints of the best British Magazines and Reviews. They continue to be issued in handsome style and with remarkable promptitude and regularity; and we are glad to learn that they enjoy a widely-extended and prosperous circulation. The late numbers of Blackwood's Magazine and Bentley's Miscellany have been unusually rich. The plates in the American edition of the latter work are quite equal to those in the London.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received from a Philadelphia correspondent a long article in reply to our remarks upon the new Opera-house. We must decline publishing them, for they waste the defects of bad argument and bad writing. "Flutes," who dates from Washington, is assured that his communications will be acceptable if they are sprightly without malice and personality. The fashionable intelligence to which he alludes, as we have reason to believe, unfounded. "T" is informed that we have already devoted our columns liberally to the discussion of the subject of "international copyright." He mistakes us widely in supposing us inimical, in the remotest degree, to the measure. We shall have no occasion for the contributions, in verse, of "Y. R. M." "Hyperion," "Schiller," and "B. Z."—The "Patron and his Vassal" is to be dismissed. The story is redeemed neither by its wit nor its truth. We have not attended the lectures to which "O." directs our attention, but have no doubt of their popularity.—We welcome back to our columns the author of "Yankee Notions." His sketches are always admirable.—"S. T." shall hear from us in our next.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1839.

Hotels.—Our office is located within the vicinity of two of the best hotels in this country; and, if we may take the concurrent testimony of foreigners, anywhere else—we allude to the Astor House and the American Hotel. The first of these establishments is still kept by that trio of good fellows, Boyden, Coleman and Stetson; and the latter by Mr. Cozzens, of blessed West Point memory. Correspondents frequently inquire to which of these houses we give the preference, and the object of this paragraph is merely to say—to neither. They are both as good as can be, and are both generally crowded. All we would recommend is simply this: when you find one full, try the other; and if both have as many as can be accommodated, try somewhere else. This city has many good hotels. The Globe, kept by Mr. Blanchard, is a superior house, equal to either of the above; and so is the Waverley, kept by Mr. Reid. The City-Hotel is likewise a first-rate concern; and there are others in New-York as good as heart would desire. This is the case also in our sister cities. There's Sanderson's Merchants' Hotel in Philadelphia. Did you ever put up at Sanderson's? If not, when next you go to Philadelphia, stop there. You will find it everything as you could wish it. Warm beds, clean beds, aired sheets, white as snow, comfortable rooms, attentive servants, an excellent table, choice wines, and the most considerate and polite of hosts. Besides, Sanderson has a neat cab, of his own invention too, to drive you to any quarter of the town you may desire to visit. We say go to Sanderson's—although we like Head's Hotel, which deserves its wide-spread popularity. Then there's the Etaw House at Baltimore—Gadsby's at Washington, and the Tremont at Boston, all capital houses. But we have not space to mention all the other establishments in the country, so put a period to this paragraph with the promise to refer again to the subject one of these days—after our travelling correspondents have had an opportunity of testing the accuracy of the information given above.

National prejudices.—We learn from the Boston Transcript that Dr. O. W. Holmes has recently delivered a lecture before the Franklin Institute of that city, on the subject of national prejudice. It was entertaining and instructive, brilliant, and satirical, abounding in sterling good sense, pleasant rally, and chaste eloquence. After alluding to the prejudice against other nations which existed among the ancient Greeks and Romans, and remarking that white men of the present day paint the devil black, while black men paint him white, the lecturer said that as time would only permit him to amplify on a single instance of this ridiculous folly, he would cite England and France, and confine his observations to those two countries. The English and French were so near each other that, like two bulls, they were always quarrelling. The English always spoke of the French with the utmost contempt. An English writer said, sometime previous to the French Revolution, "I hate the French because they are slaves, and wear wooden shoes." But when Frenchmen, rising in their might, thought fit to cast off their shackles, and sweep away some of the gaudy trinkets that surrounded and oppressed them, John Bull seemed to hate them with more than a double hatred. The Republic found as little favour with England as it did with the more despotic powers of Europe. They still maintained that the French were their natural enemies. The doctor believed that Americans inherited a share of these prejudices, and had no doubt that many of his well-meaning countrymen suppose that a Frenchman is a man who wears frogs on his sartout and eats them; that he wears a wig, and is generally very old; that the Englishman, who is a tremendous fellow with his fist, always knocks him down, and is sure to make him fall flat on his back; that he can fiddle, cook, and dance, and lures his want of linen by a profusion of ruffles! Dr. Holmes proceeded in a most amusing style, illustrating his subject by apposite anecdotes and allusions. Why do not some of our societies invite the doctor to repeat his lecture in this city!

Album writing.—That species of bore, known as an album, appears to be going out of fashion. There was a time, when it was unsafe for a man suspected of literature to appear among ladies of a certain hue and age. Now the victim is let off with an autograph. The change is to be commended.

Mr. Simmons.—The lectures of this gentleman at Clinton-Hall upon Shakspeare, have, we are glad to perceive, been eminently successful. Mr. Simmons is unequalled as an elocutionist, and as a writer of pure, vigorous English—of "English undefiled," we know not his superior in the country.

Winter fashions.—A fair correspondent asks us for the winter fashions. We can only refer to the Court Gazette for an answer to her request. That authentic journal of the latest date says:—"Short cloaks for the evening are now confirmed in public favour. They are generally of light colours, and trimmed with fur or swansdown. We have seen some with a little flounce of the same material as the cloak itself. Evening dresses are beginning to be trimmed with narrow fur, generally ermine—swansdown is frequently seen. Velvet épinglé is much seen. We lately saw a dress of this material trimmed with lace and satin, the corsage à point, also trimmed with satin, and the sleeves with the same, and engagés of point lace. Bonnets of épinglé velvet are now the most fashionable wear; they are trimmed principally with plumes of fancy colours; edged with different colours from that of the plume itself. Sometimes there are three or even four shades of colour in the plumes. Flowers are also much seen on bonnets; they are worn long, descending at the sides to the shoulders. Lace is also worn: and the Victoria bonnet is of velvet, covered with lace. A new mode for evening head-dresses is a turban formed of white and black lace veils; they are formed into various shapes, and are trimmed with flowers. When they have been worn once or twice the work is undone, and the veil is just as serviceable as before. Lace scarfs are employed in the same way. We spoke so fully last week respecting the winter fashions, that we have but little novelty to describe at present. Ball dresses for the winter have not altogether been decided on. The season is as yet too early; when the town begins to fill, we shall be able to speak fully on this important head."

M. Alexandre.—We invite the particular attention of our readers to the letter, which we publish in another column of this day's paper, from M. Alexandre Vatemare, the distinguished ventriloquist and cosmopolitan. The system of exchange, of which he has the honour to be the founder, has proved highly successful in Europe, and M. Alexandre has derived from it a far more lasting and enviable reputation than he could have derived from any professional display. If the friendship of the good, the great, and the wise of the old world afford a man any claim to the good-will and respect of our citizens, then is M. Alexandre entitled to a patient and candid hearing. He was the friend and favourite of Walter Scott, of Goethe, and of Retsch, and brings from their testimonies to his worth of the most complimentary description. Alexandre does not look to pecuniary emolument in his efforts to introduce his system here. His labours are obviously disinterested. We sincerely hope, that Congress will bestow upon the subject the attention which it merits; and we trust that M. Alexandre, should he visit Washington, will meet with those courtesies, which are his due, both as a stranger and a man of sterling worth and intelligence.

Victoria and Prince Albert.—The subject of the engagement of Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg and Queen Victoria is, of course, the prevailing matter of gossip in the English prints. The accredited story is, that the parents of this youth, with piousworthiness, placed him when a mere boy under the care of the Duchess of Kent at Kensington palace, and that, as a natural consequence, a youthful intimacy sprang up between him and the future sovereign. At the coronation of Victoria, Albert was on the spot, but his hopes had not yet ripened into confirmation. He left England, and travelled on the continent. On returning home he found a present from the queen awaiting him. It was her likeness, splendidly executed by Chalon. Putting this and that together, our "young Lochinvar" determined to be off to England and there to pop the question. He did so, was accepted, and now, as it is authentically asserted, the nuptials will be celebrated in May next, when Albert will undoubtedly be the most envied young man in Europe, among those who find their happiness in wealth, title, rank and equipage.

Regulation of omnibuses.—We learn from the newspapers, that the omnibuses of this city have been recently presented as a nuisance by the grand jury. They are truly, in many respects, worthy of the name; and a thorough and efficient reform ought certainly to be made in the present system. A perfect contempt for the convenience both of passengers and pedestrians appears to be manifested by the drivers of these cumbersome vehicles. When the streets are covered with mud, the driver, instead of bringing up his carriage to the curb-stone, independently stops in the middle of the street, and suffers you to wade through the puddles in order to obtain admission. Above all, the custom of racing should be stopped. We are glad that the grand jury have taken this matter in hand. We hope proper measures will be taken to prevent these superfluous abuses.

Moore, Knowles, and Bulwer.—We have been indebted to the "New World" newspaper for the first American editions of the recent works of these distinguished authors. We give to-day literal extracts from the plays of the last two. Moore's poem of "Alciphron" appears to be a paraphrase merely of "The Epicurean." It is beautifully versified, and not inferior as a poem to the best productions of the author. What will our publishers say to these cheap newspaper republications of the best current literature of the day? Will they not join with us in the petition for an international copyright law?

Miss Vanderhoff.—We see that the newspapers all over the Union are copying the productions of this young lady, that have appeared in the Mirror. Her verses have been extensively popular.

Holidays.—The holidays are near at hand; and the usual preparations are making for their celebration. The good old customs will be maintained in all their spirit.

NATURE IS OUR MOTHER.

A SONG—THE WORDS BY T. CAMBRIA JONES—THE MUSIC BY GEORGE H. THOMSON.

ANDANTE-LEGATO.

Nature is our mother— She is pure and free—When fond hearts love each other, Ne'er part them, let them be. Lean thy head up on me—Let thy true heart beat to mine, And ev'ry pulse shall tell thee mine is thine, and only thine. Yes, ev'ry pulse shall tell thee mine is thine, and on-ly thine.

3d—Nature is our mother, Ever good and kind; She bids us love each other, With a firm unchanging mind. When hearts tarry single, They but wither, fret and pine; For hearts were made to mingle, Dearest, thus like thine and mine—Yes, hearts, etc.

MISCELLANY.

FROM THIS HOUR THE PLEDGE IS GIVEN.

From this hour the pledge is given,
From this hour my soul is thine:
Come what will, from earth or heaven,
We'll or wo, thy fate be mine.
When the proud and great stood by thee,
None dared thy rights to spurn;
And, when now they're false and fly thee,
Shall I, too, basely turn?
No;—what'er the fires that try thee,
In the same this heart shall burn.
Though the sea, where thou embarkest,
Offers now no friendly shore,
Light may come where all looks darkest,
Hope hath life, when life seems o'er.
And of those past ages dreaming,
When glory deck'd thy brow,
Oh! fondly think, though seeming
So fall'n and clouded now,
Thou'lt again break forth, all beaming—
None so bright, so blest as thou!

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE REVOLUTION.—"Sally St. Clair was a beautiful, dark-eyed, creole girl. The whole treasury of her love was freely poured out to Sergeant Jasper, who, on one occasion, had the good fortune to save her life. The prospects of their separation almost maddened her. To sever her long jetty ringlets from her exquisitely formed head, to dress in male attire, to enroll in the corps to which he belonged, and follow his fortunes in the wars, unknown to him, was a resolution no sooner conceived than taken. . . . In the camp she attracted no particular attention except on the night before the battle, when she was noticed bending over his couch like a good and gentle spirit, as if listening to his dreams. . . . The camp was surprised and a fierce conflict ensued. The lovers were side by side in the thickest of the fight; but, in endeavouring to turn away a lance aimed at the heart of Jasper, the poor girl received it in her own, and fell bleeding at his feet. After the victory, her name and sex were discovered, and there was not a dry eye in the corps when Sally St. Clair was laid in her grave, in a little green shady nook that looked as if it had been stolen out of Paradise, not far from the river Santos."—Tales of Marston Men.

A GRANDFATHER.—An editor without anything in his head or the pigeon-hole, with the devil at his back, singing out "copy."

THE PEOPLE GETTING TOO LEARNED.—We understand that a memorial from a number of respectable individuals in the parish of O—, in East Lothian, was lately presented to the heritors, requesting the use of the school-room, at certain hours, when it was otherwise unoccupied, for public lectures. To this reasonable request the heritors thought proper to give a decided refusal, the grounds of which may readily be guessed at when we mention that one of the two persons who constituted the meeting at which the memorial was received, was the minister of the parish, who, a few days previous, was heard to remark, when talking with another on the proposed lectures, that "he thought the people were getting far too learned." If by being "too learned" the reverend gentleman means that the people are beginning to see through the hollow professions and selfish designs of the state clergy, he is probably not very far wrong.—Scotsman.

BOZ.—At the dinner of the Artists' Benevolent Society, Sir David Wilkie in a single sentence said more in praise of Dickens, and more to the purpose, than any of his thousand-and-one critics. "He has made," said Sir David, "a kind of Doris of our vernacular." This is a kind of picturing in which we scarcely expected the great artist to excel. But, in truth, Wilkie is a good speaker: we cannot describe him as eloquent; but he has a firm, fine voice, sufficient self-possession, a clear and emphatic enunciation, and, of course, a large and comprehensive mind. The materials which make an orator he, therefore, has; and, it is more than probable that, if he had been early called upon to exercise this art, instead of that of which he is a master, he would have arrived at distinction in it. So true it is, according to the highest authority, that "Genius is nothing more than a large mind accidentally directed into some particular channel."

SEDLING AND AFFECTION.—We find the following sentence in an exchange paper. It describes the heroine of a story, who had just recovered from a fainting fit:—"And rising to her feet with a majestic mien, and a smile of angelic sweetness, she seated herself by the tea-table, and performed the honours of her uncle's table to the satisfaction of all concerned."

MANNERS.—In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries good manners required that persons of different sexes, when invited to parties, should sit down in couples, and that each couple should have one plate between them. In families one goblet was deemed sufficient for all, and St. Bernard was disinherited by his father, who was affected by the leprosy, for having wiped the edge of the goblet before he drank.

WHAT CONSUMMATE FOLLY.—Half a dozen brothers, four uncles, and a gray-headed father, trying to stop a young girl from getting married to the man she loves, and who loves her, just as if rope-ladders were out of date and all the horses in the world spavined!

ARTISTICAL JOKE.—When Etty and Stanfield were at Venice, it is said that the former, in a fit of abstraction, looking at one of the palaces, fell into a canal, upon which the wife there called him Canal Etty. Stanfield, who pulled him out, they called Dragonetti. When George the Fourth had determined to make Sir John Leicester a peer, he asked, "What title he wished to take?" "De Talley," was the reply. "Not so," said the king, "call him Lord de Tableau," alluding to his great patronage of art.

THE SCHOOLMASTER ABROAD.—The Vermont schoolmasters are up to a thing or two in the way of their duty. One of them lately flogged an unruly damsel attending his school, and to whom he was engaged. He said, "though he kissed her as a lover, it was his duty to lick her as her tutor." He'll catch it when she comes to monopolize the "unmentionables."

DICTIONARY.

Society.—So as I, eat ye.—This derivation is at once obvious and striking. There can be no bonds of union or community of feeling without similarity of action and daily practice. This is, if you wish to be social with me, as I do so shall you. If you would cultivate my society, so I, eat ye—or in more words, your habits of acting, feeling and thinking, must be like mine. Some take this word from, so as I at tea.

Community.—Come you in at tea, is the derivation of this word. It need scarcely be said that it originated at old women's tea parties, and its force and meaning are obvious.

Honourable.—One after a bill, one never a bill, or never once a bill.

Friend.—Derived from farther end, whence came far-end, if end from an ancient custom of a rich man's arranging his guests at his table: first his relations, then his companions, and at the further end of the table, all those who had him out of mere respect, love and admiration of him, and his good living. Hence called by the waiters far ends, and finally by another contraction, friends.

Charitable.—From cheer at the table, not as some will have it, cheer at the table, as if the cruel and heartless used to compel the poor to eat on the floor, while the kind and benevolent gave them a chair at the table, and were thence called charitable. We think this derivation is rather clever at the table, from the fact that the truly benevolent are never satisfied, till they have given the indigent and starving the means of obtaining all the comforts of life.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, near the corner of Broadway. Terms, FIVE DOLLARS per annum, payable, in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post paid, and directed to the editor.

George P. Scott, Printer, corner of Gold and John-streets

Yours affectionately
C. M. Gedgwick —

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR. SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NO. 1 BARCLAY-STREET, NEAR BROADWAY. (PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.)

VOLUME SEVENTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1839.

NUMBER TWENTY-SEVEN.

THE ENGRAVING.

PORTRAIT OF MISS SEDGWICK.

We have the satisfaction of presenting the readers of the New-York Mirror with the accompanying excellent engraving, after a painting by Ingham, of one of the most distinguished female writers of the age—Miss Sedgwick. The writings of this lady are to our country what those of Maria Edgeworth are to England and Ireland. Miss Sedgwick is, perhaps, at this time the most popular writer of fiction amongst us. Her works have been extensively circulated both in the United States and Great Britain. They aim at higher ends than the mere imparting of interest by the arts and graces of fiction. A pure and lofty moral is visible throughout; and while we admire the intellectual energy displayed in her writings, we cannot omit also to bear testimony to the excellence of the great principles which they so attractively and forcibly inculcate.

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

WHO GOVERNS!

BY HEINRICH ZSCHOKKE.

CHAPTER VII.—THE VEIL.

MANY a courtier was astonished at the good fortune of our hero, who had commenced his career as a poor clerk, and was now raised from his obscurity into the illustrious ranks of nobility. Not that such things were unusual at that time—far from it—but people could not see how it was done; he had no declared patron or patroness; he did not wait in antechambers, nor pay court to any influential beauty. No one ever thought of Mademoiselle Pauline, for she was a poor orphan, occupying a subordinate station in a family which could boast of no influence at court. Cardinal Bernis, after a good deal of watching, succeeded in finding out that Prince Soubise took a particular interest for Monsieur de Rosier, and though he could not tell why, and though there was no visible connexion between them, still it was evident he must have some influence over the prince. The cardinal, therefore, who took every possible opportunity of advancing his own interest, designed to let a gracious regard fall on our Colas. He sent for him. "Monsieur de Rosier, I have long admired your brilliant capacity. You are destined to an elevated position, and I take pleasure in promoting your progress to it. Here is your nomination as a councillor of state. Your duties will be henceforth in my department." Colas was profuse in expressions of gratitude, but thought all the while of Pauline.

"By no means!" said she. "So long as you were nobody, you had no friends but me; but now you are somebody, you need me no longer. The beginning is everything. I should not wonder if you should get to be count, duke, and minister yet."

The greatest advantage of all these promotions was, that it gave him an opportunity of seeing Pauline often. As a nobleman and high officer of state, he was gladly received at Count d'Oron's parties, and would have been welcome as a suitor for her hand. But he was too wise to inflame the jealousy of Prince Soubise, who could crush him in a moment; so he enjoyed his good fortune with prudence. Pauline and he met very frequently, but they were too good diplomats to betray the terms on which they stood to each other. It was only in her snug boudoir that they talked freely of all they did, said, heard, or saw.

"Colas," said she, "did you notice the young courtesess of Starenberg at the ball last night—she was the prettiest woman in the room."

"I did—she was almost worth looking at, even in your presence."

"But did you see her splendid veil close? It is fairly magical; the most perfect, exquisite thing I ever laid my eyes on. There is nothing to be compared to it in all Paris. Oh, if I only had such a veil as that!"

Colas answered smiling, "It is not the only one in the whole world, I suppose! I will ask the Austrian ambassador where his daughter-in-law bought it, and what it cost. You shall have one exactly like it."

"Ah, good Colas," sighed Pauline, "you are a poor judge of its value. While we were looking at it and admiring it, the countess told us it was a present from the empress-queen. There are only three such veils in the world. The second is worn by the empress herself, and the third was probably never meant for me."

"Who knows? there is nothing like trying. Are not we two all-powerful?"

"Colas, oh Colas!" cried Pauline, in ecstasy, "if you only could! Colas, in that veil Pauline would be Madame de Rosier."

This was a high bribe, and Colas set to work in earnest. The count von Starenberg, ambassador of the empress-queen, Maria Theresa, had been unsuccessful at the Tuileries. His object was to induce France to form an alliance with Austria against Prussia. The latter power had just made a treaty with England, France's enemy; still, neither Cardinal Bernis, nor the marchioness, nor any sensible Frenchman, would listen to the idea of uniting with Austria, France's natural enemy, against Prussia, her natural ally. Colas, with his head full of the veil, joined the count, just as he was leaving the cardinal, after a long audience, in utter despair of success. Still he showed no signs of disappointment, especially as the appearance of Monsieur de Rosier gave him a faint hope. "Perhaps France means to make us pay dear for her friendship," thought he, and received our hero cordially. The conversation soon fell upon the last ball, on the beauty of the countess, and her superb veil, the envy of everybody. The ambassador listened, and Colas watched. The count said that the veil was of inestimable value, from the Netherlands. What his daughter-in-law had said was true; there were only two like it in the world, both in the hands of the empress. Colas did not attempt to conceal that this veil had completely fascinated a person who was very dear to him, and that the happiness of his life depended on his being able to obtain it for her.

"In that case, my dear fellow," said the count, "we are both to be pitted. It is as impossible that you should get such a veil, as it is for me to induce your king to make a treaty with us."

"We must never despair, count," replied Colas, who now saw the price that was put on the veil; "many things are possible, if we would only think them so. Don't despair, bad as things look!"

"My dearest friend!" rejoined Starenberg, "cost what it may, if the treaty is made, you shall have the veil for your reward. If I can succeed in gratifying the dearest wish of my empress, I am sure she will not refuse me a piece of lace-work."

The two negotiators now understood each other. Colas promised to use his influence with the cardinal, and the count to apply to the empress. The first attempt did not succeed very well. The cardinal cut him very short, reminding him that a French diplomatist should not let himself be gained over by foreigners. With Pauline he was more successful. "Leave it to me!" was all she said. The next time the prince visited her, he began his usual strain of insipid compliment. Having nothing better to say, he told her that he had been dreaming of her as a heavenly being, more lovely than she was now, because less prudent, and so forth.

"Prince," said she, pretending to blush, "only think, my dream was nearly like yours. I dreamed I saw you transformed, and handsomer than ever, at the head of an army, in splendid uniform, surrounded by captured standards. You were returning home in triumph, and I was one of the million spectators of your entry. He has forgotten me, I thought—but you saw me, and I leaped graciously towards me—and—" The prince caught the fair dreamer passionately in his arms. "Not so, prince!" she exclaimed, in a severe tone, "you must not forget that this is not a dream, and that you have neither the uniform, the army, nor the trophies. If I ever could be guilty of a weakness, it would be for a hero who had shed glory on the arms of France."

"How cruel you are!" cried Soubise; "you point out to me an impossible felicity."

"How so? are we not at war with England?"

"And if we are, I am no sailor to meet them at sea. If we could only build a bridge from Calais to Dover, I would ask no reward for my constant love till I had planted my banners on the tower of London."

"Why not attack them on land? Hanover belongs to England."

"My dear Pauline," replied the prince, smiling, "you are better versed in the tactics of the heart than in those of statesmanship. The king of Prussia has made a treaty with England, and that protects Hanover."

"Why not, then, unite with Austria, as she wishes? Prussia would then have enough to do at home, without troubling herself about Hanover. Why will you oppose this alliance, and stand in your own light?"

The conversation was continued for some time in the same tone. The prince was sure of the command, if war was declared, and his head was filled with visions of military glory. So he required straight to Madame de Pompadour. Here, however, he was unsuccessful. I have no love for our poetical king of Prussia," said she, "and know very well that I do not stand very high in his good opinion. But I am also unlucky enough not to please the queen of Hungary, so that the one balances the other, and the honour of France outweighs both."

The prince endeavoured to impress her with a more favourable idea of the empress Maria Theresa, but without success. In vain did he assure her that the empress in her private circle always spoke of her with the highest respect and admiration.

"Not so," replied the marchioness, smiling; "you are too good-natured, prince; you believe whatever Starenberg tells you. You should not put faith in it; I, at least, never shall, till the empress writes to me with her own hand."

The prince had some difficulty in concealing his disappointment, but Madame de Pompadour's last words afforded him a gleam of hope. "Everything depends on our flattering the marchioness's pride," said he to Pauline; "the empress must be prevailed upon to write her a friendly letter. It will cost her nothing. The very moment Starenberg presents such a letter, the alliance is as good as formed. But how shall we let the ambassador know it? For no one must suspect that the proposition comes from me."

"Trust that to me," replied Pauline; "such an idea will be thought excusable in a young girl, if not in a prince. I am ready to try anything for the sake of such a prince—for the sake of seeing you at the head of your army, in the ranks of the first generals of Europe! Oh prince! when you put on your uniform as commander in chief—ah, don't look at me!"

The next moment Soubise lay at her feet, swearing eternal fidelity to his charming Pauline, who used all the means her imagination could devise, to inspire the prince with a passion for military glory. The idea of the veil gave double activity to her genius. In the next place, Colas was let into the secret. He had an interview with Count Starenberg, and the count despatched couriers to Vienna.

One evening, when the marchioness was giving an entertainment, the prince made his appearance. Madame de Pompadour seemed unusually cheerful. She took the prince aside, and told him, smiling gracefully, "I fear, prince, we are about to lose you."

"And can you smile when you tell me so?" asked he, in great surprise.

"Though I shall lose the pleasure of your society," she replied, "I shall be consoled by the pleasure you will experience in the gratification of your dearest wishes. I don't doubt but you will soon receive from his majesty the bâton of marshal, and the command of an army."

Soubise's countenance was radiant with joy. "How can it be?" cried he.

"His majesty is inclined to form a treaty with Austria—but then the empress has done wonders. She is, beyond a doubt, the most talented princess of our day. You ought to see the amiable letter she did me the honour to send me."

"Has the empress written to you?"

"Say nothing at present—you shall know more to-morrow."

That same night, a gentle tap was heard at Pauline's door; it was Colas. He entered, half wild with joy. He unfolded the most magnificent of veils, and wrapped it round her. She put it aside, and sunk into the arms of her happy lover.

In a few days the treaty between France and Austria was signed. Cardinal Bernis had opposed it with all his eloquence, but in vain. He could not comprehend how the king, Madame de Pompadour, and all the court could have changed their minds so suddenly. He cursed in his heart the Duc de Choiseul, whom he looked upon as the author of this unfortunate and unnatural alliance. He never dreamed that the longing of a pretty girl for a handsome veil had baffled all the arts of diplomacy and decided the fate of armies and nations.

CHAPTER VIII.—SOLITUDE, COMPANY, AND SOLITUDE AGAIN

"This accursed treaty fairly makes me sick," said Cardinal Bernis one day to our hero; "lay the papers aside. I can neither bear to read them, nor to hear them read! I am not in the vein. The world is all gone crazy, it seems. I will confess to you honestly, Monsieur de Rosier, I find this unholy, abominable treaty confounded hard to swallow. I long for solitude and rest. The king has given me permission to retire to Fontainebleau for awhile, and I want you to accompany me. There we can moralize undisturbed in the shade of the trees. I feel, too, that it will do me good to breathe the pure air once more, out of the poisoned atmosphere of a court. It is settled, then, that you go with me. We must be off early next week."

Colas bowed acquiescence, and expressed the gratification, which he really felt, at so distinguished a mark of favour. But Pauline was far from being equally gratified. "What! are we to be separated from each other for six weeks—perhaps even for two whole months! Ah, Colas, I would give anything if I could go with you, and stroll arm in arm through the quiet groves of Fontainebleau. How happy we would be if we were all alone there, with nothing to do but to listen to each other!"

"Yes, we would turn it into an Arcadia. But—does not the Count d'Oron own a large farm and a pretty villa close by Fontainebleau! You must persuade his daughter to go there to pass the month of May."

* This is historical fact. Maria Theresa's condescension in writing to Madame de Pompadour, induced her to persuade Louis XIV. to unite with her and the empress of Russia against the great Frederick of Prussia. As these three ladies were the principal parties to it, the great Fritz used to call it disparagingly l'alliance des trois coiffeuses, the league of the three petticoats; but it gave him a good deal of trouble before he could get the better of it.

"Capital, capital!" cried Pauline, and off she ran to wait on the young countess, and painted the charms of a country life in such glowing colours, that she soon made a convert of her. "Oh dear!" said the young lady to her father, "I do long for solitude. I have not been well this winter: I must breathe the country air a little while. I have never seen your farm at Fontainebleau. Suppose you let me spend a month there?"

The count had no objections, and the jaunt was resolved on. Prince Soubise heard of it of course, as a friend of the family, and immediately calculated that Pauline would find the time pass heavily, and that he could enjoy her society there without interruption. He determined to surprise her by a visit without saying anything about it.

"I really feel a longing for solitude," said he to Madame de Pompadour, "before I leave for the army, and plunge into the turmoil of camps and battles. I want to take a last look at nature. Would his majesty allow me to spend a month at Fontainebleau? if you will speak a good word for me, and my darling wish will be gratified."

The prince soon obtained leave of absence. Madame de Pompadour meanwhile was thinking to herself that he must soon join the army, and that it was a pity to be deprived of his society for so many weeks. "Sire," she said to the king, "I feel an invincible longing for retirement. Your majesty, too, needs change of scene; and the spring invites to the country. What if we were to spend our May at Fontainebleau?"

The king happened at the time to be weary of himself and everybody else. "I feel just as you do," said he. "To Fontainebleau be it, and the sooner the better."

The cardinal had been philosophizing with Colas for some three days, and praising his quiet happiness in those pretty verses which are published in his works, when all at once he saw that Count d'Oron's villa was growing inhabited.

"So much the better," thought he; "the young ladies are very pretty, and an occasional visit will break the monotony of our country life."

The next day, Prince Soubise made his appearance with a host of servants, and took possession of a whole wing of the castle.

"It seems that we are not likely to be left altogether to ourselves," remarked Colas.

"So it appears," answered the cardinal; "but I protest against more visitors."

Two days afterwards, twenty wagons came along, loaded with the royal wardrobe and kitchen apparatus. Then followed, in carriages and on horseback, a whole army of valets, chambermaids, cooks, hostlers, grooms, coachmen, laqueys, pages, masters of the ceremonies, secretaries, butlers, chamberlains, abbés, actors, foresters, court-tailors, dancers of both sexes, washerwomen, pyrotechnists, ballet-masters, wig-makers, pastry-cooks and confectioners. Then began a running and skouting, a knocking and hammering, enough to set a nervous man in fits. Next appeared half a dozen battalions of the royal guard, horse and foot, marching in with music playing and colours flying. Huge bakeries and shambles were put up to supply this mass of people, and all was noise, hurry and confusion.

"May the saints be good to us!" said the poor cardinal. "It's enough to make one crazy!"

Next day, the drums beat, the trumpets sounded, the bells rang, and the cannon roared. His majesty arrived amid shouts of Vive le roi! A few hours afterwards came Madame de Pompadour, with a train of seventeen coaches.

"I shall certainly lose my senses!" cried Cardinal Bernis. "No hope of their going away, either. On the contrary, the king thinks the place very pleasant, and the court, of course, pronounces it heavenly."

"I hear his majesty intends spending the summer in Marly," "My dear Rosier, I am afraid there is small hope of that. The king told me last night: 'I have never enjoyed the country so much as I do now. I am almost tempted to spend the whole summer here.'"

Colas tried his best to comfort him, but in vain. In the evening, when he slipped over to the villa, he learned from Pauline how Soubise came to think of going to Fontainebleau.

"Hem!" thought Colas, "now I see it all. I brought Pauline, Pauline the Countess d'Oron, the countess the prince, the prince the marchioness, the marchioness the king, and the king all the court. Really a very respectable tail for me to drag after me!" It made him laugh—though he could hardly believe it. "It is easy to test it, though," thought he. "Let us see if the tail will follow after me, if I leave Fontainebleau and go to Paris. That will ease the old cardinal's mind too."

"And pray, what makes you so silent and thoughtful?" asked Pauline of her lover, as they strolled through the broad alleys of the royal gardens; "have any of the fair ladies of the court made a conquest of the councillor of state?"

"No fear of that, you know very well, Pauline."

"Well, then, tell me, and tell me the truth, why do I not see you as often as I used to in Paris?"

"Because I am not master of my own time. We thought that if we came here, we should both of us be free all day long, but it is not so; and if I have to live four whole weeks in this way, I shall die of vexation. I wish we were back in Paris again."

"I think just so, Colas. I came here to be with you, not to be cooped up in the middle of the court. If you can, get leave, set off for Paris at once, and I will soon follow. I shall catch cold to-night, have a headache to-morrow, and go to Paris the day after."

The plan was managed. Colas waited on the cardinal, whom he found still grumbling at the noise and crowd around him. He easily found means to give his request a ludicrous form. "If your eminence," said he, "will allow me to try my magic powers, I will scatter the whole court so completely, that not a stable-boy shall be left in Fontainebleau; but I can only operate in Paris."

The cardinal laughed. "I understand you, you want to escape. Go, by all means. I really envy you, but etiquette requires me to remain here."

Colas went away. Pauline had a bad headache. She begged the countess to allow her to return to Paris, as she feared she was threatened with a severe illness. The countess would not leave her companion, especially as her physician pronounced Pauline's sickness a dangerous one, in consequence of his not being able to find out what it was. As soon as Prince Soubise heard of Pauline's sickness and departure, Fontainebleau was no place for him. He addressed Madame de Pompadour with a most dejected air: "I had hoped to enjoy your presence longer, but duty forces me to leave you. I have received despatches from Marshal d'Estrees. My presence is required in Paris, to superintend the preparations for the campaign. Permit me to sacrifice the happiness of my life to my sense of duty and to his majesty's service."

Madame de Pompadour endeavoured to induce the prince to change his intention, but in vain. He was skillful enough to portray the necessity of his presence in Paris, and the importance of the business he had to transact with the war department in such glowing colours, exhibiting at the same time his grief at leaving the marchioness, not only in the most moving language, but even by abundance of tears, that the marchioness told him at last, "Go, then, my dear prince, where duty and honour call you. Perhaps we shall meet again before the campaign is opened. It seems that the air of Fontainebleau does not agree with his majesty. The weather has been rather raw for the season. The court will very probably return to Paris sooner than you expect."

The prince took leave. He could not see the king, as he was actually unwell; only the marchioness had mistaken the cause of his illness. It was not the air of Fontainebleau, but an oyster pie, that his majesty was suffering from. When the cardinal saw the prince depart, with bag and baggage, he could not help smiling and saying to himself, "A good beginning, at any rate! I really believe my friend Rosier is trying his black art in earnest." But when he was told that his majesty was going back to Paris, as he found the air did not agree with him; when he saw wagons packing up, and chamberlains, butlers, equerries, tailors, dancers, musicians, etc. etc., all taking their departure; when he saw the king leave for Paris, the marchioness follow him; when the guards marched off, drums beating and colours flying, and not so much as a stable-boy was left in the once more deserted halls of Fontainebleau, he could not help saying, "Can this be chance? or is our friend really in league with the evil one?"

CONCLUSION.

By Prince Soubise's departure for the army, Colas lost a link in that magic chain, by means of which he had become a greater man than he had ever dared to hope. He did not complain, however, for he had no occasion to use it any more. Enjoying the confidence and friendship of the ministers, he soon found means to gain profit and dignity; and the cardinal, who seemed to take a particular pleasure in throwing all the good things into his way, soon put him in a situation to become the purchaser of one of the prettiest country seats in France. It was no small attraction in his eyes, that it lay far from Paris, and consequently beyond the reach of court influences and court intrigue. The magnificent, unique, diplomatic veil was withdrawn from its place of deposit, and in it Pauline de Pons became in good earnest Madame de Rosier. Colas was happier by far in his retirement than he had been in the gaieties of Paris. He had a handsome fortune, a pretty villa, a still prettier wife, and lovely children. Is more than this required for happiness?

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

Tennessee, November, 1830.

MR. EDITOR—The subjoined letter was written by a young lady of your city on a visit to this state. I send you a copy, without her knowledge or consent. I think her impressions will be new to many of your readers, as I am aware from my own observation and experience of the ignorance of our Northern brethren with regard to our habits and manner of living. Yours, R. H.

DEAREST HELM—What shall I say to deprecate your anger? If you but knew how pleasantly and constantly my time has been occupied, you would pardon me. Well I know you are dumb with astonishment, when you and all of my city friends were condoling me over my anticipated banishment, as it were, from the civilized world; indeed I considered my visit to this state as little more than a scene of probation. Well, I have been here one month, yet so delightfully has the time gilded off that it seems but yesterday since I arrived. I will not here give you my opinion of this country and its good people, but will begin and give you a regular account of myself after the parting with Kate at Baltimore. She no doubt told you fully of our agreeable sojourn in the city of brotherly love, and the monumental city.

It was with mingled emotions of pain and pleasure that I bid a long adieu to my friends, as we stepped on board a Norfolk steamer.

"She walks the water like a thing of life,
And seems to dare the elements to strife."

Soon we were leaving the city, with her proud monuments, her towers and spires, houses and shipping gradually fading in the distance. I have never enjoyed any excursion so much as this; the air was of the most delightful temperature, the evening lovely, and certainly the beautiful Chesapeake never appeared to finer advantage. Between two and twilight, we passed hundreds of vessels; steamers puffing by, brigs and schooners, with their white sails expanded to the breeze. O! I could have spent days and days in that lovely bay. Long I sat on deck enjoying the beauty of the scene; there was a light breeze agitating the waters of deep green except where the waves lashed the boat, leaving a track of snowy foam. At six o'clock next morning we were in sight of the Virginia shore; stopped a short time at Portsmouth; the marine hospital there is a fine building.

Norfolk looks like a fine old city as we approach; the harbour is a beautiful one, resembling, it is said, the far-famed bay of Naples. Hail and welcome, old Virginia! We got in at seven, walked up to a tavern to breakfast, and truly 'twas distance lent enchantment to the view. Norfolk has quite an old and rather desolate appearance, the number of persons passing about being few for the number of houses. After sunset took a stroll on the beach and through the best part of the city; left the next morning in the Thomas Jefferson for Richmond. At eleven in the morning, while myself and brother had ascended to the upper deck, our boat stopped at an old decayed-looking wharf, a few ruinous habitations were in sight, in the midst of an old neglected field grown up with weeds, with here and there interspersed a fallen chimney, mantled with the luxuriant wild creeper. I never beheld a more dreary and desolate scene—this was old Jamestown—the spot where our forefathers first reared their houses in the new world. The scenery on the James is very tame, presenting principally a flat, uncultivated waste. At three in the afternoon we arrived at Richmond. You know what a reverential love I have always entertained for Virginia, even since my earliest school-days while reading of Pocahontas and Smith; everything noble and chivalrous was associated with that name. I was disappointed in Richmond: that too has rather an old and gloomy appearance—on Capital-hill, however, are many cheerful, fine-looking residences: from the summit of the hill we had a most enchanting prospect of the city, the surrounding country, and a village on the opposite side of the river. The Capital, like its state, is time-worn and venerable, yet dignified and grand in its decline. We had letters of introduction to a few persons only, and judging from them as a sample, I should say the society of Richmond was as elegant and refined as any I have ever known. Went on from thence to Charlottesville, the seat of the university; in sight, too, is Monticello, the residence of Mr. Jefferson. The morning after our arrival we set off on our pilgrimage to the grave and residence of the sage; the ascent to the monument is a rough road gradually winding around until it approaches the summit on the west; on an elevated table-land of about two acres in extent stands the house. The whole demesne now presents a most melancholy aspect; the effacing hand of time and decay is apparent on all around, particularly the adjuncts are sadly dilapidated; the main building has rather the appearance of utter desolation. After some delay we were admitted—the interior is in fine preservation; the floors, the carvings and mouldings are in antique style. We were shown the bed on which Mr. Jefferson died, the table at which he wrote. The view from the monument is proverbial for its beauty and extent; on the west is seen the village of Charlottesville, the noble university, a great diversity of country, of wood, hill and dale, spread out like an extended map bordered by the Blue Ridge. We passed the burial-ground, which is about one hundred yards from the mansion; returning we approached the hallowed spot on foot, entered a rough stone enclosure, and stood by the grave of Jefferson. A rude granite monument marks the spot, with only the line of his birth and death inscribed on it. By his side repose the remains of his wife; a plain marble slab is over her tomb, bearing an epitaph written by himself. Thought I, an impressive lesson of this world's vanity is to be gained by a survey of this spot. We next visited the university—could a traveller be suddenly transported here, he would imagine himself approaching an oriental city—the buildings are very fine. Surely, thought I, the student must feel emotions of pride swelling his bosom as he treads the lofty halls and long arcades of this seat of learning. The next day we started in the stage for the Natural Bridge; before sunset we were in sight, the Peaks of Otter rearing their proud heads above the surrounding mountains. We stopped at the tavern, within a few yards of the bridge; I was too excited for a moment's repose before seeing this grave work of nature. We took the path that led to the channel of the creek, wending our way down the steep and rather difficult descent; about one hundred yards brought us in sight of the bridge. My first feeling was disappointment. We approached nearer and stood under the stupendous arch, viewed it from every direction, and it is then, after gazing long, measuring with the eye its gigantic proportions, its beautiful symmetry, the mind is fully impressed with the grandeur of the scene. We remained two days—at sunset walked to the bridge again. 'Tis in the deepening gloom of twilight, the massive arch, as it were, spanning the blue vault above, that the mind is struck most with its sublimity. Seated on a rock in the awful chasm below, how insignificant did myself and puny race of fellow-beings appear! For days we enjoyed perfect feasts of mountain scenery—the beautiful, the sublime and wildly savage, were alternately presented to us, in crossing the Blue Ridge at Mount Purgatory, Clifton Forge, and the Hawk's Nest.

Were I not afraid of tiring your patience, I could tell you much of our delightful voyage down the Ohio. I scarcely know of a more pleasant way of spending a short time than this, floating down the silver-wave, brought for several days in contact with the same company, where each one exerts himself to render his neighbour's time as agreeable as possible—of Cincinnati, too, the fair queen of the west, which resembles Philadelphia a good deal in the order and regularity with which it is built—of Louisville, the commercial emporium of the west, which in its bustling and business-like aspect reminded me of our own good city of Gotham—of Lexington, the city of shade, with Ashland and the beautiful country around it—of Nashville, the capital of this state. This is a beautiful place—the society too, I should say from my limited acquaintance and stay there, is highly polished and elegant. As we advanced south, instead of the verdant parks of Kentucky, broad cotton fields are presented to the eye. We at length arrived at my brother's: I was introduced to my Tennessee sister, though we had heard so often of her countless attractions. I must admit I was surprised, with all the charms of manner and person combined, there is an additional truth and sincerity about her that renders her irresistible; honest frankness is one of the proverbial characteristics of the Tennesseans; indeed in their trueheartedness, their unreserved and social interests with each other, their boundless, unostentatious, but elegant hospitality, I am frequently reminded of Irving's description of the Brace-bridge family. I have become quite an equestrian too; could almost rival Victoria herself on such occasions; an intelligent young fox-hunting planter is my equine.

Would you believe it! though I have been travelling and sojourning in several slave-holding states, I have seen none of the horrors of slavery our abolitionists tell us of. 'Tis true, I see hundreds of negroes at work, but a more light-hearted and happy race of beings I have never seen. You cannot conceive, too, of the attachment existing between master and slave. Were you here, Helen, I should be quite happy; but while I am sitting in an open room, with the perfume of flowers wafted in the easement, you are shivering over a coal fire, or dozing over the last new novel, or sauntering up Broadway in pursuit of that phantom, Pleasure. You shall hear from me again very soon. Yours, ever, M. S.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

ADVENTURES ARE TO THE ADVENTUROUS.

On a rainy afternoon in August, two young Philadelphians might be seen seated in an apartment of the spacious hotel at Chambersburg, over the remnants of a dessert, which, in its pristine array, had evidently been as remarkable for its variety as for its superfluity. Through the wreaths of tobacco-smoke, which rose in lazy eddies over the table, might be seen the glimmer of champagne-glasses and the emerald receptacles of hock. Specimens of the choice fruits of the season lay in profuse confusion, intermingled with bottles and cigars. Notwithstanding the disorderly appearance of the viands and the wines, perfect quiet seemed to prevail in the apartment. One of the inmates sat with his feet comfortably braced against the shelf, and his chair gently inclining backward, till it formed an acute angle with the floor. His companion was making very faces at a glass of champagne, which he suddenly emptied upon the floor; and then starting up, exclaimed:

"I'll tell you what, Frank Tibbury, I shall take the mail back for Philadelphia this very night."

"You don't mean so, Harry Stanhope?"

"I am resolved; and you know when I make up my mind, nothing can move me."

"You are a simpleton, Harry. Didn't you make up your mind to accomplish the tour of the western states before your return; and now you would retreat before you have passed the threshold of your enterprise. Come! adventures are to the adventurous! Who knows but you may meet the little heiress you described to me so enthusiastically. What is her name?"

"I shall not tell you. I have had enough of travelling. I will never venture again from Philadelphia farther than the Wisconsin. Oh for the dinners of Head, the ices of Parkinson, the beauties of Chestnut-street! Infatuated Frank Tibbury! Will you go jolting on over the Alleghenies in these horrid stage-coaches, and perhaps be pitched into a rocky ravine a hundred feet in depth! Come! let us pack up our trunks, and be off home!"

"You may return, sir, and be hanged; but I shall continue on my destined route."

"Very well, Frank; when you are upset on the mountains, or blown up on the river, call to mind my advice, and blame nobody but yourself. Waiter! bring me the bill; and book my name for an inside seat in the mail-coach for Philadelphia."

The two friends bade each other good-night; and before the next morning, each had departed in different directions. The sequel to their conversation is presented in the following letter from Mr. Tibbury, detailing what befel him after his departure from Chambersburg:

"What a brilliant morning, my dear Stanhope, was that which rose upon the night of our parting! How sparkled the green forests in the kindling sunshine! The protracted shower of the day before seemed to have revived and freshened every object, animate and inanimate. There was a tone of exhilarating triumph in the carol of the birds—a glitter of festal pomp upon the surrounding foliage. Our horses skinned over the newly-washed stones with a fleetness, to which our ride from Harrisburg was the crawling of a snail. My companions were civil, taciturn, and unobtrusive. Add to all this, you were not near, with your querulous sneer and unympathizing eye, to scare the delightful images, reflected from outward things, which lighted upon my heart."

"What have you missed in turning back from the Alleghenies! Scenery to fill the soul of the gazer with admiration and awe."

When first we came in sight of Mount Tuscarora, a zone of sunshine was about its waist, while its top was hid in vapours. As we gained its summit, the mist, as if by signal, rolled curtain-like away, and a prospect immense and magnificent was revealed: ranges of stupendous mountains limned in purple tints against the crystal horizon! Beneath us lay a valley stretching in placid beauty to the opposite hill, its dark forests contrasted with its square meadows of intense green. How beautiful it was! It forms the little village of McConnellsburg; and I may not forget it till memory is dethroned.

"I must confess, my dear Stanhope, that we had not ridden many hours before I began to sigh for an adventure of some kind to vary the monotony of our journey. The scenery was beautiful, but I wished for some one, into whose sympathizing ear I might pour my rhapsodies. I had to smother my enthusiasm, lest it should burst forth into utterance. As the twilight came on, I fell asleep, and did not awake till we reached Bedford. Here we stopped an hour to taste of the mineral springs and provide ourselves with supper."

"While at table, a party entered and took seats opposite me, whose appearance attracted my attention. It consisted of a sharp-featured gentleman in spectacles; a lubberly boy, whose legs were too long for his pantaloons; and a young lady, apparently accoutred for travel. I changed my seat, in order that I might get a full view of her face. She turned; and such eyes! such grace and matchless symmetry of feature! but above all, such expression! Believe me, Stanhope, you never saw her equal in Chestnut-street."

"Quite taken by surprise, but wishing to prolong my gaze, I asked if I should help her to a piece of butter! What profanation! to offer such a Peri butter! She graciously signified a negative to my intercession. At that moment our driver announced that he was ready for his passengers. We rose with one accord, and flocked towards the coach. The young lady was accompanied by the gentleman in spectacles, who was particularly solicitous about his baggage; and by the youthful body, who was absorbed in the demolition of a huge slice of cake. Both gentlemen seemed wholly inattentive to their fair charge; and she was stepping into the coach alone, when I rushed forward and helped her in, taking a place by her side."

"I soon discovered how the land lay. The gentleman in spectacles was the lady's guardian, and the youth was his son. The old fellow had settled it in his mind that his ward should be his daughter-in-law; for—a word in your ear, my dear Stanhope—she is as rich as Ceylon. We had not been an hour on our way to Bedford when we upset; and, much to my delight, old Squatoes broke his leg."

"To make a long story short, the result is, I have married the girl, and shall be happy to introduce Mrs. S. to you at Head's sometime next week."

FROM THE GERMAN OF GOETHE.

The sentiments of youth free and powerful as those of uncivilized men, easily rise to the level of the sublime. When enthusiasm is excited within us by the contemplation of grand objects, and particularly when we can scarcely conceive its vague and ideal forms, we spring up to a height for which we do not seem destined by nature. That internal voice of the soul which transports us into a sphere above our own, speaks more or less distinctly to all men.

All seek by various means to gratify this noble thirst for exaltation; but as the dimness of twilight and the obscurity of night, which seem to unite and confound objects, are favourable to the sublime; daylight, on the contrary, dispels it by distinguishing and separating the same objects. Every idea which has a tendency to become insulated and fixed, would soon annihilate the sublime, were we not fortunately enabled to take refuge in the truly beautiful, and unite our souls with it in so intimate a manner, that the result is an immortal and indivisible whole.

Let us, then, become sensible of our real situation—the first and essential condition of our existence. Let us remember that if, on the one hand, our nature seems to hold us in abasement, and in a state of oppression, it opens to us, on the other, a way to raise ourselves, and thus to accomplish the intentions of the Divinity: let us even be assured our nature imposes this upon us as a duty. We shall fulfil this divine law, if, notwithstanding the ascendancy of our nature, which inclines us to selfishness, we succeed in laying aside our personality, in order to raise ourselves, by regular inspirations, to noble and generous sentiments.

Incidents that reveal to the younger reader the secrets and passions of the human heart, instil into his mind a knowledge of far greater value than Greek or Latin.

PROVERBS FROM THE ITALIAN.

Friendships are cheap, when they are to be bought by pulling off your hat.

There are a great many asses without long ears.

He who gives fair words, feeds you with an empty spoon.

Keep your mouth shut and your eyes open.

Show not to all the bottom either of your purse or your mind.

I heard one say so, is half a lie.

When the ship is sunk, every man knows how she might have been saved.

Extravagant offers are a kind of denial.

Speaking without thinking is shooting without taking aim.

Rewards and punishments are the basis of good government.

One catches more flies with honey than with vinegar.

It is better one's foot make a slip than one's tongue.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LINES.

Keep Innocency, and take heed unto the thing that is right, for that shall bring a man peace at the last.—Psalm.

It is a brave and merry world,
When youth and health are ours;
No cloud o'er shades the passing hour,
No future darkly lowers:
The past is but a lightsome dream,
The present rife with joy,
And gaily down life's glittering stream,
Glides the glad thoughtless boy.

It is a rough and stormy world,
When Time has stamp'd us men,
And love and strife, and hope and care,
Alternate away us then:
And dark clouds gather round our path,
Shading joy's sunny beam;
But high in heart we brave their wrath,
Nor feel life but a dream.

It is a cold and chilly world,
When creeping age steals on,
And the heart's board of cherish'd hopes
Have vanished, one by one:
When those we loved have pass'd away,
And glad no more the eye,
But 'neath the churchyard's little mounds
Await us, silently.

And, when we feel that earth is past,
And death draws darkly near,
Ah! what shall give us "peace at last,"
And still frail nature's fear?
The thought, that in our crowded path,
Though weak, we still have striven,
To cleave "to right"—not that alone,
But humble trust in heaven.

SATURDAY NIGHT.

BY MISS C. CUSHMAN.

Tis Nature's hour of rest—the sons of care
Have yielded to the gentle sway of night;
Its dusky robes, earth's dew-kiss'd flow'rets wear,
Pencil'd with tints beneath the moon's pale light
The happy are at rest—the weary sleep;
Gay youth is dreaming—Wo forgets to weep.

The hour of toil has ceased! imperious Trade
Has loosed her chain, and bids her votaries rest;
The stripling's dreams are in Hope's hues array'd,
And chasing forms the poet's slumbers crest
Upon the maiden's brow Love spreads his wings,
And Fancy thralls with food imaginings.

But all sleep not! The aching head of Want
May not in Morphean bonds forget its pangs;
Its sting is in the soul—its bitter taunt
Is render'd keener far by Fame's fangs.
Misery may sear the heart and scorch the brain,
But Want has fiercer power and mightier pain.

Ambition too! Its votaries may not sleep
Their proud aspirings in Night's lethargic wave;
With them a power superiour over sleep
Forbids repose, unless 'tis in the grave.
The feverish yearnings for Fame's phantom wraith
Cheats them to labour on, 'till stopp'd by weary Death.

The toiling student, who with burning zeal
Bathes in the stream of Time his aching head,
Hears not the mystic hour of midnight peal
Upon his ear—his thoughts are with the dead,
With those emburied upon the historic page,
The undying lustre of a classic age.

The wanderer from his home, whose memory rushes
To those so loved and parted—still more dear;
His thoughts are with them, and his fond heart gushes
With sad remembrances; and while the tear
Melts to his eye, he would, for one embrace
Of old familiars, give up Fame's wild chase.

And I!—I may not sleep, for round me crowd
A thousand torturing thoughts to banish sleep.
Although my spirit with regret is bow'd,
And through my brain oppressive memories creep,
Yet still I sit, while Fancy takes the rein,
Sweeps o'er the past, and turneth joy to pain.

SONG OF AQUILLA.

From the Opera of the Peri.

BY S. J. BERR.

Come to the forest—come, love, come!
Come, if thy heart is pure and true;
Thy Indian girl a guide to thee—
Her home shall be her lover's too.
Our mountain paths are long and steep,
Our mountain caves are dark and deep;
The wood is close—and, sleeping there,
Our maidens do not dream of fear.

Come to the wildwood—come, love, come!
The van'son's fresh—the herbs are sweet—
Through smiling valleys we will roam,
And by the babbling streamlets meet;
Among gay flow'rs the waters glide;
And perfumes greet us far and wide;
No longer, then, the moments waste—
Come to the forest—haste, love, haste!

ORIGINAL NOUVELLETTES.

TRIALS OF THE HEART:

A MYSTERY:

BEING A NOVEL IN THREE VOLUMES, COMPRESSED INTO A TALE.

BY WILLIAM COX.

CHAPTER I.—SMOOTH WATER.

O Love! in such a wilderness as this,
Where transport and security entwine,
Here is the empire of thy perfect bliss,
And here thou art indeed a god divine.—Campbell.

HENRY Montague loved Adeline Stanley! Adeline Stanley loved Henry Montague!

There are only two orders of heroines—blondes and brunettes. For a description of Adeline's person, we therefore refer the inquisitive reader to any novel published within the last dozen years, whose heroine happens to be a blonde.

But perhaps a circulating library may not be conveniently near. We will therefore considerately take the trouble of making out an inventory of her perfections ourselves, in the regular and approved fashion.

Adeline Stanley had not yet expanded into the full maturity of womanhood. She had all the fragrance and freshness of the half-blown rose, but as yet she lacked the gorgeous beauty and luxurious fulness of its perfect development. In stature she was rather above the middle height, with a sylph-like elasticity of figure that gave promise in due time of the faultless proportions of the Medicean Venus. Her hair was auburn, or of a still more golden tint, (such as we see in a picture of Giorgione's), and hung down her swanlike neck in waving tresses. Her eyes were blue, and floated in an atmosphere of humid tenderness, which was ready to gather into a pearly tear at the detail of even imaginary woes, or the slightest real disappointment. Her nostrils were finely chiselled; her forehead smooth, and of alabaster purity; her eyebrows arched; her cheeks dimpled.

But it was not faultless form, or mere regularity of feature, that constituted her principal attractions. There was an inexpressible charm—an undefinable something—etc.

A blonde heroine always falls in love with a sallow or yellow hero. As Puff says, "It's a rule!"

Henry's complexion was consequently somewhat of a bilious tinge. His hair was black, and so were his eyes. The latter sparkled of course, and his upper lip gave indications of mustachios, which in time (if properly oiled) might shame "the gloss upon the raven's wing." He was tall, and likewise thin, to the extremity of gentility.

Henry was a young follower of Æsculapius, but he paid no sort of attention to his business. He had a soul above gallipots, and Adeline loved him the better for it.

There was not a mother on either side, which simplified their course of love exceedingly; and their fathers, both bustling men of business, paid very little attention to them. They therefore had pretty much their own way.

Young hearts—fond affections—unhackneyed, unworn feelings—reciprocal interchange of purest sentiment—world unknown—time had not withered—experience had not chilled—misfortune had not blighted—

Halcyon days—prospect of unclouded happiness—cottage omée—smiling family—verdant lawn—rural felicity—strawberries and cream—

There was indeed a German merchant of the name of Schenks, who made pretensions.

Schenks!

Adeline detested the very name.

CHAPTER II.—A BREEZE.

Fathers have flinty hearts—no tears can melt 'em.—Colman.

A year flew swiftly over, undimmed by care—unstained by calamity, when Mr. Stanley once morning took up the daily papers and read—

"House of Chubb, Stone, Montague and Co. gone—crash!—three cents to the dollar!"

"Humph!" said Mr. Stanley.

Henry, as soon as he heard of the misfortune, flew on the wings of love to be assured of the unchangeableness of his adored Adeline. He was intercepted by Mr. Stanley.

"Good morning, sir."

"Good morning."

"Might I beg the favour of a few minutes' conversation with you, Mr. Montague?"

"Most certainly, my dear sir. Nothing could give me greater pleasure."

"Humph!" said Mr. Stanley.

"Well then, young man, to come to the point at once, I feel it my duty to inquire the meaning of your very marked attention to my daughter?"

"Meaning! Gracious powers!"

"Yes—the meaning. What, I say, is the meaning of this lending of books, presenting of flowers, writing in albums, and such like stuff?"

"Stuff!"

"Come, come, Master Montague. Your attentions to my daughter, allow me to say, are most unpleasant. They can answer no earthly end, and can only have the effect of perhaps preventing her being comfortably settled in life."

"Settled in life! Adeline another's! Good heavens!"

"Another's. Certainly. Why you cannot reasonably expect, young gentleman, that she can ever be yours. How would you maintain her?"

"Sir!"

"How, I ask, would you propose to yourself to maintain my daughter? She cannot live upon air. Delicate as she looks, she has such a thing as an appetite."

"My dear sir, if the purest love—if the most ardent affection—if the most devoted tenderness—the most unquenchable—"

"Pooh! pooh!—That is not what I want. Will the purest love purchase even potatoes? Will the most ardent affection pay house-rent? Will the most devoted tenderness buy furniture—chairs, tables, carpets, pianofortes, vases, besides beds, blankets, and kitchen utensils?"

"Mr. Stanley!—allow me to say, those mean—those mercenary considerations never for a moment entered into my views with respect to your daughter. No, sir—"

"I believe you, young man—I believe you,—and I wish you a very good morning."

"Sir, will nothing melt you? Will not the immediate grief of two young hearts—"

"Stuff, young sir—mere stuff! When you can show me your books with a goodly list of patients;—when I can see bills posted for quineys cured and fevers abated;—when I can see that draughts have been disposed of, and boluses swallowed—then I may talk to you. At present I am informed your practice is scarcely sufficient to buy salve for the cure of a burnt finger. My daughter, indeed! Good morning, sir."

He opened the door, bowed formally, and Henry rushed distractedly from his presence.

A piercing shriek was heard from the adjacent apartment! Mr. Stanley opened the door to see what was the matter; and, oh! what a sight presented itself!

His only child lay extended on the hearth-rug, grasping the fender with her clenched hands, her legs moving spasmodically.

What a spectacle for a father!

What a spectacle for her lover, had he been present! more especially as it was early in the morning, and her hair was yet in paper. The ill-fated Adeline had been listening at the key-hole!

CHAPTER III.—THE SERENADE.

"Wake, dearest, wake! and united,
We'll rove beyond the sea."

The next evening, shrouded in impenetrable fog, wet with drizzling rain, and almost choked by the thick and humid state of the atmosphere, which, though it might impair his voice and damp his clothes, could not impair his passion or damp his ardour, Henry took his stand beneath Adeline's lattice or bed-room window, and commenced his musical invocation.

Scarcely, however, had he got through the first verse of his "amorous descant," when the watchman interfered, and told him to "move on!"

Henry bestowed a look of unutterable contempt upon the functionary, but vouchsafed no answer, and went forward with the second verse, upon which the watchman called assistance, and carried him off to the watch-house for disturbing the public peace. Oh, romantic Spain! Oh, commonplace New-York!

CHAPTER IV.—THE ELOPEMENT.

Fly from the world, dear Bessy, with me;
Thou wilt never find any sincerer.—Moore.

If you have tears, prepare to shed them now.—Shakespeare.

About a fortnight after this, Mr. Stanley was seated comfortably by his parlour fire, with his feet on the fender, as was his wont, and with a tumbler of brandy punch before him, as was his wont also. He had a cigar in his mouth, and the newspaper in his hand, and he felt very comfortable. The night was raw and gusty;—the rain pattered against the window, and the wind howled dolorously along the deserted street.

Mr. Stanley stirred the fire, took another sip of his brandy punch, and involuntarily felicitated himself upon his snug quarters. He felt no presence of misfortune; no foreboding of evil weighed upon his tranquil mind. In fact, he was busily engaged with the news of the day, when suddenly a low, mysterious, creaking sound in the passage reached his ear.

Mr. Stanley stopped reading.

A rustling of female apparel was heard.

Mr. Stanley laid his cigar upon the table.

A light step—tip! tip! tip!—stole stealthily past the parlour-door.

Mr. Stanley went tip! tip! tip! also, as stealthily as his weight and the creaking of his boots would allow.

He opened the door, and caught a glimpse of a gown-tail and the end of a bos, as they disappeared by the front entrance.

"Aha!" said Mr. Stanley.

Two steps brought him to the parlour-window, from a corner of which he beheld a female figure enveloped in shawls, boas, muffs, ruffs, and other feminine frippery, consign to the charge of a long, thin person, a portmanteau and a bandbox; after which she took hold of the said person's arm, and proceeded along the street at a rapid pace. By the light of the gas-lamp he also discerned a hackney-coach stationed at the adjacent corner.

"Aha!" again quoth Mr. Stanley.

And Mr. Stanley seized his hat and stick, and followed with considerable rapidity.

The door of the hackney-coach was closed, the coachman had mounted the box and handled the reins, and a voice from the interior had exclaimed in an exulting tone,
"All right! drive on! go the pace!"

When suddenly another voice was heard,

"All wrong! stop! instantly!"

There was a faint shriek.

"Drive on!" shouted the person in the inside, in a tone of mingled alarm and desperation—"drive on!"

And the coach moved forward.

"No. 157—I have your number! Sir a step farther at your peril, and I'll have you before the magistrates and your license taken from you to-morrow morning."

And the coach stopped.

Mr. Stanley opened the door. There lay his daughter, sobbing and shrieking, on the bosom of the tall, thin figure; and the tall, thin figure's arms were around his daughter's waist.

"My love! my life!" cried Adeline.

"Fate itself shall not part us!" responded the figure.

But Mr. Stanley applied the knob of his stick with such vigour to the knuckles of the last speaker, that, despite his passionate affirmation, he was right glad to unclasp his arms, and Adeline felt herself in the rude grasp of her exasperated parent.

"You foolish, good-for-nothing jade," said he, "to leave your father's comfortable house, and go jolting, you don't know where, with a useless, idle vagabond! Tramp home with you, you hussy! and carry your bandbox yourself!"

And the weeping Adeline had no resource but to comply.

"And now, young sir," proceeded Mr. Stanley, "I have an account to settle with you."

As he spoke he laid hold of the collar of the coat of the figure, and dragged it into the glare of the gas-light.

Need it be said that it was Montague?

"Take that! and that! and that!" cried the enraged Mr. Stanley, forcibly propelling his foot, at each exclamation, against a portion of the unfortunate Henry's anatomy, where, according to the best authorities, a blow

"hurts honour more Than twenty thousand wounds before."

"Take that, you mean, heartless, spiritless puppy, and begone!" Upon feeling himself so severely kicked, a crowd of vengeful thoughts rushed into the bosom of Montague; but Mr. Stanley being a strong, muscular man, with a tough stick in his possession, Henry judged it better not to raise a hand against the parent of his beloved Adeline, and he prepared to walk off.

"Hollo! Mister!" said the coachman, "you'll pay me my fare first, though—won't you?"

Now Montague had calculated on Adeline, like Jessica, not only bringing sufficient to pay the fare, the parson, and other incidental expenses, but also what would keep them comfortable for some time at least, and he had never thought of providing against this casualty. After fumbling in his pockets with some small change, for some time, he was obliged to declare his inability to comply with the coachman's demands!

The wrath of Mr. Stanley, on the prospect of being cheated of his daughter, was certainly bad enough; but it was a mere joke to that of the disappointed John, on finding himself likely to be done out of his fare. In fact, no one but those who have seen hackney-coachmen under similar circumstances, can form the slightest conception of it. He was a moral volcano, and the eruption of his imprecations was positively frightful. Up flew the windows in all directions—out popped night-caps of both sexes, and the ears of sober and discreet, though curious citizens, were shocked exceedingly. As an accompaniment or peroration to his blasphemies, the coachman applied his whip most emphatically to the shoulders of the unfortunate lover, and then drove off, alternately execrating Montague, and pitying himself and his horses from the bottom of his heart.

Mr. Stanley gave a laugh of savage exultation as he saw his intended son-in-law wince under the lash, and then trudged homeward, much mollified in temper by the conclusion of the adventure.

The ill-starred Montague rushed from the spot. The windows were shut down; the discreet and curious citizens crept again to their beds; and the rain pattered, and the wind howled along the deserted street as before.

But, in that brief interval, what a change had been wrought in the fate of Montague! An hour—a little hour ago, he was full of ardent hope and eager expectation. This night was to have been the consummation of his earthly bliss! this night he and Adeline were to have been linked indissolubly together! and now, this self-same night, he found himself kicked, whipped, and wet to the skin.

But we willingly draw a veil over the laceration of his feelings, mental and bodily.

On Mr. Stanley's return home, he carefully locked the whole of his doors, and put the keys in his pocket.

On entering the parlour, he found his daughter reclining on the sofa, in a fainting position; upon which he told her he was in no humour to be pestered with any of her ridiculous nonsense, said he would talk to her to some purpose in the morning, and concluded by desiring her to march off to bed instantly.

With this request she judged it prudent to comply, and walked up stairs in a state of mind "much more easily imagined than described." Bitterly did she weep as she undressed herself; and, as she sank into her cosy bed, and pulled the blankets over her, most sorrowfully did she murmur the tender lines of Byron, so appropriate to her situation,

"Oh, my lonely, lonely, lonely pillow!
Where is my lover—where is my lover!"

And where was that lover! Alas! drowning the painful sense of his sufferings in desperate draughts of whiskey and hot water. It will be recollected that it was mentioned he had some small change about him.

Mr. Stanley swallowed the remainder of his punch at one gulp, and then marched to bed also, cogitating, as he went, on the most effectual way of addressing his baggage of a daughter in the morning.

CHAPTER V.—THE LECTURE AND THE DECISION.

And ye shall walk in silk attire,
And siller nes to spare,
On ye'll consent to be his bride,
Nor think o' Donald mair.—Scotch song.

The next morning Mr. Stanley proceeded to redeem his promise of speaking to his daughter "to some purpose."

They met at breakfast. Mr. Stanley's countenance had rather a gruff expression, and he hemmed and coughed considerably during the time he sipped his coffee. Adeline looked pale and interesting, and pertinaciously refused to partake of the buttered toast.

Mr. Stanley at last commenced his harangue, by pointing out the enormity of the young lady's conduct, and the scandal to which it would inevitably give rise. He then reasoned and remonstrated with her kindly on the folly of the course she had intended to pursue. In vain! He appealed to her feelings as a daughter—her duty as a child—her sense of decorum as a woman. In vain! True to her beloved Montague, she despised all ordinary ties of duty and affection, and heroically avowed her unaltered and unalterable determination to be his, and his only!

Mr. Stanley then tried another tack. He was much too shrewd and sensible a man to lock her up, and give her an opportunity of fancying herself a persecuted innocent. He simply told her that he was extremely sorry to hear that she had made up her mind to make such a fool of herself;—that it grieved him exceedingly to find his only child such a wilful, disobedient, unfeeling girl;—that he would never use compulsion, but that he had selected for her a worthy and opulent husband, if she chose to have him; but that if she persisted in rejecting Mr. Schenks and running off with a worthless vagabond, she must just do so, for that he (Mr. Stanley) would not run after her a second time. He then said, he had only to add, that if in case she did leave him, he was firmly determined, and she knew him too well to doubt his keeping his word—firmly determined to leave every cent he possessed to his niece, Emma Stanley, with the exception of a bare provision to keep her from starvation, which he clearly foresaw would be the ultimate fate of her, or any young lady who might trust to the abilities or exertions of Mr. Henry Montague for a subsistence; and he concluded his very uronomic oration by presenting her with the key of the street door, and telling her, if she wished to go, she was perfectly at liberty to do so.

This was quite unexpected, and Adeline was taken "all aback." She had made up her mind to be locked up, but not to be turned out. She had contemplated descending from the third story window by a ladder of ropes, but not walking coolly down the front steps. The idea of sharing poverty and misfortune with her Henry for awhile, until her father relented and raised her weeping to his bosom, was not at all unpleasant; but the thought of all that her father possessed passing to her cousin, whom she hated with the intense hatred of a rival beauty, cut her to the soul. The thought of Emma walking in "silk attire," surrounded by admiring beaux, and her in glazed calico!—of Emma rolling along Broadway in her luxurious carriage, "the observed of all observers," and her trudging unnoticed on the side-walk, was altogether more than her susceptible nature could bear. She felt the extreme folly of the poor simple lassie's reply in the song above quoted—

"And what to me's a silken gown,
Wi' a poor broken heart!
Or what to me's the siller crown,
On free ye have I part!"

Besides all the balls, routs, concerts, and comforts she must inevitably give up, rushed in a torrent upon her imagination. She experienced a sudden revulsion of feeling. Her filial affections came back strongly upon her, and she informed her father that she was his daughter—that she would sacrifice her own wishes to his will; and then, as if ashamed of her compliance, she added, that he might dispose of her hand as he pleased, but that she had not, alas! a heart to bestow.

Mr. Stanley said he firmly believed her. He was quite convinced that she had about as much heart as a pigeon had gall. He would, however, he said, make her the wife of an honest man, able to provide for her, which was more than she deserved, and then Schenks might look to it.

And Mrs. Schenks she accordingly became.

CHAPTER VI.—THE WEDDING.

Ah! who can estimate the care and strife,
The ups and downs and vagaries of life.—Ann.

And where was Montague?

From the time that his hopes were blasted, and his person kicked, we can but briefly and imperfectly trace his wild and erratic career. We can but allude to his agonizing farewell letter, which Mr. Stanley put into the fire, and of his resolution to quit New-York for ever! We can but barely mention his wanderings, "seared in heart, and lone, and blighted," in various parts of the Union;—his joining a company of strolling players;—his being hissed as Jaffer at Buffalo, and pelted off the stage as Pierre at Cincinnati;—his imprisonment for debt at Mobile;—his trial on a charge of pocket-picking at New-Orleans, and the triumph of innocence there, as exemplified in his acquittal, in consequence of a flaw in the indictment. We can but allude to his marriage with a manager's widow;—to his elopement with the head female tragedian;—to the head female tragedian's elopement from him;—to his want of money, his contrition, and return to the widow, whom he found living with some one of her previous husbands!

During all these vicissitudes and rude buffetings, however, Montague's heart remained unchanged;—his feelings unaltered. He still thought fondly of his adored Adeline, long since, alas! transformed into Mrs. Schenks!

Strange! but so it was, for so it was to be! What are we but the playthings of destiny!—the creatures of a mysterious and irresistible fatality!

CHAPTER VII. MISCELLANEOUS.

Time tells his ceaseless course.—Scott.

Years passed away. Mr. Stanley settled his accounts in this world, and seven young Schenkses sat upon Schenks's stoop, and pulled to pieces his vine, and destroyed his fig-trees, and damaged his peaches and apricots. True to her first love, Mrs. Schenks led her husband a deuce of a life. That is, it would have been a deuce of a life for any other man; but Mr. Schenks was a calm, phlegmatic German, who smoked his pipe, and, by way of answer to all his spouse's bickerings and upbraidings, merely shrugged his shoulders, took the said pipe from his mouth, and ejaculated, "Goot! goot! very goot!" and then put it back again.

This insensible, unfeeling conduct not unfrequently threw Mrs. Schenks into hysterics, to which demonstration of outraged feelings her worthy sleeping partner paid no other sort of attention than that of ringing the bell for the maid; and when she saw Mrs. Schenks reviving upon the application of smelling-bottles, and cold water, or fresh air, he just muttered, (whatever he might think), "Goot! goot! very goot!" and again sought comfort from the Indian weed.

But smoking, like other things, must have an end. The poor man, himself, exhaled one day, like the vapour of his meerschaum, went out like a damp cigar, and Mrs. Schenks was a widow!

CHAPTER VIII.—THE CONFLAGRATION.

Soaring high.
The general flame ascends the sky.
In gathered groups the people gaze
Upon the broad and roaring blaze.—Rakely.

It was a hoarse November night. The rising wind began to growl like an angry mastiff, and the murky clouds swept past the crescent moon in heavy, jagged masses, now revealing her brightness for an instant, and then again shrouding her in deepest gloom. It put you in mind of an assassination on the stage.

The wind continued to increase—so did the rain. Amid the pelting of the pitiless storm, a tall, lank figure emerged from the darkness of the west side of the City-hall into the transient moonshine.

It was Montague!

He was not very much changed in his personal appearance. He was still as tall, and still as thin. The prominent features of his face were still the same, only he was sallow, unshaven, and very much in need of the aid of soap and water. But, ah! what tongue or pen can describe the state of his garments!—the dilapidation of his hat!—the desolation of his coat!—the unmentionable state of his unmentionables!

Nevertheless he seemed to think no little of himself. He had evidently hopes and aspirations beyond what his present appearance would seem to justify; for his hair was curled on one side of his head, and his hat, dilapidated as it was, cocked upon the other. One hand, too, carried a tattered glove, with which he ever and anon slapped his thigh; and the other was deposited, in military fashion, in his breast.

Suddenly the cry of "Fire! fire!" swept down Broadway. The bell on the top of the City-hall rang, and "Fire! fire!" speedily resounded from every street, and lane, and alley. Over the city, like wildfire, spread that fearful yet commonplace cry; and men, prompt at the call of duty, rushed forth; and little boys, prompt at the prospect of mischief, rushed forth also. In vain did anxious and foreboding mothers seize hats and caps,—hairless and capless came the urchin fry to impede work and increase confusion.

In a few minutes, dozens of engines were in full career up the street.

"Fire! fire!" shouted the firemen in deep bass.

"Fire! fire!" yelled the little boys in childish trebles.

"Fire! fire!" soliloquized Montague—"there is often something to be picked up at these fires!" and he followed the engines, men, and little boys.

A little above Spring-street, a handsome house was discovered to be in a blaze. Shrieks were heard in the interior. The doors were broken in, and two or three black servants and seven white children rushed into the street with a precipitation which, under the circumstances of the case, was not only excusable, but perfectly natural.

"Are all the lives saved!" cried the firemen, as they brought their pipes to play upon the now blazing building.

"All, all!" bawled some two basty persons, when the appearance of a female figure at the second story window flatly contradicted the thoughtless assertion.

"A ladder! a ladder!" screamed a thousand voices; and a ladder was speedily brought and placed against the burning mass.

"Save the woman! save the woman!" shouted Montague along with the rest, and he would have ascended the ladder and saved her himself, only the flames now burst from the first-story window and circled round the ladder in a way which rendered the ascent neither safe nor agreeable.

In an instant a fireman—one of those fine fellows who perform actions and undergo fatigues, without making any fuss about the matter, from which a hero of romance would shrink—sprang up the ladder, was at the second-story window in a trice, enveloped the shrieking female in the first thing he could lay hold of, and descended with some difficulty, and no inconsiderable injury to himself, in chivalrously endeavouring to shield his charge. The deafening shouts and huzzas of the excited multitude rent the air.

When near the foot—scorched by the fire and blinded by the smoke, the gallant fireman resigned his burden to the first person who stood near, and it was the fortune of Montague to receive once more into his arms the fair, fainting, and now, it must be added, fat form of his long-beloved Adeline!

Adeline, insensible to everything but her own danger, without recognizing him, clung hysterically to his neck, and they were conveyed together to a neighbouring house.

CHAPTER IX.—THE RECOVERY AND DISCOVERY.

And for her life she paid me with herself.—Venice Preserved.

When Mrs. Schenks recovered, she found herself surrounded by her seven children, and supported by the man who ought to have been the father of them.

She knew him at once, and uttering a shriek of joyful recognition, exclaimed—

"My Henry!"

"My Belvidere—that is—my Adeline!" shouted he.

"Best—noblest of men! and is it to you that I owe my life!"

The best and noblest of men was quite conscious that it was not. But as this was evidently the impression on Mrs. Schenks's mind, he thought it cruel to undeceive her, and thus dispel the sweet illusion. Besides, he could not bear the idea of her owing her life to another. He therefore said nothing about the fireman, but tacitly owned "the soft impeachment."

The upshot of the intensely interesting interview which followed was, that she presented him with fifty dollars to buy a suit of clothes. Subsequent meetings took place, and most pathetically did he describe the sufferings which he had endured for her sweet sake, and she, melted by the recital, tried of being a widow, and detesting the odious name she bore, consented to change it at last to Montague!

My tale is ended—or nearly so. The mature lovers live in style, and, it is to be presumed, in happiness. There are drawbacks, to be sure, but where in this sublunary sphere shall we find unalloyed felicity? Adeline, during the period that she was Mrs. Schenks, had acquired habits of lecturing and scolding, which she finds it difficult to subdue; and her Henry, from the natural noble impetuosity of his temper and acquired tragedy habits, being fierce and violent in his replies, and what is termed in low life "a row," and in high life "a scene," and in flash life "a flare-up," not unfrequently takes place; upon which occasion she regrets, or affects to regret, the—"Goot! goot! very goot!" of the poor German. It is also matter of notoriety, that when she discovered the true merits of the saving of her life at the fire, her tongue went—a little!

But why dwell upon those fleeting shadows—why point out those trivial blots. Are there not specks upon the sun?

My tale is ended.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

A THEORY OF DREAMING.

BY RUFUS DAWES.

Thought, while we are asleep, is the same as when we are awake; the mental operations are precisely alike; the succession of ideas by association continues the same as when we are awake, with this only difference: when we are awake, the train of thought is, so to speak, kept healthy by the criteria of sensible objects; but when we are asleep, we have no such criteria to regulate succession of ideas, so that the further they depart from rationality, the more absurd they become.

The reason we dream of deceased friends as being alive is, that the idea of them is associated by some antecedent thought, while there are no external, sensible objects present to the mind to regulate the error. We may, indeed, dream that we see those departed friends in a place where we had been accustomed to see them while living; and, in such a case, it would be very easy to account for the illusion; but if we dream of them as alive, under circumstances connected with a remembrance of their death, it is because of the failure of the great external regulator.

If we dream of external objects as they are, still the appearance is only a phantasm, and as the whole dream is only such, it would be very unphilosophical to make one phantasm the criterion of another's genuineness; but if we fall into a reverie, on starting from it, we know that it has been such, by the criteria of surrounding objects, which being real, must be the criteria of truth.

When the mind is in a healthy state, it is possible, independently of the external regulator, that our dreams may for a long time continue rational; but there is no security for it to remain so. Some time ago, I had a dream entirely divested of absurdity, which I put to paper as soon as I awoke. There was nothing very remarkable about it except, as already remarked, its freedom from absurdity, and the fact that during its continuance, the fable was composed verbatim as presented below.

I dreamt that I was in company with a friend who had lately returned from his travels. We were conversing rather sagely, and he remarked that his going abroad had opened his eyes to his past imperfections; that before he had travelled, he conceived an excellent opinion of himself; he thought himself clever, and of considerable attainments; but that now he looked on his youth as a blank, and its influences as of no avail. His present state of mind seemed to yield him much satisfaction, and he observed that it was perfectly independent of his youth.

I replied that he spoke unphilosophically; that it was owing to the minute influences he despised and disparaged so much, that his character had developed itself so well; and I told him that I would illustrate the truth of what I said, by a fable.

The Rose, one day, spake thus to the Dew:

"How vain you are of the benefits you imagine I have received at your hands! True, you hang some bright drops nightly on my buds, but they do not expand under your cold and glittering presents, they remain the same until the day has advanced a little, and then they vanish with the mists of the morning."

Then turning to the god of day, the Rose continued:

"But to thee, oh, morning-bright Apollo! it is that I owe everything; beneath thy genial influence, my young buds expand in beauty, and the opening petals pour forth beneath thy smiles their richest perfume; to thee am I alone indebted for all I enjoy and for all I impart to my loves!"

And then the Dew replied:

"Oh, thou vain and foolish flower, give glory where it belongs! It is to me you owe much of all you possess and of all you impart. To my minute influences are you indebted, as well as to the blazing sunbeams; without my refreshing visitations, you would be parched by their heat and expire!"

The Rose bowed down and acknowledged the justice of the rebuke.

My mind had been running on the imperfection of early education, and the necessity of unlearning much that we acquire in youth. Hence the association.

PUBLIC LECTURES.

MR. MILL'S LECTURES ON PHYSIOGNOMY.

THE attendance at the Stuyvesant Institute, Broadway, during Mr. Mill's recent lectures upon physiognomy, evinced the great interest which is taken in this delightful science by the most intelligent of our citizens. The lecturer went thoroughly into his subject, and carefully explained point by point, and illustrated his discourse by frequent allusion to various drawings and transparencies. No portion was left unexplained, nor was there any disguising technicalities to blind the auditor and confuse the mind. To give the gist of Mr. Mill's lectures, as many of our contemporaries have done, would occupy too much of our space; but, a slight extract from his third lecture is so of interesting a description, that we cannot refrain from embodying it. In speaking of the expression of the countenance, he says: "When the common observation is made that any one seems expression, it is merely this, that the person's muscles are undeveloped from want of mental exertion. This is the reason that we perceive in the peasant a round, red, smooth, and markless face. From the opposite cause to this, are the effects portrayed in the lowered brow and lined countenance of the intellectual and reflecting being, whose life is not passed for the indulgence of animal desires, whose sole aim is not to eat, to drink and sleep, but to mount with the wings of knowledge above the grossness of his nature; and, like the eagle's flight toward the life-creating sun, approach the God in whose image he is created, learn to worship, bend, and thank the great Author of his being with his heart and mind, learn to respect himself, and to be of service to his fellow-creatures, so that, when he has passed away from earth, his epitaph may be, this man performed his duty."

JOHN NEAL'S LECTURE BEFORE THE NEW-YORK LYCEUM.

We had the pleasure, a week or two since, of being one of a numerous audience at the Tabernacle, on the occasion of Mr. Neal's lecture before the New-York Lyceum. His subject was "ancient and modern eloquence," a fruitful topic, and nobly was it treated by the lecturer. Some of his positions were rather startling, and all of them quite original, and maintained with remarkable ingenuity. The old proverb, "orator fit," was torn to shreds. Mr. Neal showed that true eloquence was not an art; and the best proof he furnished of the fact, was his own extemporaneous delivery, during a space of more than an hour, of a discourse full of sparkling points and fine sentiments, given in language at once elegant, correct, and highly effective.

THE FINE ARTS.

EXCHANGE OF QUEENS, BY THOMAS S. CUMMINGS.

No. 14 Barclay-street.

AN original miniature, having the character of an historical portrait, by Thomas S. Cummings, has just been shown us by a friend. The first thing that strikes the eye of a common observer, is the extraordinary size of the picture itself, being painted on ivory, six inches by five. The next, if he be accustomed to pictures, and able in any degree to feel beauty of arrangement and happy colouring, must be the general grouping or composition of the piece. Though it is themselves nothing but portraits, and bearing that stamp of individuality which proves them to be likenesses of living people, and not the embodiment of poetical images merely; still, owing to the treatment of the artist and the fine colouring of the whole picture, it rises to the rank of historical portraiture on ivory. This, a new and almost untried department of the art, requires no ordinary courage in the artist; and therefore it is, that after speaking in high terms of the general merits of the picture, as a picture, we feel urged to find some fault with it, just to prove an impartiality. The hands are generally too small—and that of the male figure, which appears to be grasping a portion of drapery, or to be lost in a fashion somewhat equivocal, is not only too small, but all things considered, unfortunately placed. The hands of the older female are beautifully drawn and those of the younger well indicated, if nothing more. These are the only faults worth mentioning, and we predict, therefore, by repeating that, as a work of art—as a picture—without regard to the likenesses (which must be good,) this effort of Mr. Cummings is entitled to earnest and hearty commendation. It is full of poetry and full of truth, and, we will answer for it, is faithful in every particular.

Having entirely overlooked the subject of the picture, we are now reminded of the fact that two beautiful women (one sitting and the other standing) with a gentleman, are employed about a chess table; and that the latter appears to have taken the queen of his antagonist; the portion of the bishop's head in the rear of the gentleman's arm, indicating the position of the game. The expression of the features corresponds well with the catastrophe—even supposing it to be an exchange of queens and not of hearts.

MINIATURE OF A FRIEND, BY MADAME GUILLET.

No. 14 Barclay-street.

THIS picture, extraordinary in itself, and more extraordinary as the production of a woman, is but a copy on ivory, and in miniature, of a large oil portrait by Inman. There is a healthiness and warmth in the treatment, which would be quite remarkable in any portrait, but wonderful in a miniature. The richness and harmony of colour, the finescence of the flesh—one of the rarest things in portraiture—the sincerity of the expression, the admirable resemblance, and the general treatment of the subject, entitle this miniature, though but a copy, to rank very high among the productions of original art. Take it altogether, we have seldom seen so much strength in a portrait of any sort—hardly ever, except in some of the earlier efforts of Robinson, in a miniature. The style reminds you of Melbourne, Robinson and Wood: it appears to be a combination of all three—an imitation of neither. Such an artist needs only to be known to be greatly encouraged. Being a gentleman, too, we apprehend will not lessen her claims upon those who are able to appreciate her worth as an artist. Nor should we forget to mention the manner in which this miniature has found its way to our table. The artist, having seen the portrait by Inman, borrowed it, made this beautiful copy, and, with a grace peculiar to woman, and we add, to women of genius, contrived to have it reach the original.

MUSICAL.

NEW MUSICAL PERIODICAL.

OUR musical readers and the public generally will be pleased to hear that a new periodical of original and favourite vocal music will appear monthly during the coming year, under the superintendence of Charles E. Horn. The taste and qualifications of Mr. Horn for this undertaking are too well known in this community to require any endorsement from us. To no one is our community so much indebted for the great improvement experienced here in musical science during the few past years as to this gentleman. As a composer and vocalist, Mr. Horn ranks deservedly high; his performances are always marked with a chaste, finished and classical elegance. The magazine is to be published by subscription; price one dollar per number. Subscribers' names will be received at the new music store, 367 Broadway.

WHY NOT—JOHN NOT?

We have recently noticed in some of our much esteemed contemporaries, a disposition to find fault with Mr. Russell for substituting a comic for a serious song when encored. With all due deference to their opinions, we think the audience the best judges of this matter, and so long as they are pleased with the change, we see no reason why Mr. Russell should be blamed for gratifying them. It is evidently the expectation of the admirers of this fine vocalist, when they call him out a second time, that he will, instead of repeating the "Mania," "the Wreck of the Mexico," "the Skeptic's Dying Lament," etc., give them something light and humorous; and, this being the case, "Why not, John Not?"

THE KUTTERPANS—DINNER AT THE ASTOR HOUSE.

Query to the orthography of that same word "Astor"—we should prefer to spell it Aster—the home of stars. The good people here have a treat ripening for them—we are neither judges nor prophets. It was our fortune, a few days ago, to be waked up at the Astor House, after dinner, with an outburst of musical power, somewhat of the newest in our day. The company was large, sufficiently in for it, and well prepared for almost anything. Yet were they all taken by surprise—lifted off their feet. From the opposite side of the table, where sat a number of young, modest-looking, quiet strangers, just when our friends on the right and left were beginning to wink over their wine, and to play vehemently with their knives and wine-glasses, there broke forth, all of a sudden, a chorus of wild chiming voices, which brought the whole congregation to order, like a shout. To the right about face—march!—in double quick time! Forty speakers bawling at once, and forty thousand cries of order! order! wouldn't have done as much. You might have heard a pin drop. Yet only a moment before there were above a hundred voices all laughing and talking together, under a running accompaniment of creaking chairs, rattling plates, ringing glasses, and a regular feu de joie of champagne-pops. On the whole, before we go into particulars, it may not be amiss to recommend these Euterpeans to the consideration of our great men at Washington, should the cries of order! order! continue to be disregarded there. They would only have to break out with one of their battle anthems from behind the speaker's chair, and we will answer for it, that the one hundred gentlemen of the south—ay, or the three hundred gentlemen from the north, would stop in mid-volley, even though they were all rushing together like so many over-charged thunder-clouds. But enough—we have no idea of making a serious move on the subject, either by petition or remonstrance, motion or complaint: all we have to say, therefore, is, that the instant we heard pealing forth from the very midst of the tumult, "To Greece we give our shining blades!" there was a dead silence throughout the whole house. The very servants were mute and motionless—the plates and glasses breathless, though not a few of the latter rang with sympathy, soon after, to a part of Sweet Home. Then we had Near the lake where droop'd the willow—which was completely overpowering to the author of the lines, who happened to be planted just opposite these Euterpeans. We could have envied his feelings—could we say, though we did not, being altogether above the passion of envy. Then followed "As the moments roll." "The vales are smoking," and "Litov's wild hunt." There were four in the band, with voices of remarkable richness, fullness, ripeness, and power, with no implement, and nothing but a natural and hearty relish for music, and a just confidence in themselves to regulate their manifestations. Upon inquiry we found their names to be White, Blancy, Bailey, Lauriat. Take it altogether, it was one of the finest exhibitions of vocal power it has ever been our luck to hear. There was but one opinion among all of the hundreds present, either at this, or at any other private exhibition.

THE THEATRES.

THE engagement of Mademoiselle Celeste at the Park (during which were produced the ballet and pantomime with the accustomed success) will be succeeded by that of Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff, who take possession of these boards on Monday next in their popular characters of Master Walter and Julia, in our old friend Sheridan Knowles's glorious play of "The Hunchback." During their stay, Bulwer's "Ruchelieu," in which both father and daughter are so famous, will be got up with all the capabilities of the establishment. We hope that "Love," and the "Sea-Captain," will also be produced, and the new original play of the "Miser of Padua," which has made so much talk among the literary circles of this city.

Mr. Forrest, whose engagement at the Bowery was most successful, the house being nightly crowded, and not unfrequently to overflowing, was followed by Mr. Charles Keen, whose performances of Richard, Sir Giles Overreach and Hamlet, have given him an enviable reputation in both hemispheres, and stamped him an actor of the first class. Mr. Hamblin and Mrs. Shaw have lent their attraction also to the entertainments, which, with an occasional sprinkling of melo-drama to vary the scene, have contributed to enlarge the treasury and put the audience in a good-humour.

It was really refreshing to witness the beautiful delineations of that chaste and elegant actor, Mr. James Wallace, at the Chatham, where, with his brother and a good stock company, he has, notwithstanding the various attractions of the town, performed a short engagement to the great delight of the audience and his own satisfaction. He played with all the vivacity of twenty years ago, and his inimitable personations of Rolls, Dick Dashed, Massaroni, Martin Heywood, etc., filled the house nightly with fashionable and applauding spectators. However popular Mr. Wallace may be as a manager—and he is deservedly so—we like, and always have liked, Wallace the actor far better; and we think we shall not be contradicted when we say, that, in his own peculiar line, he is at this day the best English actor living.

That exceedingly clever man, Mitchell, for a long time the stage-manager of the National Theatre, has a theatrical speculation on hand in the Olympic, which he opened some weeks since with novelties of a very queer description; and among them a burlesque upon the opera of La Sonnambula, entitled the "Roof Scrambler," in which he himself sustained the principal character, called Molly Brown. It is a laughable piece, and the audience seemed to enjoy it mightily. We thought, however, that the humour was at times a little too broad; and we can imagine nothing more reprehensible in stage appointment than the attire of the assumed female character. Brown, Horncastle, Mrs. Bailey, Mrs. Plumer, and Mrs. Proctor, are members of this company, and the pieces in which they appear never fail to please.

The Bowery Amphitheatre is at present the centre of attraction for visitors of all ages; the elegance of the equestrian performers and their wonderful skill, surprise and delight the spectators. Gosselin, the clown, keeps the place in one perpetual roar of laughter, and the grand spectacles which usually terminate the performances equal, if not surpass, any attempt of the kind ever presented to a New-York audience. The care and attention bestowed upon the general representations, and the rapidity with which they succeed each other, speak much for the talent of the director, Mr. H. Rockwell.

While we have pen in hand, we may as well say, in these holiday times, that for the juvenile portion of the community, whether six feet high or two, an evening spent at the Broadway Circus is well worth the cost of admission.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque. By Edgar A. Poe. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

THE creation of modern literature—that species of invention which alone could body forth the infinite variety of modern society—the novel—requires much peculiar to its period, and all that the mind has ever possessed of original power. The legends of a barbaric age are, perhaps, all that age had worth preserving; another, entirely military, is perfectly depicted in an heroic poem; where the character of a nation is exclusively political, its masterpiece is history: chivalry, with its banners and brands, lives in its own spirited ballads; and, as the varieties increased and shades multiplied, the drama became the lively and accurate reflection of the passing panorama. But to an age, reading, thoughtful, languid, with every excitement of former times added to its own—with its strange mixture of all that can form a character, yet repress its display—what could do justice—what give a picture so true, as may be given by the novel? The tale, although not so encumbered with plot and incidents, belongs to the same class of composition, and all that it has to depend upon for usefulness or effect, is its truth of principle, its fidelity to nature, and the tact and talent with which that truth is told and that fidelity is preserved. And herein is the value and beauty of that kind of truth displayed, in that it is visible and obvious to all, for it appeals to experience and awakens observation; it opens the character of humanity, and is at once food for the philosopher, and amusement for the child.

Had Mr. Poe written nothing else but "Morella," "William Wilson," "The House of Usher," and the "MS. found in a Bottle," he would deserve a high place among imaginative writers, for there is fine poetic feeling, much brightness of fancy, an excellent taste, a ready eye for the picturesque, much quickness of observation, and great truth of sentiment and character in all these works. But there is scarcely one of the tales published in the two volumes before us, in which we do not find the development of great intellectual capacity, with a power for vivid description, an opulence of imagination, a fecundity of invention, and a command over the elegances of diction which have seldom been displayed, even by writers who have acquired the greatest distinction in the republic of letters. It would be, indeed, no easy matter to find another artist with ability equal to this writer for discussing the good and evil—the passions, dilemmas, and affections—the self-sufficiency and the deplorable weakness, the light and darkness, the virtue and the vice by which mankind are by turns affected. These volumes present a succession of richly-coloured pictures in the magic lantern of invention.

We have heard it objected, that Mr. Poe's pictures are not always to be taken as a correct representation of human nature. What human nature actually is at this period, would be a matter of some difficulty to ascertain, modified as it is by education, controlled by circumstance, and compounded of customs and costumes. The novelist, the sketcher, and the essayist, must take, not make their materials: and in all states of society, whether one of furs, feathers, and paint; au naturel—or of those furs turned into muffs, those feathers waving over helmets and barrettes, and that paint softened into rouge and pearl-powder—the view taken by an acute observer will be valuable as philosophy. The human heart, like the human countenance, is endless in its variety; the tree, the flower, the bird, the beast, resemble each other, till the likeness is that of identity. The oaks at Dodona were but like those in any English park; the steed of the Macedonian might be but as the racehorse of our modern turf. Not so with the face of man—the statue, the picture, come down to us, and we trace similarity, but no sameness; for where can be found two human beings whose individuality could be mistaken? And the varieties of mind are still more infinite: the routine of circumstances may and will be the same—the battle may be fought, the orator and statesman contend for the high places, the festival assemble the young, and the thousand great and little events of life be alike—but the spirit which vivifies them will be different; even as our present age bears no resemblance to its predecessors, so those in futurity are equally likely to differ from our own. If, therefore, Mr. Poe appears now and then too sombre and fantastic, or deals in too wild imaginings, the fault, if fault it be, must be attributed to the advanced state of our literature, which—the incidents of invention being somewhat exhausted—makes an author frequently turn to sentiment and metaphysics rather than description or adventure.

In conclusion, we would just observe, that we have done but imperfect justice to this miscellaneous and agreeable work; one of the best lounging books we have perused for a very long while, it is quite impossible to dip into any part of it without having the attention riveted and the fancy pleased; so that, in truth, our only charge against it, is that it has detained us longer than was expedient from other volumes and other affairs.

The Ursuline Manual, a collection of prayers, spiritual exercises, etc., originally arranged for the young ladies of the Ursuline Convent, Cork. New-York: Edward Denigan.

This fine collection of spiritual exercises, revised by the very reverend John Power, has been got up in a style rivaling in binding and beautiful engravings our most popular annuals. The work is intended as a gift-book for our catholic friends, and a very elegant and appropriate one it is for that purpose. Among the embellishments we notice a fine engraving of Carlo Dolci's "Christ blessing the Dead," and an exquisitely finished copy of Mochetti's Crucifixion.

Heath's "Book of Beauty," and a fine collection of splendid London annuals, may be found at Appleton's, in Broadway.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The holidays have brought us an infinite variety of communications and letters of all descriptions. If we were to undertake to oblige a hundredth part of the "constant readers" and "subscribers," whose prose and poetry are deposited in our "receptacle for things," we should be compelled to enlarge our modest sheet to treble the size of the mammoth "Boston Nation." This being impracticable at present, we must reluctantly defer or reject the greater part of the contributions so liberally proffered. This we do with some compunction, for among the matter thus "laid aside" we often find articles of real worth—gems of "purest ray serene," which ought to be rescued from oblivion and neglect. What a capital book we might make out of our "rejected communications!" Let these, therefore, who are not their contributions in our columns, console themselves with the fact, that want of space and not want of will, we must devote giving it a place.—"H" will see that we have noticed elsewhere the circumstance which he objects to in the performances at the Olympic. We have no doubt the abuse will be reformed altogether. We have not yet received a copy of Professor Longfellow's new volume of poems. We believe, however, that all that "X" says in its praise is true.—We can make no possible use of Hahnemann's bulky manuscript. Will he release us of it?—"The" Welcome to the New Year" is very well in its sentiments, but altogether too original in its grammar and spelling.—The letters in the National Intelligencer from Paris, are understood to be from the pen of Robert Welsh, Esq.—Our Washington correspondent is informed that we did not ask for personal and political details. Let him try again.—We have not modified with Mr. Esq's theory, as Anti-Humbug must be aware. Why then inflict the attack upon him on the readers of the Mirror?—The contents of the present number are entirely original.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1839.

Congratulatory.—Before the next impression reaches our readers, another year will have dawned upon us, and we therefore embrace the present as the most fitting occasion we shall have of tendering our holiday congratulations both to old friends and new; and among the former there are many thousands who have been constant readers of the Mirror from its commencement, now nearly a score of years since. Among these are many whose smiles have rewarded our labours through all the vicissitudes of our editorial lifetime—we mean the ladies—God bless them!—whose bright eyes have sparkled as they looked approvingly into their Mirror. For their unchanging confidence and countenance we could say much by way of expressing our sense of gratitude, but for the present will content ourselves by wishing to one and all a cheerful, a merry, and a happy new year.

Visits on new-year's day.—We are gratified to learn that preparations are making to celebrate this good old Knickerbocker custom with greater spirit than ever on the approaching anniversary. The ladies will put on their best smiles to receive their visitors, which, with the usual adjuncts of mulled wine, coffee, and ginger-nuts, cannot fail to have an exhilarating influence upon them. We hope that this custom, which tends to strengthen friendships and keep alive the kindly feelings of the heart, may never fall into disrepute—and to the ladies we must look for its perpetuation.

Holiday presents.—The shops have put on their holiday attire. In Broadway and Chatham-street, and other parts of the town, there are splendid arrays of all descriptions of wares intended for presents. We stop to look in at the window of one of these fancy establishments—Werkmeister's. Here the lover of "little juveniles" may supply himself with hobbys-horses, regiments of infantry, squadrons of cavalry, drums, swords, trumpets, and all the accoutrements of "glorious war;" with boats, barges, steam-packets, and other nautical inventions—with tops, bats, balls, marbles, kites, sleds, and similar important trifles, or with dolls, cradles, bedsteads, and other furniture of "the baby-house;" or with chairs, tables, sofas, bureaus and other fairy "properties." We will purchase lots of these on our return. Here is another store, kept by the sons of our old friend, the poet Woodworth. Now, if you have a mind to cater for your lady-love, what an opportunity! Rings, watches, chains, beads, necklaces, bracelets, reticules, desks, work-boxes, or anything else you may fancy, in glittering profusion! Is your inamorata of a literary turn? make her a present of a volume of the New-York Mirror, and, like an honest fellow, pay for it in advance. After you have done this, you may step into Linnen and Fennell's, and buy their new and beautiful edition of Tom Moore's "Irish Melodies," or look in at Appleton's and examine their splendid collection of London annuals and standard books. Or has she a musical turn? step immediately in at Charles E. Horn's, and purchase a piano, or subscribe for the National Melodies of America, or his new musical periodical, which will contain all the popular compositions of the day. The confectioners, too, must not be forgotten. Stewart, in Chambers-street, is a great artist in this line, and his establishment is replete with sweets. Then there's Howe's bakery, corner of Broadway and Howard-street; that's the place for crumpets, and jumbles, and doughnuts, and cookies, and all the other unmentionables of the pastry-cook. There are scores of other places, with the same or different attractive commodities; and we wish all our readers the will and the means to obtain "these good gifts."

Young ladies for sale.—In one of the Calcutta newspapers the following advertisement appears. What does it mean!—"Be it known, that six fair, pretty young ladies, with two sweet and engaging young children, lately imported from Europe, having the roses of health blooming on their cheeks, and joy sparkling in their eyes, possessing amiable manners, and highly accomplished, are to be raffled for, next door to the British Gallery. Scheme, twelve tickets at twelve rupees each."

A righteous verdict.—"I am more and more convinced," said a doge of Venice, speaking of one of his public men, "that he is an honest man, from the pains these villains take to injure him." We are reminded of this saying from seeing a paragraph going the rounds of the newspapers, stating that Doctor Brandreth has recently pursued a counterfeiter of his medicines in Boston, and recovered a verdict of six thousand two hundred and eighty-three dollars, which has given great satisfaction to everybody except the worthy doctor's opponents—the vendors of "counterfeit presentments"—and their name is legion. The Star thinks, and we think so too, that "the prosecution serves the public by punishing a man who substitutes a base for a genuine article, by which life may be endangered."

Monument to Leggett.—We learn that arrangements are in progress for the erection of a monument to the memory of the late William Leggett, our former correspondent and friend. Mr. Frazee has been engaged to execute it, and has already prepared a beautiful design. It is an obelisk, standing on a pedestal. On the pedestal is a space for the inscription, and above, on the obelisk, is the bust of Mr. Leggett, in basso relievo. Early in the spring, the monument will be erected at New-Rochelle. When are we to have a collection of Mr. Leggett's writings! They will undoubtedly be his most enduring monument.

Pure orthography.—The following communication is from the pen of one of the most eminent men of America, distinguished not less for his qualities as a patriot, his wisdom as a statesman, and his sagacity as a jurist, than for his erudition as a scholar, his talents as a writer, and his accomplishments as a finished gentleman. The opinions of such a man are entitled to great weight, and they have it. We welcome him to the columns of the Mirror.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MY DEAR SIR—I have received the Florida paper you had the kindness to send me, containing a general eulogy of the Mirror, and a specific denunciation of its editor. You are accused, it appears, of obstinate disobedience to the law! which repudiates the letter u from honour and words of a similar termination. And yet this sapient disciple of Noah Webster inserts the proscribed vowel in labour repeatedly, and in articles proceeding manifestly from his own pen. No one surely but a thorough student of his master's free discrepancy dictionaries could have exhibited such palpable inconsistency. Webster must be now more than eighty years of age; during at least fifty-five of which he has been exclusively occupied in experimenting upon his mother tongue. If he had slumbered for the same period in Sleepy Hollow, he would have been guiltless of murdering the king's English, and have conferred a negative benefit upon the Republic of Letters.

It was a coincidence somewhat singular that when your package arrived I was about taking up my pen to congratulate you on the salutary effect of your efforts in purifying the American press from the vulgarisms which have so sadly marred its orthography. You must indeed have observed the reaction that has already taken place, and which is daily increasing in favour of the cause you have so manfully sustained. You possess too much modesty to avow it, but I feel no hesitation in ascribing the change, in no moderate degree, to the recuperative energy of your example. The Harpers, who have nobly accompanied you in this beneficent career, and who are multiplying the issues of the press to an extent unprecedented in our country, will, in a short time, have imbibed nearly the whole of our standard literature in a pure orthography. Others, as you may have observed, are pursuing a similar course, leaving us nothing to regret but the too frequent suppression of the final k. The addition or omission of a single letter may seem of small importance to the mere cursory observer. Not so to the foreman when attempting to learn the language. Not so, when we consider the contagious influence of such mutilations, and their ultimate and disastrous effect upon the perpetuity in their present form, of the splendid monuments of genius and erudition enshrined in our language. O that our professed lovers of a pure literature were imbued with more of the Roman spirit, which frowned indignantly upon any and every attempt to disfigure the Latin tongue, by the smallest variation in its orthography! To this sleepless vigilance we owe the astonishing fact that this beautiful language has existed nearly three thousand years (one thousand of which it was vernacular) without the change of a letter, if I mistake not, in a single word; and although no longer vernacular in the strict sense of the term, it is nevertheless at this day the settled medium of intercourse between the Literati of different and distant nations. It is admitted, even by Webster, that our language attained its maturity in the reign of Queen Anne and George the First. And yet countenanced by men from whom we should have expected better things, he has spent a long life in elaborating modifications which are only objects of amusement, if not of ridicule, with every Englishman of taste and discernment on which side soever of the Atlantic he may be found. One thing is certain, we must either conform to the British model, or put up with a dialect of our own; for assuredly our English mother will take no lessons on this subject from her American daughter. Nor is it just or even decorous that she should be required to exchange the elevated style of the drawing-room for the senseless prattle of the nursery. Surely there can be no sacrifice of national honour, no surrender of national independence in trusting the parent of the language with the conservation of its purity. Persevere, then, my friend, in your rectilinear course, in the animating hope of rendering our restoration complete, and of thus perpetuating and universally diffusing a language which, in every valuable quality, is unquestionably superior to all others.

TELL ME NOT OF HOARDED GOLD.

Andantino.

p Cres.

Tell me not of hoard-ed gold From rich Peru; Rather let me first be told that thou art true.

Tell me not of hon-ours won, For I shall fear, One so hon-our'd will shun my hum-ble sphere.

Tell me not of hon-ours won, For I shall fear, One so hon-our'd will shun my hum-ble sphere.

3d—Tell me not of happy isles, Where thou hast been; || Tell me not of lovely smiles, That thou hast seen; || For I fear again thou'lt seek, A foreign shore; || And the smile on Ellen's cheek, Will charm no more.

THE GEM OF THE WILD.

BY MISS VANDENHOFF.

There one little spot in the sand desert dreary,
Where green boughs are glancing, (as emeralds gleam
In a bed of bright gold,) for wanderers weary
To 'scape, 'neath their shadow, the sun's scorching beam—
That one smiling spot, with its cool flowing waters,
Is called, by the Arabs, "The Gem of the Wild."
Thus, Ella, (thou fairest 'mong Eva's fair daughters,)
Though doomed, from thy beauty to wander exiled,
To bear in my bosom the sharp sting whose anguish
Is softened by naught but the mem'ry of thee,
Though doomed through this cold world all lonely to languish,
Thy love is "The Gem of the Wild," sweet, to me!

LITTLE FOLKS.—We love little folks. They are the future. Some of them are what the immortal bard calls "the great hereafterers." No period of life is more full of interest than that of childhood. We watch the expanding mind of a fine boy as we do the unfolding of a flower. It is replete with beauty, hope and promise. Childhood is the prunose season of life; and when we see a cluster of little innocent urchins around the hearth, if our wishes could be realized, all their after days should be those of sunshine and happiness. We confess we like children, and that we sympathize in all their little griefs and share in all their hilarious and boisterous merriment. In this season of festivity they should never be forgotten, and we ourselves never do forget them. They anticipate the coming of the holidays with less pleasure than we experience in relating to them strange stories and legends about what St. Claus will do for them if they are—what they all ought to be—good girls and boys. It has been our custom to send them early to bed on a new-year's eve, on good terms with themselves and all the rest of the world, and then to fill their suspended receptacles for the bounties of St. Nicholas with trinkets, toys, and the good and wholesome contents of the season. Oh the pleasures of these offices! none but a parent ever did, or ever can conceive it. Look at their bright and shining faces in the morning, and read your reward in their astonishment and gratitude. Parents, neglect not your little folks at the dawn of the year. You purchase a large amount of happiness at a trifling cost. Never be unmindful of your duty in this respect. Please your children on proper occasions, and they will please you in after life. Mind, never put rods and other emblems of reproof in the stockings of your dear little children while they lie dreaming of tokens of kinder feelings from their patron saint. We do not envy those mistaken parents who could wantonly wound the sensibilities of their offspring and call tears to their eyes woud of smiles.

EVENING PARTIES.—The fashionable practice of going late in the evening to parties is one "more honoured in the breach than the observance." It is a foreign custom—one of the worst of our imported follies. The true way to enjoy a social assembly is to go early, and to retire before midnight, before the faculties are jaded and the attention wearied. When we hear of young ladies whirling through the waltz, the "dance of contact," as Knowles calls it, till two or three o'clock in the morning, and this for weeks in succession, we are not surprised at the pallid faces and attenuated forms which we see gliding past us in our daily walks.

A JUST REPROOF.—The snail-like pace at which our omnibuses travel has become proverbial. It is, we believe, a fact, that in nine cases out of ten, a person starting from the upper part of the city can reach Wall-street sooner by walking than by availing himself of the conveyance of an omnibus. A gentleman, as he issued from Bleeker-street into Broadway the other morning, was accosted in the usual manner, by an omnibus boy, with "Broadway up, sir! Broadway up!" "Thank you, no," replied the individual—"I am in a hurry."

EARLY RISING.—"Let us get up early," was the exclamation of King Solomon, the wise man, to his love. We must confess the temptation to obey this advice is but slight these cold winter mornings; and yet of the good effects of this excellent habit there can be no doubt. At all seasons of the year it is beneficial, and perhaps never more so than in winter. In what beautiful language does Thomson urge the importance of this habit! Who could believe, that the man who could so eloquently inveigh against sloth, was himself the most indolent of men!

CONJUGAL PUNCTUALITY.—A married gentleman in the East Indies is in the habit of receiving lengthy and affectionate epistles from his wife in Europe. These he never opens, but carefully puts them by, tied up and labeled according to their dates, in order, on his return, that his wife should read them to him all in a lump.

"GLORIOUS SLEIGHING."—A Pennsylvania paper thus parodies the speech of Richard—"Now is the winter of our discontent made glorious sleighing for those who like it." We must confess that we are among those "who like it." How many old and pleasant associations do the sleigh-bells awaken! The bright moonlight shining over a wide mantle of snow—the gay companions and the pretty faces—the song, the dance and the muffled wine. We can sympathize very heartily with the feelings of the poet expressed in the following stanza:

"As for the first wild flower,
In the early time of spring;
As for the summer shower,
When earth is languishing;
As for the rainbow's blending,
As for the daystar's glow,
I have watched for the descending
Of the Winter's virgin snow."

LADY EQUESTRIANS.—In coming down town early the other morning, while the weather was clear and bracing, we encountered a party of ladies and gentlemen on horseback. It seemed to us at first that the spectacle was unseasonable, but when we looked upon the ruddy cheeks and glowing countenances of the fair riders, and remarked their evident enjoyment of the exhilarating exercise, we were disposed to alter our opinion. How many pining forms and sallow faces would be spared the departure of their bloom, if a habit so healthful and so agreeable were early adopted! We know of no more graceful sight than a lady on horseback; and we have seriously meditated a trip to London merely to see Victoria manage her steed. She is said to be the best horsewoman in the world, but those who have said so have never seen our Broadway belles on horseback.

COCKNEY CRITICISM.—We have heard of a tourist from the vicinity of Bowbells, who, on the occasion of a recent visit to the Falls of Niagara, for the purpose of procuring material for a chapter in his forthcoming book of travels, after having undergone the heat and fatigue of one of the most insupportable days in midsummer, peeped over the edge of Table Rock, and gave it as his opinion that, "the Falls were very fair for a new country: yes—they were certainly clever; but that he did not enjoy them so much as the picture of them he had seen in the book-stores."

CONVICTION.—Every man has the power of executing whatever he is fully convinced of.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL, DEVOTED TO LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR. SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NUMBER ONE BARCLAY-STREET, NEXT TO THE CORNER OF BROADWAY. PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

VOLUME SIXTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1839.

NUMBER TWENTY-EIGHT.

THE PAGE.

It was deep midnight, and the stars shone bright
Over bold Sir Julian's halls;
But the revels 'dill still sounded within,
And shook the hoary walls.
For the knight drank deep, while the world was asleep;
He drank with his lemans fair;
And he turned, in his joy, to the pale young boy
That waited beside his chair.
As the wine he quaffed, with that page he laughed;—
He laughed at his sister's shame!—
And the fair boy smiled—for how should a child
Know aught of maiden's fame?
Yet they two had grown together as one,
Till she fell to that man of guile;
And she now rests her head on a pale cold bed—
Oh 'tis strange that her brother can smile!
"Come, fill me a cup! Sir Page, fill it up,
While I drink to the fair and kind;
Yet methinks 'twere not ill they should taste who fill,
Lest mischief should look behind!"
His smile never failed, his eye never quailed,
As the brim to his lip he pressed:
Freshly he quaffed of the sparkling draught,
And Sir Julian drank the rest.
"My Page, why so pale—do thy senses fail?
What ails thee, boy?—thou art ill!"
His eyes are less bright and his lip more white,
But that smile plays round it still,
And his dim, dim gaze on Sir Julian stays:—
What may its meaning be?
"Sir Julian, prepare, thou hast taken thy share
Of the poisoned cup with me!"
Wild is the cry that rises on high;
Terrible, sad, and wild;
As the vengeance is felt to be fearfully dealt
From the hand of that feeble child.
But its work is done; for the ransung son
Saw the knight in his plumed pride,
Lie stark and pale, 'mid his followers' wail,
A corse by the fair boy's side.

STORIES OF REAL LIFE.

THE THREE FRIENDS OF BRUSSELS.

Some years ago there resided at Brussels three young men, named Charles Darancourt, Theodore de Valmont, and Ernest de St. Maure, whose friendship for each other was of so ardent a nature, that they were generally known by the title of The Inseparables. The first link which bound these youths together was the remarkable circumstance of their having been all three born on one day, and, being all of good families, they had been constant playfellows in childhood, and studied at the same academy as schoolboys, and had become members of the same university in their more advanced years. Through all these stages of their existence, they had exhibited the same unvarying affection for one another, and had displayed great similarity in their tastes, feelings and pursuits. On reaching manhood, however, circumstances led them, as might be expected, to adopt different courses of life. Darancourt, the son of an eminent physician, selected the profession of the law as the road to eminence and respectability in the world. St. Maure, whose father was a nobleman of decayed fortunes, chose the army as most suitable to his birth and pretensions. De Valmont, on the other hand, proffered the captivating study of letters and the fine arts to the pursuit of any positive profession; and the circumstances of his father, a retired colonel of engineers, enabled the young man, for the time at least, to indulge his tastes in this respect.

Ernest de St. Maure, at the period whence this narrative takes its date, had not yet joined the army, but the imperial mandate for Brussels was then within the dominions of Napoleon. He was looked for daily, and Count de St. Maure and his lady were daily preparing their minds for parting with their only and beloved son. At this time it was, that Charles Darancourt, who had been recently admitted a member of the masonic fraternity, took an opportunity of suggesting to young St. Maure the propriety of entering the same society. Darancourt's counsel was founded on certain stories told of soldiers having fallen into the hands of the enemy, and having been saved by discovering a brother-mason in some of the captors. "Now who knows," cried the young barrister, with the ardor of friendship, "but you, St. Maure, may be thrown into a similar situation, and may escape by the like means!" Though disposed to look upon the mysteries of masonry as a useless mummery, St. Maure allowed himself to be persuaded by his friend, and promised to undergo initiation at an early day. At the same time he would consent only on condition of Darancourt himself acting as sole initiator, which the barrister, however irregular the proceeding might be, professed his willingness to undertake.

During the Sunday immediately following the day on which this conversation took place, Count de St. Maure's house was observed to be shut up by the neighbours. None of the inmates, at least, were seen to issue from it, though they had ever been remarkable for their punctuality in attendance on the services of the church. The neighbours, however, merely concluded some of them to be ill. But about eight o'clock in the evening, Charles Darancourt and Theodore de Valmont called, in order to spend a social hour with the family. Their repeated knockings at the door remaining unanswered, they at length alarmed the neighbourhood. The door was burst open, and to the horror of the spectators, four murdered bodies were found in the various bedrooms. The corpses, whose throats were shockingly cut, were those of the Count de St. Maure, his lady, and their two servants. It was also found that a desk had been broken open, and plundered of valuable jewels, known to have been there. On this appalling discovery, Darancourt, whose friendship for the family was well known, appeared at first paralyzed with grief. When he recovered from his trance-like stupor, he rushed from the house, exclaiming, "My friend! my dear Ernest! Where is my poor friend?" This exclamation called the minds of the spectators, for the first time, to the circumstance of young St. Maure's absence. The authorities were speedily called to the spot, and, among other steps taken, a search was instituted for Ernest de St. Maure. De Valmont, who retained much more presence of mind than Darancourt had exhibited, conducted in person the search for Ernest. But the whole of Brussels was examined in vain. The young man must have been somewhere.

At the solemn investigation which took place into the whole of this tragic affair, circumstances came out which tended strongly to fix the guilt of parricide on the missing youth. A penknife, marked with his initials, was found near the scene of slaughter, covered with blood. This, to all appearance, was the instrument with which the murders had been committed. Rewards were offered for the apprehension of young St. Maure, and in the estimation of all men he was accounted a parricide, until, on the sixth morning after the murders, a new turn was given to the affair by the discovery of the youth's body in a stagnant well in the outskirts of the city. At first, indeed, as no wound was seen on the body, it was only thought that he had added self-destruction to his other crimes, but, on a more minute examination, a small puncture was detected on the breast, immediately over the heart. This had well nigh been passed over as a trifling and accidental scratch. At the urgent entreaty of one surgeon, however, the chest was thoroughly laid open, when it was found that the heart had been pierced to its centre by a sharp instrument of exceeding minuteness, in a direct line with the external puncture. This, obviously, had been the cause of death. As the young man could not have thus slain himself, and then have conveyed his body to the well, it became apparent to all that Ernest de St. Maure also had fallen a victim to the same conspiracy which had overwhelmed his parents. This, at all events, was the strong presumption; and so satisfactory did the discovery appear to the authorities, that they laid the son in the same grave with his parents, thus clearing his memory, as far as they could, from the dreadful charge of being a parricide. The arguments of Charles Darancourt were chiefly instrumental in procuring this justice for his innocent friend. The young advocate displayed in this cause all the warmth of sorrowing affection, and all the power of forensic genius.

No further light was thrown on the fate of the St. Maures, until some weeks after the tragic event. Several papers were then discovered in an escription by the late Count's brother, which threw a dark suspicion on one of the most intimate friends of the deceased, on Theodore de Valmont! It appeared by these documents that de Valmont had fixed his affections on Emily Duplessis, a beautiful young lady, who returned his passion, in spite of a long-standing quarrel between their families. Ernest de St. Maure and Charles Darancourt had been de Valmont's only confidants, and had assisted him in procuring interviews with the object of his affection. Being thus occasionally brought into contact with the young lady, Ernest de St. Maure had himself been inspired with a deep and unhappy passion for Emily Duplessis. He had confessed this to Darancourt, and had at the same time declared his resolution to root it out of his mind, and to die rather than injure de Valmont. But the passion had not been so easily overcome, and de Valmont had at length become aware of the truth. This led to a series of letters between him and St. Maure, which letters were now discovered. In some passages of these, de Valmont reasoned with Ernest as with a brother on the subject of his misplaced passion, while in others Theodore used language that now bore a most unfortunate aspect. "You know me too well," said de Valmont in one letter, "not to feel convinced, that, independently of all other motives, an innate sense of what is due to my own honour would urge me to inflict the most ample vengeance on the head of him who could avail himself of my unbounded confidence to estrange from me the affections of my adored Emily."

There and other passages of the discovered correspondence admitted of an inference so unfavorable to Theodore de Valmont, that the authorities, on having the letters laid before them, immediately took him into custody. Various other circumstances of a disadvantageous nature came subsequently into view. It was remembered, by those who had been present, how comparatively little emotion had been shown by Theodore on the discovery of the murdered bodies, while Darancourt had displayed much agonizing grief and horror. Besides, de Valmont, it now appeared, had been met and recognized near the scene of guilt on the night of the murders. When asked to explain where he had then been, de Valmont showed manifest confusion, and said he had been visiting a friend, but positively refused to name that friend. And, moreover, a respectable female came forward, who averred that, on the third or fourth day after the tragedy, she had washed a shirt for the prisoner, the right sleeve of which was clothed with blood. The explanation which de Valmont gave of this circumstance was lame, confused and improbable. On these grounds of suspicion, Theodore de Valmont was appointed to take his trial for the murder of the St. Maures, though no one could even imagine a reason for his having included the parents in that revenge, which Ernest alone seemed to have merited at his hands.

Charles Darancourt was unremitting in his attempt to sustain the imprisoned friend under the heavy affliction of such a charge as this. To Darancourt, Theodore confided the task of communicating the intelligence of this accusation to Emily Duplessis. The young lady was so dreadfully affected as to sink into a violent fever, during the ravings of which she revealed to her parents the fact of her having not only loved de Valmont, but of her having been recently united to him by a private marriage. This information, which she did not gain say on recovering partially from her illness, had the effect of widening the circle implicated in these dark transactions, since the parents of Emily had the grief of seeing her fate bound up with that of one on whom a charge rested of the most atrocious kind. Their previous hostility to the de Valmonts, the parents might, perhaps, have readily got over; but there was now deep disgrace attending any connection with the very name of de Valmont. The discovery of the marriage was therefore concealed.

The morning allotted for de Valmont's trial arrived. The officers went to his cell to remove him, but lo! the place was empty! The prisoner had undermined the cell, and escaped by scaling the prison-walls. On the table lay a letter addressed to Mademoiselle Duplessis, which was opened by the authorities, and was found to contain an animated and solemn assertion of the writer's innocence. But, seeing circumstances to bear against him, he had resolved (the letter said) to take the only visible mode of saving his life, in the hope of one day proving his innocence; and until this was established, he never would return (he said) to Brussels. An energetic search was made for Theodore de Valmont, but it proved fruitless.

This was justice again baffled, at a time when it had frised, in its own belief, on the true criminal. But Theodore's trial, which was long and most eloquently pathetic, made a deep impression in his favour on many persons, and, among others, on the parents of his wife, Emily Duplessis, or rather de Valmont. On conversing with their daughter, they moreover learned that Theodore had been visiting Emily on the night of the murders, and had hurt his right arm in crossing the garden-wall of her father's house. Not knowing that Emily in her illness had revealed the marriage, de Valmont would not betray the secret, and hence his confused answers when questioned, as already mentioned. Knowing these things, Emily's parents longed for Theodore's return, which might now have been comparatively safe. But he could not be heard of any where. The parents now consented to the open acknowledgment of their daughter's marriage with the absent Theodore, which consent Emily had been strong reasons for entreating from them. When Theodore had been absent seven months, his wife gave birth to a son, for whom Charles Darancourt stood sponsor at the font. Darancourt, on this occasion, after pledging to the mother and child, called on the guests present to join him in drinking. "To the happy return of the absent father, and may his innocence soon be established!" Strange to say, this wish seemed in some measure fulfilled, not many days after its utterance, in a manner that deeply affected him who uttered it. A cart was stopped one night at the city barrier by one of the collectors of the imposts. No contraband goods were found in the cart, but in the act of search, a small box fell off, and was crushed by the wheels of the cart. The collector, seeing it gathering up its contents, and, while doing so, picked up a brilliant diamond brooch. The collector had been once in the service of the Count de St. Maure, and instantly recognized the brooch, which was of great value, as having belonged to that nobleman. The cart was taken into custody, and, on examination, stated that he had been employed as a gentleman to carry trunks and various articles of furniture to a country-house about a mile distant from Brussels. Being asked the gentleman's name, the man readily gave it as "Monsieur Darancourt, the younger, residing in the Grand Square."

Charles Darancourt was ere long, as his friend de Valmont had been before him, consigned to a prison on the charge of murdering the St. Maures. The strange fate which had thus caused suspicion to fall on the very dearest friends of the deceased, made the case most remarkable in the eyes of all men. Charles Darancourt was brought fairly to trial. He defended himself with equal calmness and ability, declaring the brooch to have been given to him in a present by the Count de St. Maure. On the other hand, the collector proved that the count had ever seemed to regard the brooch as the most valuable of his family jewels, and had once refused it, in the witness's hearing, to his own son. There was, on the very face of it, an improbability in the notion that a man of small fortune, like the count, should give away a jewel of such value, as a mere friendly present. It was further proved that Ernest de St. Maure had been last seen entering the prisoner's house, on the night before his disappearance; and on being called forward to tell what they knew, Charles Darancourt's three servants were found to have been all sent out of the way, on various errands, on the night in question. A chain of presumptive evidence of this nature was established against Darancourt, and, in despite of the talent with which he defended himself, he was condemned to die for the murder of the St. Maures.

Charles Darancourt solemnly protested his innocence, and continued to repeat the assertion during the interval spent in awaiting the fulfilment of his sentence. The fatal day at length came, and the prisoner was led out to the scaffold, to die an ignominious death in presence of an assembled throng, who, on the night before, his mingled feelings of pity and satisfaction, caused by the ambiguous and mysterious nature of the case. The majority of the spectators could not bring their minds to believe in the commission of such Calmucks, are the natural population; these are joined by Greeks, Armenians, Persians, Indians, Poles, Germans, French, English, and even Americans. Notwithstanding the confusion of tongues, the most perfect order reigns among this assembly of many nations. The sales effected in this place are incalculable. The silks of Lyons and Asia, the furs of Siberia, the pearls of the East, the wines of France and Greece, and the merchandise of Persia and China, are seen on every side. But among the precious productions of Asia, certainly the shawls of Cashmere bear the first rank. The sale of these beautiful articles is a sort of contract which never takes place excepting in the presence of witnesses. One of my friends, who dealt in this species of merchandise, requested me to be one of his witnesses. I therefore accompanied him to the fair, and by this means belied all the proceedings of the negotiation. On our arrival, we were joined by the other witnesses and two Armenian brokers, and my friend led us to a row of stone houses, without upper stories; here we were introduced into a sort of a cellar. The Indian merchant, who was the seller, sat there, surrounded by immense riches, in the form of four score bales of Cashmères, which were ranged and piled against the wall; he dealt in no other merchandise. The extraordinary part of the business is, that shawls of the greatest value are sold without the buyer ever seeing them opened; they are never unfolded; nor does the buyer even examine a corner; nevertheless he is perfectly informed of their state by the descriptive catalogues of the brokers, who obtain these catalogues from Cashmere, drawn up with the utmost care and accuracy.

As soon as we entered, we squatted on the ground without speaking a word, and the brokers who conduct the whole affair proceeded to business. They began by placing the buyer and seller at diagonal points of the apartment; they then ran perpetually from one party to another, making the price asked and the price bid, in many mysterious whispers. This negotiation went on with great earnestness, till the prices seemed to approximate nearer, owing to one party lowering his demand, and the other raising his offer. The bale of shawls was then brought out, and placed between the owner and the buyer; the seller vaunted their beauty and value, and the buyer regarded them disdainfully, and hastily compared their number and marks with the catalogues. Then the scene grew more animated; the buyer made a positive offer, declaring it was the highest price he would give. The Indian merchant then rose to quit the warehouse; the brokers cried aloud with a high voice, and seized him by the skirt of the garment to detain him by force; one hurried him to one side, the other pulled him on the other, and between them, they raised in a moment the most outrageous uproar. The poor Indian seemed very passive in all this confusion; I expected that the brokers in their zealous activity would do him a mischief, and I found that is sometimes the case.

Now comes the third act of this odd farce. If a fair price has been bid, the brokers endeavour to force the Indian merchant to give the buyer his hand, who holds it open, and repeat his offer in a loud voice. This is the most amusing part of the business, for the brokers seize the poor Indian, and try to get hold of his hand. The Indian defends himself, resists, escapes to the other end of the warehouse, enveloping his hand in the large sleeve of his robe, all the while the witnesses and buyers, who are the most voracious of vultures. At last they catch him, and, in spite of his resistance, and even his cries, place his hand in that of the buyer.

Complete tranquility succeeds this scene. The brokers congratulate the buyer. The Indian signs piteously, and complains in a doleful tone of the violence and ill behaviour of the brokers. The brokers seat themselves, and prepare the bill of sale; the last act of the ceremony. All that passes is pure acting, and considered indispensable to the etiquette of the sellers of Cashmere shawls; for if the Indian merchant has not been sufficiently plucked, and pulled, and pushed from side to side, and his head and arms bruised with the clamour of the sale, he will not say he has parted with his goods so readily, and repeat the sale before the next July fair brings him to Nishnei again. The whole affair rested on this important difference: the Indian merchant asked two hundred and thirty thousand roubles for his bale, and the buyer gave him but one hundred and eighty thousand—of which the brokers receive two roubles out of every hundred.

The whole company, buyer, seller, witnesses, and brokers, then seated themselves cross-legged on a carpet with deep fringes. We were handed ice, served in vases of China porcelain. Instead of spoons, we had little spatulas of mother-of-pearl, whose silver handles were ornamented with a ruby or an emerald, or some other precious stone. When these refreshments were taken, the shawls were delivered. All the marks and descriptions were found perfectly right, the goods being precisely as the brokers had declared. The time of payment caused another contest; and when that was adjusted, all the parties concerned were expected to say a private prayer. I did as the others did; but I fear I was more employed in reflecting on the variety of religions that had met together on the business. There was the Indian adorer of Brama and other idols; two Tartars, who submitted their destinies to the regulation of Mahomet; two Parsees, worshippers of fire; a Calmuck officer, who, I verily believe, had a reverential regard for the Grand Lama; and three Christians, of different communions—an Armenian, a Georgian, and (moaning myself) a Lutheran. One of the company told me he had prayed that the ladies of Europe might abate their extravagant desire of possessing Cashmere shawls. As he was like me, only one of the witnesses, I may venture to conclude, that he did not draw any profit from this article of luxury, or he would never have put up so perverse a prayer at the grand fair of Nishnei Novgorod.

ASPHALTE, OR ASPHALTICK CEMENT.

It must have been generally observed, from the advertisements inserted on the subject in the journals, that companies have been recently formed in our metropolitan cities for the sale of a substance called Asphalt, or Asphaltick cement, in connexion with certain continental mines where the material is procured. It is recommended to publish notice as a most valuable cement for building purposes, for covering floors and roofs, for flagging, both out of doors and in doors, and for various other useful objects. Some account of this substance, and of the condition in which it is extracted from the mines, may not be uninteresting to our readers.

The term Asphalt has long been familiar to the world in connexion with building. Ancient Babylon was in a great measure composed of a species of pitchy or bituminous stone, called by the name of Asphalt, and which was used in the construction of the Minors. In Palestine, a bituminous earth is procured in abundance at the present day, particularly from the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea, which, on account of the impregnation of its waters with bitumen, has often been termed the "Asphaltic Pool." The word Asphaltic, therefore, is used to signify anything impregnated with bitumen, which is the same combustible substance familiar (under slightly different forms) by the name of tar or pitch, and which is extracted both from minerals and vegetables. On examining the Valley of Travers, in the Prussian province of Neuchâtel, about the year 1712, an ingenious, learned and speculative Greek, named Erinnis, discovered a fine bed of Asphaltic rock, and probably, from some recollections suggested to him by his knowledge of antiquity, began to make experiments upon the value of the rock for cementing purposes. He describes this rock, or Asphalt, as he called it, to be "composed of a mineral substance, gelatinous and colorless, more clammy and glutinous than pitch; not porous, but very solid, its weight indicates; and so repelling the influence alike of air, cold and water, that neither can penetrate it: it is better adapted than any other substance to cement and bind buildings and structures of every kind; preserving the timber from the dry rot, from worms, and the ravages of time; so much so, that exposure to the most inclement extremes of weather only renders it the firmer and more enduring." Such is the account given by Erinnis of Asphaltic cement; and he also states that its efficacy and durability were tried and proved on many buildings in France, Neuchâtel and Switzerland. "Nothing," says he, "can be better than the composition of cement," and he gives directions for melting it as it is taken from the mine, and stirring it when melted, mixing with it at the same time ten cent. of pitch, after which it is to be spread on the stone or wood to be coated, previously heated to a slight degree.

Such was the first attempt made, in modern times, to turn the natural production called Asphalt to service in building. Erinnis was not supported properly, however, and the Val de Travers mines, though occasionally wrought by succeeding speculators, have only fallen into competent hands within a very recent period. Count de Sassenay, who had acquired the requisite experience by his having been for six years the proprietor and manager of the Seyssel mines, in the beginning of 1838, the proprietor of the estate of the Val de Travers in Neuchâtel. The Seyssel mines, it is to be observed, are also Asphaltic, and had been wrought for a number of years. But, on examination, Count de Sassenay found the Neuchâtel mines to contain a finer-grained rock, and with two per cent. more of bitumen in it, than the Seyssel mines. He was therefore to become the proprietor of the formation, and of the estate of the company at Neuchâtel, with a capital of forty thousand pounds, for the working of Asphalt, and for its sale in the various countries around.

Count de Sassenay states, in the introduction to a little pamphlet which supplies us with these particulars, that there are two kinds of mineral matter given by the name of Asphalt, though the latter is only so. The first is an earthly concretion of gritty, loose texture, to which the Count gives the name of bituminous molasse, and which he ascribes to the latest or tertiary formation of rocks. The other substance is the true Asphalt, which is solid, of the colour of soot, and is an admixture of bitumen with calcareous or limestone rock of the 1st formation, which belongs to the secondary strata. The bitumen is here completely combined or amalgamated with the calcareous material, and this union is productive of a new homogeneous substance, which alone is the true Asphaltic Cement, or Asphalt. Bituminous molasse is a mineral substance comparatively abundant on the continent, and has been wrought in several places with the view of making the same cement, but has undergone that natural admixture with calcareous matter which constitutes the true Asphalt, and hence such views have not been realized. This is not only stated by Count de Sassenay, but by M. R. Vezet, M. H. Fournel, (a noted engineer), and other observers. "Many experiments have been made to imitate the cement we have mentioned (that of Seyssel) but in these operations, the want of the calcareous matter has been attempted to be supplied by substances, which, absorbing the bitumen, produce a composition which cannot resist the influence of heat or cold, but is melted by the sun and cracked by the frost." The Val de Travers, where are found the finest kinds, has been said, of this natural production, found in it in probably under strong volcanic action, leads into the Lake of Neuchâtel. Half way up the mountain-sides, the Asphaltic works are carried on. "The operations," says M. Fournel, "are very simple, and consist merely in blasting the rock. The cavities for the powder are perforated by wimble of about thirty-nine inches in length, one of which a man can work in he would a carpenter's auger. This manner of boring appears to be applicable only to the Asphaltic stone. The labourers can work better in winter than in summer; because the rock being harder and more condensed in cold weather, the powder has more effect, and the blasting is more extensive." The rock is in blocks of irregular masses, not in strata, and there is reason to believe that the whole mountain is of Asphalt.

Of late, however, the plan has been adopted of sending the stone itself to the place where it is to be used, and there melting and mixing it with tar immediately before use. This saves one melting. The way of using it requires little explanation. When melted, the cement is merely spread over the desired part equally, and in such thickness as circumstances may require. In the coating of places to be trodden much, such as footways, terraces, slabs, etc., it is customary to mix fine river sand with it, which gives it more stability, and a degree of roughness that is not unnecessary.

We have now to ask if the Asphaltic cement has been extensively tried, and with what issue. Count de Sassenay, when proprietor of the Seyssel mines, obtained permission to use the cement in the fortifications of Vincennes, Douai, Grenoble and Besançon. The minister of war was satisfied by the experiment that it would be highly advantageous to have the roofs, floors, etc. of the barracks coated, both on the score of cleanliness, (inasmuch as the cementing was easily washed), and on account of the protection against damp afforded by it. It was also found that rats and mice disappeared where the cement was laid down. On these facts being ascertained, the French minister of war contracted for the use of Asphalt in various buildings over which he had control. The extensive commissariat magazines at Bercy, and those which supply the garrison of Paris, the ceilings and floors of the detached forts at Lyons, the arsenal at Douai, the new barracks at Peronne, those at Mont Louis and other places, were all supplied with Asphaltic coatings in whole or part. Asphalt was also substituted for the stone pavement in some of the cavalry barracks. The unavailability of the material rendered these experiments most satisfactory. A staircase, coated with the cement by Erinnis more than a hundred years ago, still remains, and is in use, whereas temporary stone stairs in the building are hollowed out by foot-marks.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE UNREASONABLENESS OF SPIRITUAL BLOTH.

ROUSE thyself, O my soul, from thy spiritual lethargy! Remember, at every moment unnumbered beings trail their flight into eternity. The infinite energy of the Eternal Mind is awake to all the events of his universe, and governing them all. The praises and melodies of heaven are unsuspended. The ever-prevailing Mediator continually intercedes. The day of thy summons into an unknown world, swiftly approaches by the unceasing hand of time; and every little section of the dial or the watch, which the shadow or the index traverses, is a portion of thy unintermitted progress towards the home of spirits. "Behold, the Judge standeth before the door!" It will be but a transient succession, a swift continuation of hours and minutes; and thou shalt have to look back upon the consummation of terrestrial things, upon the awful disclosures and decisions of the great retributive day, upon the moment when thy own character, as viewed by the Searcher of hearts, stood first revealed, and with it thy allotment in a new untried existence. And now, while those scenes are yet before thee, every temper, every purpose and bias of the mind is to be regarded as sowing for an eternal harvest. The influences of heaven, even of the Almighty, and all-Holy Spirit, are offered to him that employs them; and able to produce in the soul "fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life." A celestial and endless blessedness is set before thy faith, with every solemn promise, and mighty work of Christ to guarantee its reality; and he who is gone to "prepare a place" for his followers, has engaged to come again, and receive them to himself.

IMPROPRIETY OF SEVERE EXERCISE IMMEDIATELY PREVIOUS TO OR AFTER MEALS.

The practical rule of avoiding serious exertion immediately after eating, has long been acted upon in our treatment of the lower animals; and no one who sets any value on the lives of his horses or dogs, or follows it to be disregarded with respect to them. And yet the same man who would, unhesitatingly, dismiss his groom for feeding his horse immediately after a chase or a gallop home, would probably think nothing of walking into the house and ordering dinner to be instantly served for himself in similar circumstances. In the army, the difficulty of managing recruits on a march, in this respect, has often been remarked. Fatigued with the day's exertions, they can scarcely refrain from food so long as to allow its being properly cooked. They consequently labour under the double disadvantage of eating before the system is in a sufficient state of repose to benefit from the supply, and of having the food in a condition unfit for easy digestion. The old campaigner, instructed by his experience, induces his appetite, kindles his fire, cooks his victuals, makes his arrangements for the night, with a deliberation surprising to the recruit; and he is amply repaid for his temporary self-denial by the greater enjoyment and support which he derives from the very same materials which the impetuosity of the other has caused him in a great measure to waste.—Cumbe's Physiology of Digestion.

EXTRAORDINARY CAVERNS IN MORAVIA.

The number of singular and curious caverns in the mountain districts of Moravia, have long since attracted the attention of the men of science in Germany; many of them contain the bones of animals, particularly those of elephants and bears, completely imbedded in stalactites. When we contemplate these immense masses of spar, and remember they have been formed by single drops of water, the mind is lost when endeavouring to conjecture at what remote period these animals existed. Among the most interesting of these caverns, is that called Schlager Tropfsteinhöhle, near the little town of Sloup, not far distant from Olomütz. Nor is that called the Macocia, which lies between Williamowitz and Nenhof, in a romantic forest, less worthy of attention. This cavern possesses the singular property of attracting electric matter; hence the peasants, whenever the atmosphere indicates an approaching thunder-storm, retreat with their flocks and herds to a considerable distance from such a dangerous neighbourhood. The depth of this cavern is likewise so great, that when a stone is thrown into it, eight seconds elapse before it is heard to reach the water at the bottom; and if a pistol is fired into it, the report heard is equal in loudness to that of a cannon, at the same time the smoke from the powder, uniting with the damp vapour of the cavern, remains nearly an hour on the top in the shape of a bell.—Spencer's Travels in the Western Caucasus.

TREES AND FLOWERS APPROPRIATE TO PLACES OF INTERMENT

At all periods, among every nation, flowers and certain trees seem to have been consecrated to the dead. The Romans planted the wild vine and box around their tombs. The wealthy assigned a beautiful garden to their departed favourites, as in the instance of Augustus and Mæcenas. Not only did they suspend garlands over their tombs, but scattered flowers around them. The same custom prevailed among the Grecians, who considered all purple and white flowers acceptable to the dead. The Thesalians strewed the grave of Achilles with the immortal amaranth and lilies. Electra complains that the tomb of Agamemnon received no myrtle-boughs; in short, instances of this practice are everywhere to be found. Among the Chinese, to the present day, the cypress and the fir shade their cemeteries; the former tree, an attribute of Pluto, was ever considered funeral, hence called feralis; and the feralia were festivals in honour of the dead, observed by the Romans. Varro pretends that the cypress was called funeral from funus, as it emitted a fœtid smell. Pliny and others affirm that it typified the dead, from its never shooting out fresh sprouts when the trunk was cut down. At any rate, to this hour it is planted in burying-grounds in every civilized country.—Curiosities of Medical Experience.

EARLY RISING.

"My morning haunts," writes the divine Milton, "are where they should be, at home; not sleeping or concocting the surfeits of an irregular feast; but up, and stirring; in winter, often ere the sound of our bell awakes men to labour or to devotion; in summer, as early as the bird that first rises, or not much tardier, to read good authors, or cause them to be read, till the attention be weary, or the memory have its full freight; then with useful and generous labours preserving the body's health and hardiness, to render lightsome, clear, and not lumpy obedience to the mind, to the cause of religion, and our country's liberty; and, when it shall require, our firm hearts, in sound bodies, to stand and cover their station."

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM THE JOURNAL OF A YOUNG LADY,
KEPT DURING A VISIT TO COPENHAGEN.

Hamburg, September 10th.

MY DEAR CAROLINE.—We arrived in this city on the seventh; the weather is delightful and the journey, so far, very pleasant. You know that Hamburg is situated at the mouth of the Elbe; its appearance is like that of most of the old German towns I have visited. The houses are four or five stories high and very narrow. Most of the streets are badly paved. On each side of the esplanade, a very pretty walk, is a row of handsome new houses. We have a charming view from the windows of our hotel. Before us, is spread a lake, surrounded by beautiful avenues which form an extremely pleasant walk. We went to the theatre yesterday evening; it is a large and handsome edifice, planned by Schinkel, the celebrated Prussian architect. As we intend setting off at an early hour to-morrow morning, I must end this note.

Copenhagen, September 20th.

I have been so busy since our arrival, that until to-day, I have not had time to write you. We left Hamburg on the eleventh—drove all day and reached Kiel in the evening. There is nothing to be seen in this little town, which, as it is in the Duchy of Holstein, belongs to Denmark. The surrounding country, however, is beautiful, and there is a fine palace in the neighbourhood. The bathing establishment, for Kiel is a seaport, is very spacious and neat.

On the evening of the twelfth, we went on board the Frederick VI., the only steamer that runs between Kiel and Copenhagen. We had a fine passage, although the weather was rainy; it cleared up, however, and the sun shone brightly as we approached Copenhagen. There are two forts at the entrance of the harbour, the larger of which caused some annoyance to Lord Nelson, when he bombarded Copenhagen in 1801; it has since been still more strongly fortified and is now capable of containing two thousand men. The view we had from the steamboat of the quay and of the long line, a walk near the shore, was very pretty. We were taken on shore in a row-boat, found my uncle waiting for us and drove directly to his house. It is one of the finest streets in Copenhagen, and nearly opposite the palace of Princess Caroline, the eldest daughter of the king. There are two large hospitals here; one of them is in this street, as are likewise the academies for cadets and midshipmen. The cadets wear scarlet coats and dark blue trousers; the midshipmen are dressed in blue coats and blue trousers; the former wear swords and round caps; the latter daggers and three-cornered hats.

We went to walk on the ramparts yesterday. Copenhagen has four gates, one at each point of the compass; the ramparts lead from one of these to the other, and are surrounded by a moat. They slope gently down towards each gate, so as to leave the entrance to it open. There is a carriage-road on the ramparts, as well as an elevated foot-path, from whence you have a view of the surrounding country and the beautiful lakes which supply the city with water. I have seen several women selling vegetables, whose costume was very odd. They wear short blue petticoats, made very full; blue or white aprons; and several shawls wrapped around the neck. Their head-dress consists of a blue or red handkerchief tied closely around the head. These women are peasants, who inhabit the island of Amager, which is connected with the city by a bridge.*

I accompanied my aunt to the bathing-house this morning; it is at the west end of the town, and warm and cold baths are to be had there. I must not omit to mention a singular custom in use here. Every time the clock strikes, during the night, the watchman calls the hour and sings or chants a verse. I have seen two or three watchmen in the street. They wear dark blue great-coats and odd-looking caps, and carry wooden clubs with iron spikes at the end of them.

September 20th.—We drove to the garden of Fredericksburg, where the king and queen reside during the summer. It is always open to the public, and much frequented. The palace is of white stone and is very spacious; it is situated on a hill in the centre of the garden. From the terrace before it, you have a charming view. The grounds are laid out with a great deal of taste. They are watered by a narrow stream on which the royal family sometimes sail.

September 23d.—Went to the burial ground. It is at a short distance from the city. It is surrounded by a brick wall, and there are four handsome entrances to it. All the graves are enclosed by hedges or iron railings. A small mound, strewn with sand, is raised in the centre of the grave; on it pots of flowers are placed in a large basket of painted tin. I observed wreaths of fresh flowers hanging on some of the tombstones. A friend told me that they were placed there by the friends of the deceased who often visit the grave. The paths between the graves are carefully weeded and strewn with gravel, so that the whole burial-ground looks like a garden. The road which leads to Fredericksburg, likewise leads to the burial-ground; it is shaded by lime-trees. We passed the monument erected in 1789, by Christian VII., father of the present king, to commemorate the emancipation of the peasants, who up to that time, were slaves. It has the form of an obelisk; and, I should think, from eighteen to twenty yards in height. At the four corners of the pedestal are statues of white marble, representing agriculture, loyalty, courage and patriotism. On one side of the base of the monument is an inscription to the following effect: the corner-stone was laid in 1792, by Frederick, the king's son and the people's friend.

* This island was colonized by Dutch peasants, during the reign of Christian second, in the sixteenth century.

September 27th.—Went to walk in the king's garden; it is at the end of the city. We saw a great many children there; some quite infants, in the arms of their peasant nurses, who were dressed in their pretty national costume; consisting of a scarlet or green gown, with short tight sleeves, long white gloves, and a little black velvet cap, trimmed with beautiful lace, and pink or blue satin ribbons. The castle of Rosenberg is in this garden. It was built about two centuries back, by King Christian IV. It consists of a square building, at the angles of which are four towers of unequal height. The crown-jewels and some other curious things are kept there.

October 2d.—The annual review of the Danish troops is now taking place. My uncle proposed that we should go to see the horse-guards reviewed. The affair takes place on a large field near the city. In driving out of town, we crossed the Amalienberg, a handsome square on which are the palaces of the king, the queen, of the Princess Wilhelmina, their youngest daughter, and of Prince Christian, the heir to the throne. The palaces of the king and queen are connected by an arch, built in imitation of the Brandenburg Gate, at Berlin. But to return to the review. The horse-guards are splendidly mounted and equipped. Their uniform is a buff-coat, a steel breast-plate, light blue trousers and a helmet with a black plume in it. They are armed with swords and pistols. The half of the regiment rode coal-black, the other half brown horses. There were many spectators present. I was quite terrified at seeing the women and children standing so near the horses, or walking between the carriages, but I was assured I need not be alarmed, as accidents on such occasions rarely occur here.

Yesterday we went to the Botanic Garden. It is on a square called the King's New Market. The theatre, the two best hotels in Copenhagen, the Guardhouse (from whence the sentinels, posted in different parts of the city, are sent) and the palace of Charlottenburg, are all on this square. The Botanic Garden is behind the palace, which is uninhabited, but where an exhibition of pictures is held yearly. The garden is open to those who wish to study botany, and there is a good library adjoining it, to which you can obtain admittance. There are many pretty promenades here: to-day we went to one I had not seen before, called the Long-line. In order to reach it, you must cross the esplanade, a broad straight walk, shaded by trees, but not nearly as agreeable as the Long-line. Indeed, I fear I shall not be able to give a very clear description of the latter. It is broad enough for a carriage-road and foot-path, and is bounded, if I may so express myself, on one side by a ditch which separates it from the high ramparts of the citadel, and on the other side by the harbour. In this delightful walk you have the benefit of the sea-air, while the arrival or departure of vessels, gives variety to the landscape.

December 3d.—I received the letter, in which you give me an account of your return to , about three weeks since. As I had nothing of any consequence to tell you, I delayed writing until now. The weather has been very rainy of late, and we have not been able to walk out much. The climate here is quite unlike what I had supposed; not very cold, but damp, windy and rainy. The twenty-eighth of October was the birth-day of the queen, who is a princess of Hesse-Cassel. The royal family attend the theatre on that evening; it was, therefore, proposed that we should go. It was with some difficulty that we succeeded in procuring seats, as the theatre is always very much crowded on this occasion. The royal family entered at six o'clock. Every one rose and remained standing till the king and queen were seated. The national air, which is beautiful, was then played by the orchestra, after which the curtain rose. The inside of this theatre is shaped like a horse-shoe. In the centre of it is a large lustre which is drawn up, when the curtain rises, and lowered at the end of each act. This is, I think, an excellent arrangement, as the glare of light one meets with, at most theatres, fatigues the eyes so much. On each side of the stage is a curtain box, one of which is intended for the royal family, the other for the ladies of honour. The king, dressed in a scarlet uniform, with blue cuffs and facings, the queen, in white satin and ostrich feathers, and two of the princesses occupied the front of the royal box. The king, who is now sixty-eight years old, is of the middle size, but very erect. The princess, Caroline Amelia, the wife of the heir to the throne, is beautiful; she has fine clear blue eyes, and a most benevolent smile. There were many blue eyes at the theatre, whose uniforms added greatly to the splendour of the scene. It was not quite ten o'clock when we reached home, and I am told that the plays here are always out at that hour.

I am reading a very interesting book now, it is "Travels in the Tyrol." The author is Hewald, a Bavarian. I have translated some passages from it as an exercise; I will enclose them in this letter.

On the way to Sellain you pass through Axam, from whence you have a view of the village of Hyper Perfluss, where several distinguished Tyrolese were born: among these was Peter Haider. In 1797 when General Toubert had advanced as far as Mühlbach and had compelled Field-marshal Kerpert to retreat on Sterzing, a general levy of troops from the valleys of the Inn and the Wipp, was ordered. A party of those troops marched towards Mühlbach, in order to attack the right flank of the enemy which was stationed there. Haider was corporal in the division of five hundred men, who defended themselves so bravely during the bloody skirmish of the second of April, 1797. The captain and nineteen of his men were killed, twenty-four men were wounded. Haider displayed much courage, and during the thickest of the fight, killed six Frenchmen with his own hand. He was thus separated from his companions and was suddenly surrounded by five French soldiers. He killed two of them and wounded a third, but almost at the same moment a chance shot wounded him in his left leg, and while sinking to the ground he received a sabre cut across his right hand. His two remaining enemies now gave him several severe wounds on his head, and as he carefully avoided stirring or making any noise, they believed him to be dead, and left him lying in a thicket. As soon as they were out of sight, Haider raised himself and bound his pocket-handkerchief around his head. Having no other bandage, he was compelled to leave his other wounds uncovered. With the greatest difficulty he then moved forward, and had not advanced far before he perceived a wounded Tyrolese. Haider hailed him, and when he approached, recognised in him his brother, Pancraz. They were both too severely wounded to be able to give each other any assistance. Weakness, together with the fear of being discovered, compelled them to remain for thirty-seven hours in the wood, without food or even water. On the fourth of April, finding it impossible to remain there any longer, they dragged themselves on as far as Mühlbach, which although but at the distance of a quarter of a mile, it took them two hours to reach. When about crossing the bridge by which you enter the village, they observed that the enemy were issuing from the valley of the Valsér. Haider and his brother found it necessary to hide themselves, and therefore crept into the machinery of a mill; but in constant fear and anxiety lest the mill should begin to turn, they soon left their hiding-place and sought refuge in a stable; but as they were not in security even there, a kind-hearted old woman gave them shelter in her cottage. On the fifth a surgeon visited them, and declared that Peter's wounds were mortal. He and his brother, however, passed a fortnight in this hut, and were then removed to their home, where an experienced surgeon attended them. Although they suffered indescribable pain, their wounds were at last healed, their health restored, and Peter was enabled to serve again in the campaign of 1799.

"We are now in Italy! Every object before us proves it. The grape grows by the side of the mulberry—the road is shaded by the weeping-willow and scacia—occasionally you see an olive tree or a slender cypress shooting up its graceful form into the clear sky. The houses no longer have that comfortable appearance which characterizes the German dwelling, for they are only built as a shelter during the occasional inclemency of the weather: they are seldom needed, the heavens are so blue, the sun so warm, the people enjoy themselves so much in the open air. Here the German language is only spoken by travellers. The sow harm vanishes, rice and pasta take their place. Thus, amid a charming landscape, Roveredo rises before you. It is a pity that you already meet with the Italian custom of enclosing the fields with walls instead of hedges or fences. This often deprives you of the view, and if you wish to see more of it, you are compelled to stand up in the carriage. We entered Roveredo and drove rapidly over the Corso, which exhibits several handsome buildings and two inns; these are called 'The Crown' and 'The Little Horse.' I have been at both and can particularly recommend the latter. The parents of the host were Germans, and he speaks their language. The house is airy, neat and elegant, the dinners are excellent. We had the best of vegetables, truffles in abundance and a dessert, consisting of such fruit, as all the hot-houses of a northern prince could not produce. The Germans, in general, are unjust towards Italian cookery. They come to Italy prejudiced against the use the Italians make of oil in their cookery, and the bare idea of it spoils the appetite of many; but I can give some consolation to those who dislike it. In this part of the country it is never used in soup, macaroni, or in any dish composed of flour for the batter; fresh butter, which is to be had in abundance, is employed. Vegetables, and some national dishes, as is certainly very proper, are cooked in oil. Whoever wishes to be quite secure, can ask for fish, capon, roasted veal or macaroni, and may be quite certain that the dreaded oil will not touch his lips. I was glad to find that at Roveredo lemon-juice takes the place of vinegar: boiled vegetables, with fresh oil, lemon-juice and pepper, are excellent.

"Many Tyrolese peasants employ themselves in their leisure hours with repairing or even making watches. Hell, a countryman, born in the village of Tyrol, carved those curious bas-reliefs in wood which are to be seen in the museum of Innsbruck. The case of Joseph Kleinbans, a blind man, who carves in wood, is very remarkable. He was so unfortunate as to lose his sight when only four years old. While a child he amused himself by making little horses, or other playthings of wood. In his twelfth year he carved a crucifix, which excited a great deal of praise, and encouraged him to make other attempts. In his twenty-second year he went to Fügen, where he visited the sculptor Nussel, and received some instruction from him. He now resides at Innsbruck, and is perfectly resigned to his fate, which is greatly solaced by the amusing occupation he has created for himself."

January 6th.—I have enjoyed myself very much during the past fortnight, and I often wished that you were here. On Christmas eve we were at a party at Mr. ——. His daughters are fine girls, and speak English extremely well. Indeed, I am surprised to find how many persons here speak English. I believe that the Danes have a great facility for learning languages. Every well-educated person not only understands, but speaks German and French with fluency. But to return to my party: about fifty persons were present, and the half of these were children. There were little boys and girls of all ages; some of them not more than five years old. It was amusing to see so many little girls, all nicely dressed in white frocks. A Christmas tree had been prepared for the amusement of the children. This is a young pine, placed in a large tub. Wax-lights are stuck on the branches, which are then hung with sugar-plums, grapes, raisins, gilded apples, walnuts, etc. At a given signal the children began to take whatever they liked best, and they did not stop till the tree was completely stripped. Tea was then handed round and the dancing began. Waltzes and quadrilles were danced alternately till ten o'clock, when the children went to supper. The supper-table was spread in the dining-room and the grown persons assembled round it. The principal dishes on this occasion, were salad, with chopped beets and potatoes; sandwiches and different kinds of cake. After supper the children retired and the elder persons danced for a couple of hours. I am glad to have had an opportunity of seeing this truly Danish fête.

We had much snow during the last week in December. Sleighing ourselves, we had the pleasure of seeing people enjoying themselves in this way. The sleighs here are generally very small and light, and therefore easily overturned. They only contain two persons; the driver stands behind. It is the custom for the royal family and the court to make a sleighing party once in the course of the winter, but during the last two or three so little snow has fallen that they have not been able to do it.

We went a few days since to visit the picture-gallery at the palace of Christiansburg, an immense and beautiful building. The marketplace is quite near it, and thus we had an opportunity of seeing the peasants who were there selling vegetables. The men wear green or crimson jackets, ornamented with silver buttons, black loose drawers, dark blue stockings, and silver buckles in their shoes. A low-crowned heaver hat completes their costume. The dress of the women is that which I have already described; viz.: dark clothes, blue or white aprons and two or three very gay shawls. The palace of Christiansburg has been burned and rebuilt at three different periods; it is very spacious. There is a large court-yard behind it, surrounded by the king's stables, which are capable of containing two hundred horses. The chapel, where the royal family attend divine service, is at the right side of the palace. The king's library, which is said to contain four hundred thousand volumes, is near it.

The collection of paintings is contained in twelve large and lofty rooms. Christian IV. may be said to have been the founder of this gallery; Frederick IV. extended it by purchasing many beautiful pictures during his travels in Italy; and under the present reign, two private collections have been added to it. It consists of nine hundred and twenty pictures, and these are of the Italian, French, German, Flemish and Dutch schools. It would be a difficult, and I think also a useless task, for me to attempt the description of any of them.

Yesterday evening we went to the theatre, in order to see "The Dumb Girl of Portici." Mrs. Heiberg, the first tragic actress here, performed the part of the dumb girl extremely well. She is not handsome, but her face is expressive and her figure graceful.

March 17th.—We visited the castle of Rosenberg a few days since. I believe I have already told you that it was built by Christian IV. in order to enjoy the country air without removing to any great distance from the town. It was planned by Inigo Jones, and is constructed in a half Gothic style, with a large tower looking towards the garden, two others looking into the court-yard, and a fourth, which forms the entrance. The whole of the third story of the castle is occupied by a saloon, hung with tapestry of Danish manufacture, representing several battles which took place during the reign of Christian V. Many curiosities are preserved in the towers of the castle. Among these are a great deal of beautiful porcelain and cut glass; many pretty trifles turned in ivory by royal porcelain; the cap worn by Christian IV. at the battle of Femern, where he lost one of his eyes, etc. His pocket-handkerchief and the blood-stained bandage used for covering his eye, are also preserved. We were shown the thrones used at the coronation of the kings and queens of Denmark. They stand in a large hall where the high court of justice meets. The king presides and hears a cause pleaded there once a year. His majesty's throne is a curious piece of Gothic workmanship; a large amethyst and two emeralds are set in the back of it. Two silver lions, as large as life, are placed on each side of it, and when it is used, it is surrounded by a cushion of gold brocade. The queen's throne is encrusted with massive silver; the curtain belonging to it is of silver brocade. The sacred vase, used at the baptism of royal children, is superb. It consists of a pedestal of chased silver, supporting a large silver dish. In one room we saw several pieces of furniture of the most splendid description, such as mirrors with silver frames, silver audirons, gold boxes, vases, etc. We were shown a saddle, bridle and all the trappings of a horse, decorated with precious jewels—the marriage gift of Christian IV. to his son. We saw many other curiosities of which I shall only describe two, which struck me as being the prettiest there. The one was a looking-glass, about a foot square, with an enamelled frame, inlaid with rubies, emeralds and opals; the other was a little grapevine of enamel, the grapes made of amethysts and emeralds. I think you will agree with me in my admiration of these two little treasures.

I am reading "The Correspondence of Madame Campan with Queen Hortense," which is a delightful book. In some of the letters, written during the consulate, Madame Campan gives the same advice to her pupil, as your mother did to me before my departure, viz.: "Read your letters over after you have written them; recollect, that in writing you give the exact measure of your talents, mind and education. The note of a woman, even if addressed to her milliner or mantuamaker, may be seen by well-informed persons who will judge from it how she has been educated. Do not let your letters be too long: write on a small sheet, you will thus be better able to see what you have written, and to avoid the useless repetition of words. With a little care, you will succeed in attaining a most valuable talent."

May 9th.—Yesterday we went to Charlottenlund, a wood about two miles distant from town. Tents, where tea and refreshments are served, are pitched near the entrance. It is customary here for two or three families to drive together to some pleasant spot in the country and dine there in the open air. Charlottenlund is a favourite resort for such parties. I cannot tell you what charming walks and magnificent trees there are in this wood. Most of the paths are shaded by beeches; their foliage is so fresh and bright at this season. Princess Charlotte, the king's cousin, lives in the centre of the wood. Her palace, which is quite simple, is surrounded by a neat garden.

The exhibition of pictures at the Academy of Arts is now taking place. We went to see it last week. Those pictures which pleased me most were some flower-pieces, executed by the Danish artist, Jensen. He has lately been in Italy, and has painted many beautiful Italian flowers for this year's exhibition with great success. We visited Roskilde a few days since. This was the ancient capital, as it is now the burial-place of the Danish kings. We left town at ten o'clock in the morning and reached Roskilde at two. The road is bad, and the country through which you pass not by any means pleasant.

The famous cathedral of Roskilde was built in 1074, on the site of the first Christian church in this part of Denmark. Its founder was Bishop Willam, the confessor of Canute the Great. The church is filled with fine monuments of the kings of the house of Oldenburg, mostly by Italian artists. The most remarkable of these is that of Margaret, queen of Denmark, Sweden and Normandy, commonly called the Semiramis of the North. The remains of Christian IV. the great king of Denmark, repose in a vault beneath the church. His coffin is covered with black velvet; his sword lies upon it. The altarpiece of the cathedral is of wood, very curiously carved. The town of Roskilde is small and very much decayed, before the removal of the seat of government to Copenhagen, it was a place of considerable importance.

MATILDA

LEGENDARY SKETCHES.

THE CONVICT'S BRIDE.

It was a dark, dreary morning in the December of 178—. The ground was covered with snow, and the bleak wind was howling in terrific gusts through the streets. Yet, despite the inclemency of the weather, crowds of persons of all classes, and, among them many of the weaker sex, might be seen hurrying towards the Place de Gréve. It was the morning appointed for the execution of Victor d'Aubigny.

The circumstance which had called for this expiation of life at the altar of justice, are brief as follows—and, blinded with the strong love of excitement, so universal among the French, account, in some degree, for the eager curiosity discernible in the multitude, now hastening to the awful spectacle of a fellow-creature, in the full flush of youth and health, being plunged into the gulf of an unknown eternity. The crime for which Victor d'Aubigny was doomed to suffer was forgery. Remorseless, pitiless, interest, all had been tried to avert the fatal penalty. The offence was one of frequent occurrence, and must be checked, even at the costly sacrifice of a human life. Fortunately in our days the law is satisfied with less than the blood of its victim. In every country apologists are to be found for guilt, and sympathy is more readily excited when the perpetrator is endowed with great person, or mental advantages, or fills a position above the ordinary level in society. All these Victor d'Aubigny possessed; he had also the higher distinction of having, up to the period of his crime, borne a blameless character. From their earliest youth a close intimacy had subsisted between himself and Auguste de Biron. Similarity of age and pursuit, both being intended for the army, united them more than congeniality of disposition; for the warm generosity of Victor bore little resemblance to the cold, suspicious, vindictive nature of Auguste. They were alike only in their pursuit of pleasure, though even in the prosecution of this the taste of each took a different bias. The strong and feverish excitement of the gambling-table too well suited the eager temperament of Victor. He who, in the midst of the most profligate capital of the world, had strength to resist all other allurements, fell a ready prey to that vice, whose fatal indulgence has often paved the way for the commission of almost every crime.

Auguste, on the other hand, shunning the dazzling salons of play, was a nightly visitor of the metropolitan theatres—not to enjoy the wit of Molière, or the genius of Racine, but to watch the airy movements of some figurante in the ballet. As they advanced to manhood, the success of D'Aubigny in society called perpetually into play the evil passions of his companion, whose feelings gradually changed from friendship to dislike, and deepened into hatred implacable and bitter, on the refusal of his hand by a lady, who, assigned, as the reason, a mad, though unreturned passion, for his friend. Auguste controlled his resentment outwardly, and left Paris.

Victor at this period was betrothed to a lovely but portionless girl, and the day for the nuptials was fixed. A few evenings previous, he entered one of the gambling establishments with which Paris abounds. Enough, he was tempted to play, and in a short time found himself a loser to double the amount of all the ready money he could command. He rushed from the house in a state of pique. The money must be paid on the following day. To whom could he apply? Auguste, who might have assisted him, was in England, whither he had gone to be present at the début of a celebrated dancer. He suddenly recollected that his friend had left a large sum at his banker's. Forgetful, in the desperation of the moment, of everything but escape from present embarrassment, he forged a check for the sum required. It was duly honoured—but his doom was sealed. He instantly wrote to apprise De Biron of what he had done; pleading in mitigation that they had often shared the same purse, and binding himself to return the money at the earliest possible period. No reply was given to his letter. The time flew onward—the day for his marriage arrived. The bridal solemnity was over, when, as the party were leaving the church, D'Aubigny was arrested on a charge of forgery!

The trial and condemnation rapidly succeeded, and the day of execution dawned too soon. Victor met his death calmly and resignedly. But it is not with him our tale has to do—it is with her, the beautiful, the bereaved one—with Isabelle D'Aubigny, the convict's bride. From the period when the promulgation of his sentence rung in her ears, to that moment in which the fatal axe fell on the throat of its victim, nor sigh, nor tear, nor word, had escaped her. Every faculty seemed suspended by misery. The last, long embrace of her husband—the wild choking sob which burst from him, as she left his cell the night prior to his execution—the thousand frantic passionate kisses which he showered on her marble face, at the foot of the scaffold, all failed to dissolve the trance of grief into which she had fallen. But the moment of awakening agony came at last! When the guillotine had done its office, and the body of her beloved Victor lay bleeding and dead before her—sorrow, asserting its omnipotent sway over humanity, shivered the feeble barriers of temporary unconsciousness, and let the imprisoned mind free to contemplate the ruin of its only earthly hope, the extinction of all youth's sweetest visions. Then came the groan of anguish, the shriek of despair—the straining of the eyeballs, to assure itself of that which stretched every fibre of the heart with agony, till it almost burst with the tension. Then came that piercing look into future years, which so often accompanies calamity in its freshness; when all that would have sustained us beneath the heavy load, has been wrenched from us, for ever and ever!

Vainly the friends who surrounded Isabelle strove to tear her from the body of Victor. There was fascination in the gaze, though horror was blended with it. Her own, her beautiful, lay a mutilated corpse before her—she whom she had loved with an absorbing intensity, which would have defied time to lessen, circumstance to change—with whom she had hoped to journey through existence, partake of his pleasures, soothe of his griefs. And now she was alone and desolate! Then indeed did she feel, that fate had levelled its deadliest weapon; and henceforth every hour was stamped with stern, unchanging, dreary despair. Great misfortunes either strengthen or enfeeble the mind. When the grave had closed over the body of Victor, Isabelle—the weak, the gentle, the timid Isabelle, returned to her lonely hearth, a calm, stern, determined woman.

All the élite of Milan were gathered together in the magnificent theatre of La Scala. Beauty lent its attraction, rank its patronage, and fashion its influence, to grace the farewell benefit of "La Fiorinda," the unvalued dansette, the bosom of Italy, the idol of the Milanese.

It is not an easy task to rouse an English audience into a furore of ecstasy: an Italian one is composed of material of a more inflammable nature; and demonstrations which would seem to us extravagant and absurd, only appear to them a most homage to genius. To-night their wonted enthusiasm received double impetus, from the consciousness that it was the last public testimony they could afford, of their appreciation of the consummate skill and loveliness of the fair creature before them. The ensuing week would see her united to a wealthy noble, and this night witness her parting obeisance to an audience, of whom all the men were her worshippers, and even the women her partisans and admirers. The curtain rose, and certainly the appearance of the heroine of the evening was wondrous enough for the burst of rapturous applause which followed. Her form, itself of the most faultless symmetry, acquired additional captivation, from the display and coolness permitted by theatrical costume. Her face, too, was one of surpassing beauty. Large, deep blue eyes, waves of the glossiest hair, and a skin of that clear transparent whiteness, which shows with such dazzling effect at night—all these attractions were in themselves enough to fascinate the sight. But there was that about "La Fiorinda" which interested the feelings fully as much. The dreamy melancholy of her profound and passionate eyes—the entire repose of all her features—the extraordinary expression about the small cherub mouth, which seemed formed for love and smiles, yet which none had ever seen relax into a smile—this it was which lent such witchery to her beauty, and threw around her a kind of mysterious charm, even amid the glare and frivolity with which she was surrounded.

Though assailed by temptation in every shape, so rigid and unblemished had been her conduct, that the noble family, to which she was about to be allied, vainly sought in it a pretext to dissolve the engagement between herself and her relative. Yet she lived in utter unprotectedness, with only the companionship of a young girl who officiated as her attendant. With society she never mixed, nor left her home, except to attend her professional duties.

On this her last evening of public existence, all was done that could render her exit triumphant. The stage was literally filled with bouquets flung at her feet, accompanied by many a valuable and less perishing testimony to her worth and talent. When she made her farewell acknowledgments, each felt a pang of regret at parting with one so lovely and gifted, and many a bright eye was filled with tears—yet she, the cause, alone remained unmoved. There was gratitude in the graceful bowing of the head, and the meek frowning of her hands on her bosom—but the face was calm and impassive as ever. The curtain fell amid an outbreak of such feeling, as shook the walls of La Scala to their foundation, and Fiorinda was seen there no more.

"Now pray, signora, on this your wedding-day, do look as if you were happy—Heigho! if I was so beautiful, beloved too by the marchese, I should be smiling all day long."

"My good Rosalia, I have long forgotten to smile or weep. In truth, poor child! you have had but a wearisome life, in attending on one in whose bosom the pulse of joy hath for ever stopped."

"O say not so, Signora! all the girls in Milan will be glad to wait on one so kind, so gracious, so gentle a mistress—ay, and so pretty a one too. For when I am braiding those long tresses, or fastening the sample on your tiny feet, I feel quite proud in being permitted to serve La Fiorinda, who, all Milan says, has borrowed the face and form of the famous Venus at Florence."

"Fie on thee, child! I would chide thee for this flattery, but that an unkind word ever sends foolish tears into thine eyes. But hush, Rosalia; the time wears on. Give me my veil, and leave me." The attendant did as she was bidden, and "La Fiorinda" was alone. For awhile she sat in deep meditation, her small white hands pressed upon her brow, as if to still the tumult of feelings rushing through her brain. The day at length had come for which she had patiently waited for years; for which she had devoted herself to a profession which she abhorred, and toiled in it laboriously and ceaselessly—and nourished a life, she would otherwise have allowed the midwife of grief to corrode and destroy. The hour was at hand, when the one purpose of her existence was to be realized—the long recorded vow fulfilled. The near accomplishment of her wishes gave to the cheek of Florida a flush of crimson, deep as the sunset of summer, and lit up her lustrous eyes with almost unearthly brightness. As she contemplated herself in the mirror, arrayed in all its costly magnificence of bridal attire, vainly for a moment preponderated; but it was a transient weakness. An instant more—the brow resumed its look of calm, stern determination—the beautiful mouth, its compressed rigidity. Having adjusted the orange wreath on her temples, and arranged the drapery of the long delicate veil, whose snowy folds enveloped her form from head to foot, she entered the conservatory adjoining her chamber, and taking from it a bouquet of choicest flowers, awaited the arrival of her bride-maids and friends. In a few minutes the expected guests assembled, and leaning on the arm of the brother of her betrothed, she entered one of the carriages, and the party proceeded to the church of St. Ambrose. The nuptial rites were performed—and Florida was greeted as La Marchesa di Vivaldi.

The marchese, gently passing his arm around her waist, would fain have folded her to his bosom. A quick shudder, which seemed to convulse every limb, passed over her.

"My beautiful love looks pale!"

"'Tis nothing—a sudden faintness. I called these flowers for you, your favourite heliotrope is there; take them—you will not surely refuse your bride's first gift!"

The marchese took the bouquet presented, pressed them passionately to his lips, inhaled their fragrance, and fell at the feet of Florida a lifeless car.

A wild, unnatural burst of laughter from the marchese pealed through the church. "It is well—it is well! Victor, my beloved, thou art avenged. Now I will join thee."

Uttering these words, she took from beneath the folds of her dress a small poniard, and buried it to the hilt in her breast.

The bride and the bridegroom lay dead together!

On searching her desk, a paper was found, explanatory of the catastrophe. It is scarcely necessary to say, that "La Florida" was the name assumed by Isabelle d'Aubigny. In the record left of her motives and actions, she stated that after the execution of Victor, she made a solemn vow to become his avenger—but with a refined revenge, when his destroyer, De Biron, was at the height of earthly bliss. For this purpose her first aim was to captivate his heart. As the widow of Victor, she might fall in this. She was aware that he was a passionate admirer of dancing. Through the agency of that accomplishment, superadded to her beauty of person, she hoped to ensnare his affections. Her first step was to become the pupil of the most celebrated master of the day, and by dint of unremitting toil, she soon qualified herself for public exhibition. She resolved to appear in Italy, to which country Auguste de Biron had returned, to escape the strong manifestations of dislike which, after the execution of Victor d'Aubigny, followed him whenever he entered society at Paris. He was also the heir to a title and considerable estates in the Abruzzi. The death of his relative, soon put him in possession of these, and he became the Marchese di Vivaldi. At this period, Florida, who was cognizant of all that befel him, made her debut at Naples. All Italy soon rung with her fame—and she was offered an engagement at "La Scala." She accepted it—appeared—became the idol of the public—and soon the object of her revenge bowed at her feet a suppliant for her love—a suitor for her hand. She accepted him. During the life of Victor, he had never seen her; and who, that looked on her fair unruffled brow, or listened to the music of her low sweet voice, could imagine that in her breast every particle of womanly softness was extirpated—that her thoughts were only of revenge and death. It was at the altar's foot, her adored Victor had been torn from her arms; it should be at the altar's foot the expiatory sacrifice should be made—his murderer destroyed. She procured from the East a deadly poison, the simple inhalation of which produces abrupt and certain death. Every flower in the bouquet was steeped in the deadly essence: its effects have been narrated—and thus, by one of those frightful transitions, which circumstances occasion in human destiny, where the restraining influence of fixed religious principle is absent, Isabelle, once loving and irresolute, became a murderess and a suicide!

A CHARGE—BY PRAED.

He talked of daggers and of darts,
Of passions and of pains,
Of weeping eyes and wounded hearts,
Of kisses and of chains;
He said, though love was kin to grief,
He was not born to grieve;
He said, though many need belief,
She safely might believe;
But still the lady shook her head,
And swore, by yea and nay,
My whole was all that he had said,
And all that he could say.

He said my first—whose silent car
Was slowly wandering by,
Veiled in a vapour, faint and far,
Through the unshrouded sky,
Was like the smile, whose rosy light
Across her young lips pass'd,
Yet, oh! it was not half so bright,
It changed not half so fast:
But still the lady shook her head,
And swore, by yea and nay,
My whole was all that he had said,
And all that he could say.

And then he set a cypress wreath
Upon his raven hair,
And drew his rapier from its sheath,
Which made the lady stare;
And said, his life blood's purple flow
My second tears should dim,
If she be loved and worshipped so,
Would only weep for him:
But still the lady shook her head,
And swore, by yea and nay,
My whole was all that he had said,
And all that he could say.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICES.

CARL THEODOR KORNER.

THE warlike bands of ancient Greece, who animated their countrymen on the battle-field by bursts of spirit-stirring song—the troubadours of the days of chivalry, who waved their swords to strains of knightly prowess or of ladies' love—have in modern times found a prototype and an equal in the person of a young soldier-poet of Germany, Carl Theodor Korner. This gifted being was born at Dresden, on the twenty-third September of the year 1791, and was the son of a respectable Saxon councillor of appeals. In childhood Theodor was afflicted with considerable weakness of constitution, which retarded his education a little; but as he advanced in years, his bodily strength increased, chiefly by the practice of gymnastic exercises, in which he became remarkably expert. He excelled as a dancer, a swimmer, a fencer, and a rider. His mental faculties developed themselves with his increasing bodily vigour. History, natural philosophy, and mathematics, were his favourite studies of a severe order, and, among the lighter branches of knowledge, his tastes led him strongly to poetry and music. At a very early age he played finely on the guitar, and wrote various little pieces for that instrument, which were much admired. His father in his represented not encouraged the poetical tendencies of Theodor; but when it is mentioned that the poets Schiller and Oehlenschlaeger (the Dane) were among the intimate friends of the family, it may well be supposed that the spirit of song inherent in the breast of young Korner was not left without encouragement and fostering praise.

On reaching the age of seventeen, Theodor Korner was sent to Freyberg to prosecute the study of the mining art, which he had chosen to follow as his profession. At Freyberg he had the good fortune to enjoy the instructions and friendship of the celebrated mineralogist, Werner, and made distinguished progress in his studies.

In August, 1811, when he had not yet completed his twentieth year, he arrived in the Austrian capital, and now his career may be said to have commenced. His father was in easy circumstances, but it would appear that Korner on his first arrival in Vienna, found a means of subsistence in the scientific knowledge he had already acquired. Poetry, however, always his passion, soon became his business. He began to write for the stage, and in the course of a very short time produced many successful pieces, which raised their young author high in the esteem of his countrymen. Korner enjoyed at Vienna the friendship of Humboldt, Schlegel, Caroline Pichler, and other distinguished persons. The result of the general admiration which his compositions excited, was his appointment to the post of Poet of the Court Theatre—an official situation of this kind being the general way of making a permanent provision for poetical merit in Germany. But Korner had held this office only a few months, when the Prussians joined the other German armies, then campaigning against the French invaders. Theodor had already almost determined upon taking up his sword for his country; and this movement of Prussia, which he thought full of hope to the cause of German liberty, decided him upon the step. Though at the moment on the eve of being united to a young lady whom he loved deeply, Korner thought the call of duty paramount, and left Vienna, on the fifteenth of March, 1813, to join the Prussian army. "I must oppose my breast to the waves of the storm! Could I, think you, stand aloof, contented to celebrate, with weak inspiration, the success of my conquering brethren?"

Korner found, at Breslau, a free or voluntary corps in progress of formation, which, from its commander, Major Von Lutnow, was called Lutnow's Free Corps. This corps was filled with men vowed to freedom; it contained officers, artists, and landed gentlemen in its ranks, all inspired with the most enthusiastic patriotism. Such a corps was perfectly suited to the tastes of Korner, and he enrolled himself in it immediately. His comrades soon raised him to the rank of lieutenant, for they were spirits exactly of the order to be delighted with the martial and soul-animating strains which he composed for them. So drenched was this body of the French in the course of the succeeding war, that Napoleon, it is said, laid a plan on one occasion for cutting them off at a blow. The first battle in which Korner was present, took place at Danneberg, on the twelfth of May, 1813, and on the morning before the onset, he composed his famous "War Song." On the seventeenth of June following, the Lutnow Free Corps were surrounded in the neighbourhood of Leipsack, and as an armistice had just been concluded, Theodor was sent by Major Lutnow to seek an explanation from the hostile commander. Instead of giving this, the cowardly officer struck a blow at the unprepared Korner with his sabre, and a general attack instantly followed on the free corps, which, being comparatively weak in numbers, was compelled to retreat. In the confusion, Korner was unnoticed. The stroke made at him had severely wounded his head. Another blow followed, and Korner fell back on his horse; but, recovering himself, he was borne by his spirited charger in safety to a neighbouring wood. Here he found a comrade who helped to bind up his wounds. While thus engaged, a pursuing band of the foe appeared, and would have captured or killed him, had not Korner, with admirable presence of mind, turned his head to the wood, and cried with a loud voice, "Fourth squadron advance!" The stratagem succeeded; the enemy were alarmed, and retreated.

Moving farther into the woods, the wounded poet spent there the night. During this period, while expecting nothing but death, worn and exhausted, he composed the following sonnet.

"FAREWELL TO LIFE.

Written as I lay, severely wounded and helpless, in a wood, expecting to die.

My deep wound burns; my pale lips quake in death—
I feel my fainting heart resign its strife.
And reaching nigh the limit of my life,
Lord! to thy will I yield my parting breath!
Yet many a dream hath charmed my youthful eye.
And must life's fairy visions all depart?
Oh surely no! for all that fired my heart
To rapture here shall live with me on high.
And that fair form that won my earliest vow,
That my young spirit prized all else above,
And now adorned as freedom, now as love,
Stands in seraphic guise before me now—
And as my fading senses ebb away,
It beckons me, on high, to realms of endless day!"

As Korner composed these verses, in a situation realizing the supposed scene of Burns's "Farewell, thou fair day," he heard the enemy searching the wood at times, but at last he fell asleep. When he awoke, two peasants were standing over him. They had been sent to aid by his comrades, and they bore him secretly to the nearest village, whence he was conveyed, a few days afterwards, to Leipsack, then in possession of the enemy. As Korner was known to have with him the money of the Lutnow corps, he was eagerly sought for, but his friends were faithful, and on his wounds being partly healed, he left Leipsack for Berlin. In this city he speedily made a complete recovery, and had returned to his post in the Lutnow corps, who were ordered to the right bank of the Elbe, above Hamburg, before the seventeenth of August, when hostilities recommenced. Nine days afterward, Major Lutnow led his corps to the attack of a transport of provisions, escorted by two regiments of the enemy. On the morning of that day, the twenty-sixth of August, Theodor Korner wrote one of the most extraordinary pieces that ever came from poet's pen. It is almost untranslatable; but as much of its power and beauty, as can be given in a version, is given, perhaps, in the following translation, which appeared some years ago in a popular periodical:

THE SWORD SONG.

Thou sword upon my belted vest,
What means thy glittering, polish'd crest,
Thus in my ardent glowing breast
Raising a flame!—Hurrah!

"A horseman brave supports my blade,
The weapon of a freeman made—
For him I shine, for him I wade
Through blood and death—Hurrah!"

Yes, my good sword, I still am free,
And fond affection bears to thee,
As if thou wert betrothed to me,
My first dear bride—Hurrah!

Soldier of freedom, then I'm thine!
For thee alone my blade shall shine—
When, soldier, shall I call thee mine,
Joined in the field?—Hurrah!"

Soon shall our bridal morn arise!
When the shrill trumpet's summons flies,
And red guns flash along the skies,
We'll join our hands—Hurrah!

"O sacred union! Haste away,
Ye tardy moments of delay—
I long, my bridegroom, for the day
To be thy bride—Hurrah!"

Then why cling to the scabbard—why!
Thou messenger of destiny—
So wild, so fond of battle cry,
Why clingest thou there!—Hurrah!

"Though fond in battle-field to serve,
I hold myself in dread reserve,
The cause of freedom to preserve—
For this I stay—Hurrah!"

Then still in narrow compass rest—
Ere a long space thou shalt be blest,
Within my ardent grasp compress,
Ready for fight—Hurrah!

"O, let me not too long await!
I love the glory of fate,
Where death's rich roses grow elate
In bloody bloom—Hurrah!"

Then forth! quick from thy scabbard fly,
Thou treasure of the soldier's eye—
Come, to the scene of slaughter hie,
Thy chieftain's home—Hurrah!"

"O, glorious thus in nuptial tie,
To wed beneath heaven's canopy!
Bright, as a sunbeam of glory,
Glitters your bride—Hurrah!"

Forth, then, thou messenger of strife!
Thou German soldier's plighted wife!
Who feels not renovated life—
When clasping thee!—Hurrah!

While in thy scabbard at my side,
I seldom gazed on thee, my bride—
Now heaven has bid us ne'er divide—
For ever join'd—Hurrah!

Thee glowing to my lips I'll press,
And all my ardent vows confess—
O cursed be he yonder redress
Who'd thee forsake—Hurrah!

Let joy sit in thy polish'd eyes,
While glancing sparks flash from thine—
Our marriage day dawns in the skies,
My bride of steel—Hurrah!"

While Korner was reading these lines of living fire to one of his companions, shortly after he had pencilled them down in his notebook, the signal for attack was sounded. The sounder were beat back, and fled. One of the most bold in the pursuit was Korner; but the enemy halted, and sent back a shower of balls, one of which struck the young hero in the spine and liver, depriving him immediately of consciousness. He was carried back, and put under a surgeon's care, but life was soon over with Theodor Korner. He had not yet completed his twenty-second year. He was interred by his weeping friends under an oak near the village of Wobelin. When peace was re-established, the place where he lay was enclosed, and a handsome monument erected, bearing an inscription, and ornamented with images of the "Lyre and Sword," an appropriate title given to a collection of his smaller pieces. His countrymen hold the memory of Theodor Korner in reverence and admiration, and may well do so; for, if ever poet sang and warrior fought with a noble and sacred purpose, such was the character of the impulses that inspired the verse and unsheathed the "steel-bride" of the young soldier-bard of Germany.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received a long and amusing communication from a lady, representing the practice of wearing bonnets in places of public assembly. We agree very fully with our correspondent that it is a custom more honored in the breach than in the observance. The communication, which is extremely well written, should appear but for its length.—To the inquiry of "Viva la Musica," we can only reply, that we believe Miss Sheroff, with her satellites, Wilson and Seguis, returns to the National in February.—We must decline the communications of "Robt," "T. J.," "Ernest," "Connaisseur," "L. E. V.," and "N. N." Our next number will contain an ample account, from a competent hand, of the proceedings of the society of St. Nicholas, at its last meeting.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1839

The copy-right bill.—We are glad to see that Mr. Clay has renewed his efforts in behalf of American and British authors, and caused his copy-right bill to be referred to the committee on the Judiciary. We trust that the good sense of Congress will at length see the propriety and justice of adopting this most righteous measure. Literature can never be a thriving plant in this country, so long as native authors have to contend with the competition of a host of unpaid British writers. Why should not intellectual labour be entitled to an equal protection with manual labour and handicraft? Is it less exhausting to the physical system, or does it contribute less to the great interests of civilization and social order? The distinction is unfair and inequitable. The English mechanic can consign the productions of his industry and skill to the care of the American merchant, and reap the emolument he claims. The English author is permitted to derive no advantage from the sale of his intellectual productions in this country. His works may be pirated and mutilated, and he have no redress. This system is as injurious and oppressive to native authors as it is unjust toward those of Great Britain. We trust that our legislators will be enlightened enough to perceive the advantages which must accrue to American literature, from the adoption of Mr. Clay's bill.

Sully's Portrait of Victoria.—We learn from the United States Gazette that Mr. Sully has at length completed his portrait of the youthful queen. He has gratified a few friends by a private exhibition at his studio, previous to its public exhibition. The queen is taken as if ascending the throne, and in order to give a proper idea of that appliance of majesty, Mr. Sully has copied the throne which is standing in the House of Lords, covering the steps with cloth of gold. The face of the queen is, in expression, that which we saw upon English prints of her majesty; the artist, however, has ventured upon a truth that many of his craft shrink from. He has left the lips of his figure open, a peculiarity of the queen's face, and one which is thought in a picture to derogate from "intellectuality." It is evident that Mr. Sully understood his mission: he has painted a likeness of the queen, and has devoted great attention to the face, whither we all turn to judge of her likeness. The features, though delicate and feminine, are of the Brunswick mould. The bold eye and projecting nose testify to character; and the light hair, youthfully glossy, speaks of the family. A diadem is borne upon the head, which receives its light from an opening in the back-ground, and reflects light from jewels. The dress of the queen is of the regal state, as is proper to her position ascending the throne. The long, royal crimson robe, with its white lining, flows luxuriantly in ample folds upon the floor, and a white mantle drops from the neck over the upper portion of the robe. The left hand, with a long white glove, rests upon the arm of the throne, and the right holds its glove in a graceful position in front. The artist has chosen a good position for the little feet of her majesty, which appear gracefully beyond the dress. The height of the figure is exactly that of her majesty, viz. five feet one inch, and, as Jeanie Deans would say, "a bitcock." A table near sustains the crown of ceremony and the mace of office. The painting is one destined to add to the fame of the estimable and modest artist, and will be visited by thousands who feel an interest in the arts, and a desire to see a likeness of the first sovereign in the world. In looking at the features of the queen, we inferred that her predominant feeling is benevolence, and we should say that in any situation of life she would be called an amiable woman.

The unities.—One of the dramatis personæ in Dickens's "Nicholas Nickleby" gives a definition of the dramatic unities. It is in the best style of Box:—"Might I ask you," said Nicholas, hesitating between the respect he ought to assume, and his love of the whimsical, "might I ask you what the unities are?"—Mr. Curdle coughed and considered. "The unities, sir," he said, "are a completeness—a kind of universal dovetailness with regard to place and time—a sort of a general oneness, if I may be allowed to use so strong an expression. I take those to be the dramatic unities, so far as I have been enabled to bestow attention upon them, and I have read much upon the subject, and thought much. I find, running through the performances of this child," said Mr. Curdle, turning to the phenomenon, "a unity of feeling, a breadth, a light and shade, a warmth of colouring, a tone, a harmony, a glow, an intrinsic development of original conceptions, which I look for in vain among older performers—I didn't know whether I make myself understood?"—"Perfectly," replied Nicholas—"Just so," said Mr. Curdle, "that is my definition of the unities of the drama."

The respirator.—This is the name of an instrument, invented by Mr. Combe, to protect the lungs of invalids from sudden atmospheric changes, as, for instance, going out of a hot room into a temperature below zero. It consists of three or four layers of wire gauze, which constitute a covering for the mouth. This absorbs the warm air of the breath as it leaves the lungs, and gives it out to the fresh air which enters.

The theatres.—Since opera has ceased to be in the ascendant at the National, the houses have worn a thinner aspect. The ballet has been the principal attraction the past week. At the Park, a new farce by Haynes Bayly, has been played several nights with success. It is called "Tom Noddy's Secret." The story is as follows:—Mr. Thomas Noddy (Placide) a worthy old schoolmaster, has had for some years the care of an orphan, rescued from peril, and left with him an infant, by Captain Ormand on the night of the memorable battle, which ended in the defeat of Charles. The Captain from time to time reminds for the care of his protégée, whom he supposes to be a boy; while the schoolmaster, who has a sad habit of never doing to-day what can be done to-morrow, suffers the time to run on without acquainting the Captain of the mistake. Meanwhile the girl grows up, the old man grows older; he never had a good memory, and now he has a very bad one, which he endeavours to assist by knotting his handkerchief, and the Captain returns. The feeling of gratitude which Gabrielle had previously entertained for her preserver deepens at the sight of him, both being equally unconscious of "Tom Noddy's Secret." Gabrielle, when informed of it, thinks to lighten the annoyance of the Captain by presenting herself first to him in the uniform he had presented to the supposed boy, and afterwards in her own attire. Entanglement on entanglement is as fast interwoven as the accumulating knots on old Noddy's handkerchief. One of the most ludicrous is in the jealousy of Inkpen, the usher of the schoolmaster, and lover to his daughter Mary, who challenges the disguised Gabrielle to mortal combat. The perplexities of the procrastinating schoolmaster become unendurable, and force him to tell his secret by letter to the Captain. This letter he sends by Gabrielle, mentioning that the bearer is the girl in question; but she gives it to Mary, who gives it to Inkpen, whose astonishment at being taken for a young lady in disguise, is matched by the Captain's dismay at the unpromising appearance of his ward. It all comes right, however, and the Captain marries his ward; and then the old man ties his last knot, to remember to tell the audience to be sure not to forget to come and hear his "secret" again, and to make a knot in their own handkerchiefs to remind them. The performers were in high spirits, and Mr. Placide's Tom Noddy was excellent. We are glad to find that the manager of the Park is again turning his attention to opera, always the most attractive species of entertainment ever presented at that house. On Monday next, we have an entirely new lyrical drama entitled "Ninetta," translated from Rossini's La Gazza Ladra, in which Mrs. Bailey sustains the principal character, assisted by Jones, Brough, Morley, Richings and Mrs. Hughes. The orchestra has been strengthened, and the choruses will be full and efficient. This opera will, no doubt, have a run, as great pains have been taken with it, and Mr. Hughes has exerted himself to the utmost to produce it in a correct and admirable style. As regards Mrs. Bailey, we need but say that she always has been a favorite in this city as a sweet vocalist and an exceedingly clever actress, and that during her absence from the Park, her time has been profitably employed in the study of a higher class of music than she has yet attempted before the public of New-York. We have heard her engagement at the Park spoken of by amateurs with much enthusiasm, and we shall be pleased to see a full house on Monday night to welcome the new opera.

Crania Americana.—We have seen a specimen of this novel and important work, and do not hesitate to pronounce it highly honourable to the advanced state of science and the arts in this country. It embraces a comparative view of the skulls of various aboriginal nations of North and South America: to which is prefixed an essay on the varieties of the human species, and on the American race in particular, illustrated by seventy plates and a coloured map, and one hundred and fifty wood engravings—the whole under the superintendence of Dr. Morton, of Philadelphia, who has devoted much time to the subject, and is well qualified for the undertaking. The work is a most interesting one, and calculated not only to illustrate the principles of phrenology, but for the study and information of those who take an interest in the character and physical peculiarities of the aborigines of the western world. It will be accompanied by a supplementary treatise from the celebrated George Combe, which must give great additional value to the work. The Crania Americana is the result of many years application to the study of the different varieties of the North and South American tribes. The lithographic drawings of human skulls, seventy in number, are splendidly executed; and the wood engravings of specimens of comparative anatomy and of Indian instruments for varying the shape of the skull, are also well done. The publisher of this work, Mr. J. Fuller, is, we are informed, now at the Astor House, where he will remain a few days, to give such information relative to the work as may be desired. A specimen may also be seen at the store of D. Appleton and Co., No. 200 Broadway. The work, we are assured, will be delivered to subscribers exclusively. Persons desiring copies had therefore better secure their chance forthwith, particularly as but a limited number can possibly be afforded from the plates.

Sporting with danger.—Miss Louisa H. Sheridan, on being advised by her physician to pass the present winter at Bourdeaux or Madeira, in consequence of a cough which afflicted her, addressed the following playfully punning lines to the unpleasant hanger.

"Ma'am, that is a very bad cough of yours."
"Sir, I regret to say it is the very best I have."
Do cease, hollow sound! you alarm e'en the merry
You banish all spirits away from "pale Sheri."
Strange! that Sheri, in order with colour to glow,
Must change to Madeira or else to Bourdeaux.
But since a long voyage seems the only resort,
When at sea how the Sheri will long for the Port.

ACACIA.—The flowers of a species of the acacia are used by the Chinese in making that yellow which bears washing in their silks and stuffs, and appears with so much elegance in their paintings on paper. They gather the flowers before they are quite open, and put them into a clean earthen-vessel, over a gentle heat, and stir them continually, till they become dryish and of a yellow colour; then to half a pound of flowers they add three spoonfuls of clear water, and after that a little more, all there is just enough to hold the flowers incorporated together. They boil this for some time; and the juices of the flowers mixing with the water, it becomes thick and yellow. They then take it off the fire, and strain it through a piece of coarse silk. To the liquor they add half an ounce of common alum, and an ounce of calcined oyster-shells, reduced to a fine powder. All this is well mixed together, and produces the lasting yellow they have so long used. The dyers of large pieces use the flowers and seeds of the acacia for dyeing three different sorts of yellow. They roast the flowers, as before observed, and then mix the seeds with them, which for this purpose, must be gathered when quite ripe; by different mixtures of these, they produce the different shades of colour, only for the dyer they add a small quantity of Brazil wood.

LONG CHATRAH OR COMMONPLACE-BOOKS.—First, with regard to the opinion you desire concerning a commonplace-book; in general, I must disapprove of the use of it. It is chiefly intended for persons who mean to be authors; and tends to impair the memory, and to deprive you of a ready extempore use of your reading, by accustoming the mind to discharge itself of its reading on paper, instead of relying on its natural powers of attention, aided and fortified by frequent revisions of its ideas and materials. Some things must be commonplace, in order to be of any use—dates, chronological order, and the like; for instance, Nathaniel Bacon ought to be extracted in the best method you can. But, in general, my advice to you is not to commonplace upon paper, but, as an equivalent to it, to endeavour to range and methodize in your head what you read, and by so doing frequently and habitually to fix matter in the memory.

POKING THE FIRE.—There are some people who take a great delight in seeing a good blaze on the top of a coal fire, and whose impatience to produce it will sometimes lead them into great rashness in the action of poking—that is to say, they use the poker at the top instead of the middle of the fire, and go probing about in search of a flame. They are told of this fault twenty times a-day, and it is a want of generosity in them not to amend it;—but, somehow or other, they do not. The consequence is, that after a momentary ebullition of flame, the fire becomes dark and sleepy and is in danger of going out. It is, in fact, like a boy at school in the hands of a bad master, who, thinking him dull, and being impatient to render him brilliant, beats him about the head and ears, till he produces the very evil he would prevent.

ARMY CONTRACTORS.—The following curious announcement is copied from a letter sent by a firm of army contractors, Long Acre, London, to a principal clothing establishment at Devizes:—"Sir, I have this day sent off, directed to Captain Estcourt, Devizes, a crate containing one quartermaster, three sergeants, three corporals, one trumpeter, one farter, and forty-four privates, making a total of fifty-three, for the Devizes troop of Willie Yeomanry." The crate, we suppose, must have been a large one, and almost as awful as the wooden-horse of Troy.

"COMPARISONS ARE ODIOUS."—One of the perambulating finemongers of the city of York, the other morning, in drawing the attention of the citizens to his stock of what the Scotch call "caller fresh herrin," did so by temptingly announcing "Here's fine herrings, with backs like farmers and stomachs like landlords!" How far the comparison was odious or otherwise we shall leave for those more interested than ourselves to decide.

THE OPERA DUET.—Last week, in a ramble to Dulwich, I made these rhymes into a duet for a new comic opera. I have taken upon the stocks. Mind—for I look upon the words as a model for that kind of writing.

First she.—There to see the sloughish ass,
Through the meadows, as we pass,
Extinguish the farmer's grass,
Blythe and merry, by the mass!
As a little country lass.

Then he replies. Hear the farmer cry out, rounds!
As he trudges through the grounds,
Yonder beast has broke my mounds,
If the parish has no pounds,
Kill, and give him to the bounds.

Then, de capo, both join in repeating the last stanza, and this, tucked to a tolerable tune, will serve you a couple of minutes—you observe. In the same spirit of ridicule, Sir Richard Steele makes Trim, in his comedy of the "Funeral," sing Campley's check for three hundred pounds; repeating, "hundred—hundred—hundred—because there are three hundred;" a better instance than can be given for most repetitions in music.—Blackwood's Magazine.

PIANOFORTE PLAYING.—Many entertain the erroneous opinion, that to arrive at excellence it is necessary to practice at least six or seven hours every day; but I can assure them, that a regular daily and attentive study of at most three hours, is sufficient for this purpose. Any practice beyond this damps the spirit, produces a mechanical rather than an expressive and impassioned style of playing, and is generally disadvantageous to the performer, inasmuch as, when compelled to lay aside this momentary exercise, if called on to play any piece on a sudden, he cannot regain his usual powers of execution without having some days previous notice.—Hummel's Pianoforte School.

ARKANSAS BAGGAGE.—"Boy, run up stairs to No. — and bring down my baggage—hurry, I'm about moving," said a tall, Arkansas-ineat axe-looking person yesterday to a waiter, at one of our crack hotels. "What is your baggage, massa, what is he?" "Why, three pistols, a pack of cards, a Bowie-knife and one shirt. You'll find them all under my pillow."

GOOD WIDOW.—If she can speak but little good of him, (her dead husband), she speaks but little of him. So handsomely folding up her discourse, that his virtues are shown outward, and his vices veiled up in silence; as counting it barbarian to throw dirt on his memory who had mould cast on his body.

COME, SEND ROUND THE WINE.

THE POETRY BY THOMAS MOORE—THE MUSICK ARRANGED BY SIR JOHN STEVENSON.

SPIRITED.

me-a flow'r too fair and brief To be wi-ther'd by the dust of the schools, Your glass may be pur-ple, and mine be blue, But both the same The fool who would quar-rel for dif-ference of hue, De-serves not the com-fort they shed on the soul.

Scherzando.

SECOND VERSE.—Shall I ask the brave soldier, who fights by my side
In the cause of mankind, if our creeds agree?
Shall I give up the friend I have valued and tried,
If he kneel not before the same altar with me!

From the heretick girl of my soul shall I fly,
To seek somewhere else a more orthodox kiss?
No! perish the hearts and the laws that try
Truth, valour, or love, by a standard like this!

Miscellany.

LINES TO A LADY.

BEFORE the graces you disclose,
By fresh ones are o'er-shaded,
And duties rise more grave than those,
To last when those are faded,

It will not weary you, I know,
To hear again the voice
First heard where Arno's waters flow,
And Flora's realms rejoice.

Of beauty not a word have I
(As thousands have) to say,
Of vermeil lip or azure eye,
Or cheek of blushful May.

The gentle temper blessing all,
The smile at envy's loss,
Are yours—and yours at pity's call
The heart-answering tear.

Many can fondle and caress—
No other have I known
Proud of a sister's loveliness,
Unconscious of her own.

A SOLDIER AT ANCHOR.—A military officer, who most cordially detested the halberds, used, as a substitute for flogging, to expose delinquents upon parade with a large iron bomb-shell attached to one of their legs. One day, when several men were attached to the punishment, a sailor, who by chance had strolled near, called out to his companions—"My eyes, shipmates! only just look here—I'm blest if here isn't a soddier at anchor."

A CURE FOR A SCOLDING WIFE.—Rose, private secretary to Louis XIV., having married his daughter to M. Portail, president of the Parliament, was constantly receiving from his son-in-law complaints of his daughter's ill temper. To one of these he at length answered, that he was fully convinced of her misconduct, and was resolved to punish her for it: in short, that if he heard any more of it, he would disinherit her. He heard no more.

AQUA VITÆ.—The name very absurdly given to alcohol, when used as an intoxicating beverage. It has been the aqua mortis to myriads of the human race; and will, probably, ere long destroy all the native tribes of North America and Australia.

CIGAR SMOKING.—We do not get drunk now-a-days; we only stupefy ourselves with cigars. Every generation has some anomaly which it elevates into a fashion.

LIFE IN THE WEST.—Our Yankee traveller, who saw the live hoosier, has again written to his mother:—"Western people go their death on etiquette. You can't tell a man here that he lies, as you can down east, without fighting. A few days ago, a man was telling two of his neighbours in my hearing a pretty large story. Says I, 'Stranger, that's a whopper!' Says he, 'Lay there stranger!' And in a twinkling of an eye, I found myself in the ditch, a perfect quadruped, the worse for wear and tear. Upon another occasion, says I to a man I never saw before, as a woman passed, 'That isn't a specimen of your western women, is it?' Says he, 'You are afraid of the fever and ague, stranger, an't you?' 'Very much,' says I. 'Well,' replied he, 'that lady is my wife, and if you don't apologize in two minutes, by the honour of a gentleman, I swear that these two pistols (which he held cocked in his hand) shall cure you of that disorder entirely—so don't fear, stranger?' So I knelt down and politely apologized. I admire this western country much; but curse me if I can stand so much etiquette; it always takes me so unawares."—Chicago Democrat.

PLEASURES OF WINTER TRAVEL.—There is none of that languor and feverishness that so generally result from travelling on wheels. The very hardships bring enjoyment with them, in invigorated health, braced nerves, and elevated spirits. You are in immediate contact with nature, every circumstance of scenery and climate becomes of interest and value, and the minutest incident to country, or local habits, cannot escape observation. A burning sun may sometimes exhaust, or a summer storm may drench you; but what can be more exhilarating than the sight of the lengthened troop of variegated and gay costumes dashing at full speed along, to the crack of the Tartar whip, and the wild whoop of the surrigger? what more picturesque than to watch the reckless career over upland or dale, or along the waving line of the landscape, bursting away on a dewy morn, or racing home on a dewy eve?

CHURCH-RATES.—A certain baptist spinster of rather a free tongue, to which she was giving unlicensed liberty in a late parish dispute about church-rates, was thus reproved by one of the opposite party:—"Miss —, you will recollect that dipping adults, according to your faith, first came into fashion when parish ducking-stools for scolds went out; the one took the place of the other. Be cautious; for though you are not young, we may even before you die go back to the good old practice." The grizzled damsel was nearly choked with rage.

MORNING.—The best part of the day, for most purposes, is in a great measure lost by most persons. There is no question of it. It is either lost in sleep—between sleeping and waking—feeble efforts to arise—buttoning up the toilet, or in a state of trifling indecision what to take hold of first.

FROM A LADY'S ALBUM.

May Time, who sheds his blight on all,
And daily dooms some joy to death,
O'er thee less years so gently fall,
They shall not crush one flower beneath.
As half in shade, and half in sun,
This world along its path advances,
Oh, may that side the sun's upon,
Be all that e'er shall meet thy glances.

IN A PECK OF TROUBLE.—We pity the subscribers to the Wayne County (Indiana) Journal. At the last accounts the editor, publisher, and proprietor, together with his wife and two children, were sick, the journeyman was "on a batter," the devil was unruly and wicked, as all devils are from the old one down, the wood was all out, and the cow hadn't come home.

NEW ASSOCIATIONS.—After speaking of a "Bayadere Association," which they have got up in New-York, and which goes the "whole figure" in the dancing way, the editor of the Baltimore Sun says that they have in that city a "Buy a deer Association," who eat nothing but venison. Some of the members are said to be so nimble that they can jump a fence ten feet high.

WELFARE.—"The day we celebrate," as the fat pig said to the turkey last Christmas.

WHAT WE LIKE TO SEE.—A man walking about a race-course with a constable: it looks as though he had credit once.

WINTER.

Gather around your blazing hearths, and tell
Dread stories of my power, for, lo! I come
To howl above your happy roof—recount
To the young prattler how I split the bark
On the dark ocean's breast, and yell a dirge
O'er the young sea-boy's grave; tell of the blights
I cast upon the flowery fields, of all
The dazzling splendour of the rising sun,
When on my frosty robes he looks, and darts
His golden beams upon my coronal.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. Terms, FIVE DOLLARS per annum, payable, in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

G. P. Scott, Printer, corner of John and Gold-streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL, DEVOTED TO LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR.] SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NUMBER ONE BARCLAY-STREET, NEXT TO THE CORNER OF BROADWAY. [PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

VOLUME SIXTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 12, 1839.

NUMBER TWENTY-NINE.

LINGER NOT LONG.

Linger not long!—Home is not home without thee;
Its dearest tokens only make me mourn.
Oh! let its memory, like a chain about thee,
Gently compel, and hasten thy return.

Linger not long.

Linger not long!—Though crowds should woo thy staying,
Behold thee—can the mirth of friends, though dear,
Compensate for the grief thy long delaying
Costs the poor heart that sighs to have thee here?

Linger not long.

Linger not long!—How shall I watch thy coming,
As evening's shadows stretch o'er moor and fell!
When the wild bee hath ceased her weary humming,
And silence hangs on all things like a spell!

Linger not long.

How shall I watch for thee when fears grow stronger,
As night grows dark and darker on the hall!
How shall I weep, when I can watch no longer!
Oh! art thou absent?—Art thou absent still?

Linger not long.

Yet I should grieve not, though the eye that seeth me
Gazeth through tears that make its splendour dull;
For oh! I sometimes fear, when thou art with me,
My cup of happiness is all too full.

Linger not long.

Haste, haste thee home unto thy mountain dwelling!
Haste as a bird unto its peaceful nest!
Haste, as a skiff, when tempests wild are swelling,
Flies to its haven of secured rest.

Linger not long.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF REAL LIFE.

THE ADVENTURES OF A PAIR OF TOP BOOTS.

Part the Second.

BY JOHN ST. HUGH MILLS.

"The soul secure in her existence, smiles
At the drawn dagger and defies its point."

From change of circumstance, we now endured the mortification of adorning the little bandy legs of a superannuated post-boy at the George Inn, Honslow Heath. With body carelessly reclined against the corner-post of the stable-yard, and crossed feet, which he kept in constant motion, much to our annoyance, the old boy cast a sheep's eye toward the great metropolis, and occasionally the reverse way, anticipating, with a degree of restlessness, the approach of some carriage requiring fresh horses. At length one was visible in the distance, with four horses, rattling along at full gallop, coming from London.

"Now, then,—bring out first two pair, and don't come the undertaker's move!" hollered he, pulling a large bell which, swinging up and fro, created much bustle among the helpers, hostlers, and stable-boys. Before the horses could be brought from their stalls, an elegant dark chariot dashed up to the entrance. The riders of the reeking animals jumped instantly from their saddles—the groom in the rumble sprang from his seat—and the flushed countenance of a handsome military looking young man simultaneously popped itself out of the window of the carriage.

"Quick—quick!" exclaimed he.

"In less than no time, sir," replied our wearer.

"Clap on them traces, old butter-thumbs, or I'll spoil yer beauty," hollered the groom.

"Your veils vants vaterwingz, there all on a smoke," squeaked an infantine post-boy, grinning and pointing to the steaming axes, in consequence of the friction.

"How long are you going to be!" impatiently asked the gentleman. "I never witnessed such a set of idle awkward scamps in all my life."

"Oh, Charles! if we should be overtaken," exclaimed an effeminate voice from an invisible quarter.

"For heaven's sake, do not Emily. I shall go mad if you talk so inconsistently," replied the irritated Charles. "I repeat my question—how long are you going to be?"

"All right, sir," replied the servant, touching his hat and jumping into his seat.

Away we went at furious speed, a bargain having been quickly struck between the attendant and the riders that they were to go at full gallop the whole of the stage, for two sovereigns each above the regular charge. What post-boy would not ride eight miles for two sovereigns so hard as he could go? Not one in the united kingdom. Our master rode the wheel-horses, and, careless of the pole rubbing our very soles out, fulfilled his agreement to the letter. Not an instant did he relent from stimulating the horses to their full speed.

"Keep them on the stretch, like fiddle-strings," he cried to his partner on the leaders. "We'll make 'em fly"—and fly we did, with a swiftness only to be equalled by that of a Canadian patriot.

We had proceeded about two miles on the road, and were descending a steep hill, when one of the pole-chains snapped. Our wearer made known the accident to the rider before him—with consummate skill twisted the vehicle on to the edge of a bank, and, checking the horses, he succeeded in stopping the carriage without any material damage. Charles, speechless with excitement, jumped out, pulled his hair with regardless destruction to its luxuriant beauty, stamped passionately the ground, and at length managed to inquire, "What had occurred?" "Chain broke," was the laconic reply.

"What shall we do! What shall we do!" exclaimed the voice from the chariot.

"Emily, you'll certainly drive me mad if you persist in such inconsistent observations," said Charles, skipping about in every direction, willing, but incapable, to render the smallest assistance, from his extreme anxiety to proceed. "Never mind that. There, that will do. Make haste. I'm convinced that I shall do something desperate directly," were among his continued, brief, exclamations.

"Who's got any string?" inquired our master.

"Here, take these," replied Charles, offering his silk suspenders.

"They ain't no use," said the interrogator.

"Perhaps this will do," hearing off, and offering a skirt of his coat.

"Nor that neither, sir; but we'll manage it without your undressing yourself."

"I'm fainting, Charles—I'm fainting—I'm certain I shall faint," screamed the voice from the inside of the carriage.

"Emily, you will drive me mad if you persist in such inconsistent exclamations," again replied Charles, in a tone of despair, going to the carriage door.

"What dreadful accident has occurred to you, dear Charles? Look at your coat, love."

"Emily, my angel, don't refer to such a tale."

"Get in, sir—get in. Here they come, by St. George," said the servant, pushing his master unceremoniously into the chariot.

"Who—when—where? Let me see—gracious me—what shall we—?" Boys, ride for your lives. A hundred pounds if you get through the next gate before that carriage on the top of the hill. Go on—go on."

Such were the orders of Charles, who appeared almost frantically, at seeing a phaeton galloping toward them at full speed, not more than a mile distant.

"How shall we escape, dear Charles? Do tell me, love," entreated Emily.

"You will certainly drive me mad, Emily, if— Go on—give it them—that's it—he gains upon us—stop on the other side of the temple. Do you hear!" hollered Charles.

"Ay, ay, sir. All right," was the reply.

On rushed the horses at a reckless speed, the riders using their best means to reach the gate, which was now in sight, about half a mile off. The carriage in pursuit was also being propelled at an indomitable pace down the hill, rolling from side to side, momentarily in danger of being upset. Standing up might be seen a fine old gentleman, with locks as white as the driven snow, looking through a glass at the chariot he was chasing with so much evident determination of capture. Now and then he would encourage his postillions to increase their pace, if possible, with fresh tempting bribes; holding in his hand a purse well filled with gold, and jingling the pieces to the gratified riders, who urged their horses forward to the utmost stretch of their power.

"We shall catch them, ha, ha, ha!" laughed the old fellow. "The piratical rascal, I shall hook him," said he, as he plainly saw that he was gaining upon the pursued at every stride.

In a few seconds we reached the desired gate, and stopped as suddenly as our impetuous would permit; but, yards before the carriage could be brought up, Charles and his servant leaped upon the ground; the former, seizing the turnpike-man by the throat, said, "Give me the key of the gate, or I'll strangle you on the spot."

"Spare me, sir—spare me—I've a wife and thirteen helpless babies," exclaimed the terrified turnpike-man.

"Where's the key?"

"There it is, sir—I've a wife and—"

Bang went the gate, which prevented the remainder of the sentence from being heard, and the key being turned by Charles, it afforded no slight obstacle to his pursuer. After performing this politic feat so completely to their satisfaction, Charles and his servant hastened to their respective seats, and on dashed the carriage at its former rate. Scarcely had it proceeded one hundred yards when the phaeton arrived at the obstructing barrier.

"Gate—gate," shouted the postillions. "Gate—you scoundrel, open that gate!" bawled the old gentleman, in a terrific voice.

"T'other one's stole the key—and I can't," replied the astonished toll-keeper.

"Then I'll be the death of you—you villain."

"Oh, dear me, what shall I do! I've a wife and thirteen small children. One kills me if I won't—'t'other if I don't," exclaimed the turnpike-man, with "unshed tears swimming in his eyes."

"I fear it's no go," suggested one of the riders.

"The cunning rascal. Just as he was within my grasp, to escape me!" exclaimed the old gentleman, with indescribable vexation. "But I'll have him yet. Which is the fastest horse?"

"This is the clipper, and no mistake," replied one of the postillions, dismounting.

"Shorten the stirrups. Give me your whip. Now your spurs. There," said the old fellow, climbing into the saddle. "Will he leap?"

"He'll try, sir, if you put him at it stiff," was the reply.

The old gentleman tightened his rein, turned his horse's head toward the hedge on the road-side, and driving the inexperienced animal forward, had the greatest difficulty in saving himself from being thrown a somersault over the horse's head, which, from motives of self-preservation, promptly declined the jump, much to the amusement of the postillions, who apparently enjoyed the courage of the ancient equestrian.

"He won't do it," said the old gentleman, breathless with exertion.

"Give him another trial, sir, I'll tip him a hint from behind," was the encouraging remark. Again the reluctant horse was urged to perform a part totally out of his line; and the promised hint being given, in the shape of a severe lash into the ditch on the opposite side, through the brambles into his part, and holding on by the mane and pommel of the saddle by the rider, they completed a landing into the field, which feat was vociferously applauded by the laughing postillions. The old gentleman proceeded a few yards on the side of the ditch, then again the animal was required to try a leap at which he did not evince so great an aversion. The horse had been on the road all his life, and finding himself on the turf, contrary to all inclination, he, with an equal disposition to that of a fish seeking its native element, sprang with superior agility over both ditch and hedge, regaining his long-used road on the other side of the locked gate. The postillions cheered—the turnpike-man grumbled, in an undertone, something about, "evading a toll was against the law," and the old gentleman dashed along in pursuit of the fugitives. Away he rattled as fast as the horse could go, which evidently caught some of the enthusiasm of his rider; for, in the whole course of his posting career, he never before evinced such energy and good-will on any occasion.

"Oh, dear me. It's all over with us," sighed Charles, as he caught a glimpse of the chasing horseman. "Who could imagine that he would be so desperate!"

"Charles, love. Oh! do tell me what you mean?" entreated Emily.

"Mean," repeated he with emphasis. "I mean, my angel, that the governor will overtake us in less than three minutes."

"I'm fainting Charles, dear. Oh! do tell me how we shall escape!"

"Escape is impossible, and although, Emily, you are a dove, alas! you have not wings. See, there he comes on horseback. Oh! that brute would tumble down."

"Charles, recollect, sir, that brute is my father," replied Emily with offended dignity.

"I meant the horse, not the rider, dear."

"If the horse fell so must the rider, I suppose; and, perhaps, then he might be—," and a flood of tears interrupted the completion of the sentence.

"Stop, stop—pull up—it's no use proceeding—we must be overtaken," hollered Charles.

The post-boys obeyed the mandate by reining in their foaming steeds, and bringing the carriage to a sudden stop.

"Now for a pretty scene," said Charles, with a melancholy visage, anticipating, with anything but pleasurable sensations, a meeting with the governor, who, in a few seconds, likewise came to a terminus of his gallop breathless at the side of the carriage. Large drops of perspiration trickled down the rubicund countenance of the excited old gentleman, as he sternly gazed upon his daughter and the abashed Charles. There was a long pause and silence with all parties, as if each was afraid to break it; at length the old gentleman said, in a voice trembling with deep emotion,

"Emily, did I deserve this—I who have been always so kind and indulgent to you?"

"Allow me, sir," replied Charles, in a tone and manner of the greatest respect, "to explain this affair, and take upon myself the blame, who alone am really answerable, for its imprudence, to say the least of it. I acquainted you with the reciprocal feelings of attachment existing between your daughter and myself candidly, and without the slightest hesitation or concealment of my prospects and present situation in life, which admitted of no objections, entreating your consent to our union, as I believed there existed no reasonable obstacle. Your reply was, that Emily should never become the wife of a soldier, for more reasons than their proverbially being dissipated and extravagant, which was quite sufficiently objectionable for your withholding your consent. I endeavoured to prevail over you, as it appeared to me, falacious denial of my wish fruitlessly, and therefore, with great difficulty, persuaded Emily, as my only alternative, to become mine without your consent. We endeavoured to succeed in our resolve to become united, and were on the road to—

"The deuce, sir!"

"Pray forgive us, papa," said Emily, with such a pretty bewitching manner, that no father, however hard-hearted, could have refused. The governor, however, was not too hasty in overlooking such a serious piece of insubordination as an attempt at a runaway match. He frowned sternly, though a smile would, notwithstanding his endeavours, to suppress it, steal upon his lips, as he called them "two rascals!" and added, "you thought to escape me with your manoeuvres, but I was too much for you—old as I am—you scamps."

"Yes, sir," added Charles, "I admit that I did all in my power to succeed in my plan; but—"

"I beat you with mine," replied the old gentleman with great apparent gratification at his signal success.

The horses were recovering from their over-exertions, their panting sides were subsiding into quietude—the riders, standing within a few yards of the carriage, wiping the sweat-drops from their foreheads, and the dust from us, looking with much curiosity at the group who were more deeply concerned in the matter than themselves, when the old gentleman, taking the hand of Emily, placed it in that of her lover, and said, "I forgive you from my heart. I was wrong with my silly objection, and you, Charles, in being so very hasty. You cannot say, however, but that my plan best yours, and that Emily will be your wife with my consent."

The road was retraced, and we accompanied as happy a trio as ever took "hasty steps."

THE ROMANCE OF HISTORY.

THE MERCHANT'S DAUGHTER AND THE JUDGE.

BY CAPTAIN MARRVAT.

It was the land of poetry and song—the land peopled with the memories of the mighty past—the land over which the shadows of a long renown rested more glowingly than a present glory. It was beautiful Italy; the air, like a sweet odour, was to the senses as soft thoughts are to the mind, or tender feelings to the heart, breathing serenity and peace. That sweet air swept balmily over the worn brow of an invalid, gazed to the pallid hue of his countenance the first faint dawn of returning health.

The eye of the invalid was fixed on the dark characters of a book in embossed binding and massive clasps, which the Roxburgh Club would now consider an invaluable black-letter; and so absorbed was he in its perusal, that he heard not the approaching steps of visitors, until the sound of their greetings roused him from his meditations.

"The saints have you in their keeping!" said his elder visitor, a man whose brow bore traces of age, though time had dealt leniently with him.

"The dear Madonna bless you!" ejaculated his other visitor, a young girl with the large flashing eye, the pure oval face, and the classic contour of Italy.

The invalid bowed his head to each of these salutations. "And now," said the merchant, for such was the elder visitor, "that your wounds are healing, and your strength returning, may we not inquire of your kin and country?"

A slight flush passed over the pale face of the sick man; he was silent for a moment, as if communing with himself, and then replied, "I am of England, and a soldier, albeit of the lowest rank."

"Of England!" hastily responded the merchant, "of England! of heroic England!" He crossed himself devoutly, and started back as if afraid of contamination.

"I may not deny home and country," replied the soldier, mildly. "But I shall incur the church's censure for harbouring thee!" exclaimed the merchant; "thou knowest not what pains and penalties may be mine for doing thee this service!"

"Then let me forth," replied the soldier; "you have been to me the good Samaritan, and I would not requite you evil; let me go on my way, and may the blessing of heaven be upon you in the hour of your own need!"

"Nay, nay, I said not so. Thou hast not yet strength for travel, and besides, England was once the brightest jewel in our holy father's crown, and she might reconcile herself again; but I fear she will not, for your master, Henry, is a violent, hot-blooded man, and he hath torn away the kingdom from apostolic care. Know not that your land is under interdict, and that I, as true son of holy mother church, ought not now to be changing words with thee?"

"Even so," replied the soldier; "but there are many that think the king's grace hardly dealt by."

"The shepherd knoweth best how to keep his fold," replied the merchant, hastily; "but you are the king's soldier; you take his pay, you eat his bread, and doubtless ought to hope the best for him, and even so do I. I would that he might repent and humble himself, and then our holy father would again receive him into the fold; but, now I bethink me, thou wert wronging; what were thy studies?"

The brow of the soldier clouded—he hesitated a moment; but then gathering up his resolution, replied, "In the din of the battle this book was my breastplate, in the hour of sickness my best balm," and he laid the open volume before the merchant.

"Holy Saint!" exclaimed the merchant, crossing himself, and drawing back as he beheld the volume which his church had closed against the layman. "Thou then art among the heretics who bring down a curse upon thy land! Nay, thy sojourn here may bring down maledictions upon me and mine! upon my house and home! But thou shalt, for I will not harbour thee! I will deliver thee over to the church, that she may chasten thee! Away from him, my child! away from him!"

The soldier sat sad and solitary, watching the dying light of the sun, as he passed unheeding on to shine in other lands. One ray rested on the thoughtful brow of the lonely man as he sat bracing up his courage to meet the perilous future. As he thus mused, a soft voice broke upon his reverie.

"You are thinking of your own far off home," said the Italian girl; "how I wish that all I love had but one home—it is a grief to have so many homes!"

"There is such a home," replied the soldier.

"Ah!" replied Emilia; "but they say that heretics come not there! Promise me that you will not be a heretic any longer."

The soldier smiled, and sighed.

"You guess why I am here to-night," resumed the Italian girl. "I know it by that smile and sigh. You think that I am come to tell you to seek your own land and home, and, therefore, you smiled, and you just breathe one little sigh because you leave this bright sun—and me."

"Am I then to leave you, perhaps to be delivered over to the power of your implacable church?"

Emilia crossed herself. "No, no, go to your own land and be happy. Here is money; my father could not deny me when I begged it of him with kisses and tears. Go and be happy, and forget us."

"Never," exclaimed the soldier, earnestly. "Never! and you, my kind and gentle nurse, my good angel—who have brought hope to my pillow, and beguiled the sad hours of sickness in a foreign land—words are but poor things to thank thee with."

"I shall see you no more!" said the young Italian, "and what shall make me happy when you are gone? Who will tell me tales of flood and field? I have been happy while you were here, and yet we met very sadly. My heart stood still when we first found you covered with blood, on our way back to Milan after the battle. You had crept under a hedge, as we thought, to die. But I took courage to lay my hand upon your heart, and it still beat; so we brought you home; and never has a morning passed, but I have gathered the sweetest flowers to freshen your sick pillow; and while you were insensible in that terrible fever, I used to steal into your chamber and kneel at your bed-foot, and pray for the Madonna's care. And when you revived you smiled at my flower, and when you had voice to speak, thanked me."

Emilia's voice was lost in sobs; and what wonder if one from man's sterner nature mingled with them?

The morrow came. The Italian girl gathered a last flower, and gave it in tearful silence to the soldier. He kissed the fragrant gift, and then, with a momentary boldness, the fair hand that gave it, and departed. The young girl watched his footsteps till they were lost to sight, listening to them till they were lost to sound, and then abandoned herself to weeping.

"Thou art sad, dear daughter," said a venerable father to his child, as they traversed that once contrived expanse through which we now jostle our way from the City to Westminster, "Thou art sad, dear daughter."

"Nay, my father," replied the maiden, "I would not be so; but it is hard always to wear a cheerful countenance when—"

"The heart is sad, then wouldst say—"

"Nay, I meant it not."

"I have scarcely seen thee smile since we entered this England—I may not say this heretic England."

"Hush! dear father, hush! the winds may whisper it; see you not that we are surrounded by a multitude?"

"They are running madly to some revelry."

"Let us leave the path then," said the girl; "it suits not our fallen fortunes, or our dishonoured faith, to seem to mingle in this stream of folly. Doubtless the king hath some new pageantry."

"Well, and if it be so," replied the father, "happily the gewgaw and the show might bring back the truant smile to thy lip, and the lost lustre to thine eye. Thou art too young to be thus moody sad. See how anxious, how eager, how happy seem this multitude! not one care-worn brow!—thou mayest catch their cheerfulness. We will go with the stream."

The girl offered no further resistance. They were strangers in the land; poor, almost penniless. They had come from their own country to reclaim a debt which one of the nobles of the rich had incurred in more prosperous days, when the merchant was rich in silver and gold, and merchandise.

The vast throng poured on, swelling until it became a mighty tide; the bells pealed out, the cannon bellowed, human voices augmented the din. The Thames was lined on either bank; every building on its margin crowded, and its surface peopled. Every sort of aquatic vessel covered its bosom, so that the flowing river seemed rather some broad road teeming with life. Galley after galley, glittering with the gold and the purple, came on laden with the wealth, and the pride, and the beauty of the land, and presently the acclamation of a thousand voices rent the skies, "The King! the king! long live the king!"

He came—Henry the VIII. came, in all that regal dignity, and gorgeous splendour, in which he so much delighted. And then began the pageant, contrived to throw odium on Rome, and to degrade the pretensions of the pope. Two galleys, one bearing the arms of England, the other marked by the papal insignia, advanced towards each other, and the fictitious contest commenced.

Borne on by the crowd, our merchant and his daughter had been forced into a conspicuous situation. The peculiar dress, the braided hair, the beauty and the foreign aspect of the girl had marked her out to the rude gallantry of the crowd; so that the father and daughter were themselves objects of interest and curiosity.

The two vessels joined, and the mimic contest was begun. Of course the English colours triumphed over the papal. Up to this point, the merchant bore his pangs in silence; but when the English galley had assumed the victory, then came the trial of patience. Effigies of the cardinals were hurled into the stream amidst the shouts and derisions of the mob. At each plunge groans issued from his tortured breast. It was in vain that Emilia clung to his arm, and implored him, by every fear, to restrain himself. His religious zeal overcame his prudence; and when, at last, the figure of the pope, dressed in his pontifical robes, was hurled into the tide, the loud exclamation of agony and horror burst from his lips, "Oh monstrous impiety of an accursed and sacrilegious king!" sounded loudly above the din of the mob.

It was enough; the unhappy merchant was immediately consigned over to the secular arm.

Oh, sad were those prison hours! The girl told her beads—the father prayed to all the saints—and then came the vain consolations by which each endeavoured to cheat the other. They thought of their own sunny land, its balmy air, its living beauty, and that thought was home.

November came with all its gloom—the month that should have been the grave of the year, coming as it does with shroud and cerecloth, foggy, dark, and dreary; the father's brow numbered more wrinkles, the once black hair was more nearly bleached, the features more attenuated.

And the daughter—ah! youth is the transparent lamp of hope—but in her the light was dim.

In fear and trembling the unhappy foreigners waited the day of doom. The merchant's place was as one little likely to meet with mercy. Henry was jealous of his title of head of the church. He had drawn up a code of articles of belief, which his subjects were desired to subscribe to, and he had instituted a court, of which he had made Lord Cromwell vicar-general, for the express trial of those whose orthodoxy in the king's creed was called in question. Neither could the unhappy merchant hope to find favour with the judge, for it was known that Cromwell was strongly attached to the growing reformation; and from the acts of severity with which he had lately visited some of the adherents of the Romish creed, in his new character of vicar-general, it was scarcely probable that he would show mercy to one attached by lineage, and love, to papal Rome. Strangers as they were, poor, unknown and unknown, what had they not to fear, and what was left for hope?

The morning of trial came. The fogs of that dismal month spread like a dark veil over our earth. There was no beauty in the landscape, no light in the heavens, and no hope in the heart.

The judges took their places: a crowd of wretched delinquents came to receive their doom. We suppose it to be a refinement of modern days, that men are not punished for their crimes, but only to deter others from committing them. This court of Henry's seemed to think otherwise; there was all the array of human passion in the judges as well as in the judged. On one hand, revenge for wrongs heaped on; on another, heroism braved all contingencies, courting the pile and the stake, with even passionate desire; and the pile and the stake were given with stern and unrelenting cruelty.

At length there stood at the bar an aged man and a youthful girl; the long white hair of the one fell loosely over the shoulders, and left unshaded a face wrinkled as much by care as by age; the dark locks of the other were braided over a countenance clouded by sorrow, and wet with tears.

The mockery of trial went on. It was easy to prove what even the criminal did not attempt to gainsay. The aged merchant vowed his fidelity to the pope as a true son of the church denied the supremacy of Henry over any part of the fold, and thus sealed his doom.

There was an awful stillness through the court—stillness the precursor of doom—broken only by the sobs of the weeping girl, as she clung to her father's arm. Howbeit, the expected sentence was interrupted; there came a sudden rush, fresh attendants thronged the court. "Room for Lord Cromwell! room for Lord Cromwell!" and the vicar-general came in his pomp and his state, with all the insignia of office, to assume his place of pre-eminence at that tribunal. Notes of the proceedings were laid before Lord Cromwell. He was told of the intended sentence, and he made a gesture of approbation. A gleam of hope had dawned upon the mind of the Italian girl as Lord Cromwell entered. She watched his countenance while he read; it was stern, indicative of calm determination; but there were lines in it that spoke more of mistaken duty than innate cruelty. Yet, when the vicar-general gave his token of assent, the steel entered Emilia's soul, and a sob, the variant accent of despair, rang through that court, and where it met with a human heart, pierced through all the cruelty and oppression that armed it, and struck upon some of the natural feelings that divide men from monsters. That sound struck upon Lord Cromwell's ear, his eye sought the place whence it proceeded; it rested on Emilia and her father. A strange emotion passed over the face of the stern judge—a perfect stillness followed.

Lord Cromwell broke the silence. He glanced over the notes that had been handed to him, speaking in a low voice, apparently to himself—"From Italy—a merchant—'Milan'—ruined by the wars—ay, those Milan wars were owing to Clement's ambition, and Charles's knavery—the loss of substance—to England to reclaim an old indemnity."

Lord Cromwell's eyes rested once more upon the merchant and his daughter. "Ye are of Italy—from Milan; is that your birthplace?"

"We are Tuscans," replied the merchant, "of Lucca; and oh! noble lord, if there is mercy in this land, show it now to this unhappy girl."

"To both, or to neither!" exclaimed the girl; "we will live, or we will die, together!"

The vicar-general made answer to neither. He rose abruptly: at a sign given by him, the proper officer declared the court adjourned; the sufferers were hurried back to their cells—some went whither they would—others, whither they would not; but all dispersed.

A faint and solitary light glanced from a chink of the prison-wall—it came from the narrow cell of the Italian merchant and his daughter.

The girl slept—ay slept. Sleep does not always leave the wretched.

to light on lids unswollen with a tear. Reader, hast thou known intense misery, and canst thou not remember how thou hast felt and wept, and agonized, until the very excitement of thy misery would stop the body's power of endurance, and sleep, like a torpor, a stupor, a lethargy, beat thee in its chains? Into such a sleep had Emilia fallen; she was lying on that prison floor, her face pale as if ready for the grave, the tears yet resting on her cheeks, and over her sat the merchant leaning, asking himself whether, treasure that she was, and had ever been to him, he could wish that sleep to be the sleep of death.

The clanking of a key caught the merchant's ear; a gentle step entered their prison. The father's first thought was for his child. He made a motion to enjoin silence; it was obeyed; his visitor advanced with a quiet tread; the merchant looked upon him with wonder. Surely—no—and yet could it be? that his judge—Lord Cromwell, the vicar-general, stood before him—and stood, not with threatening on his eye—not with denunciations on his lip, but took his stand on the other side of poor Emilia, gazing on her with an eye in which tenderness and compassion were conspicuous.

"Amazement bound up the faculties of the merchant." He seemed to himself as one that dreamed.

"Awake, gentle girl, awake," said Lord Cromwell, as he stooped over Emilia. "Let me hear thy voice once more as it sounded in mine ear on other days."

The gentle accents fell too lightly to break the spell of that heavy slumber; and the merchant, whose fears, feelings and confusion formed a perfect chaos, stooping over his child, suddenly awoke her with the cry of "Emilia! Emilia! awake, and behold our judge!"

"Nay, nay, not thus roughly," said Lord Cromwell, but the sound had already recalled Emilia to a sense of wretchedness. She half raised herself from her recumbent posture into a kneeling one, shadowing her dazzled eyes with her hand, her streaming hair falling in wild disorder over her shoulders, and thus resting at the feet of her judge.

"Look on me, Emilia!" said Lord Cromwell. And encouraged by the gentle accents, she raised her tear-swollen eyes to his face. As she did so, the vicar-general lifted from his brow his plumed cap, and revealed the perfect outline of his features. And Emilia gazed at it spell-bound, until gradually shades of doubt, of wonder, of recognition, came struggling over her countenance, and finally in a voice of passionate amazement she exclaimed: "It is the same! It is our sick soldier guest!"

"Even so," said Lord Cromwell, "even so, my dear and gentle nurse. He who was then the poor dependent on your bounty, receiving from your charity the daily bread as an alms, bath this day presided over the issues of life and death, as your judge; but fear not, Emilia; the sight of thee, gentle girl, comes like the memory of youth and kindly thoughts across the sterner mood that hitherto darkened over me. Thy voice whose may influence the destiny of a nation, gradually less the memory of gentler thoughts. It may be, Providence hath sent thee to melt me back again into a softer nature. Many a heart shall be gladdened, that, but for my sight of thee, had been sad unto death. I bethink me, gentle girl, of the flowers, laden with dew and rich in fragrance, which thou usedst to lay upon my pillow, while this head throbbed with agony of pain upon it; fondly thinking that their sweetness would be a balm; and how thin that word used to steal into my chamber and listen to tales of this, the land of my home! Thou art here; and how last thou been welcomed? To a prison, and well nigh to death. But the poor soldier hath a home; come thou and thy father, and share it!"

An hour! who dare prophesy its events? At the beginning of that hour, the merchant and his daughter had been the sorrowful captives of a prison; at its close, they were the treasured guests of a palace.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF AUTHORS.

"Who is that brisk, dapper little man, that is sitting about the room from one table to another, his eyes sparkling, and his intellectual countenance radiant with good humour? He seems a general favourite, especially with the ladies."—"That," said my friend, "is Thomas Moore. Hark! he is going to sing—one of his own inimitable melodies. Listen." The poet of Lalla Rookh sat at the piano (looking no more a little man, for he sits high, and no one would suppose him short, when seated), and enchanted us with Nora's Cradle. It was a treat of no slight order to hear the poet sing his own beautiful song; when he concluded, a burst of applause broke from every lip—and, during its continuance, the bard left the instrument, and was again employed in smiling and bowing to all who came in his way. I saw an individual standing, with his elbow resting on the mantelpiece, and deeply engaged in reading a volume of the Fairy Queen; his hair, which had been of a jet black, was parted in the middle of his forehead, and along the crown of his head, now gray hairs were plenty, or rather, it was the sort of hair called "grizzled." His eye was one of the finest I had ever seen—black and piercing, and when he spoke, it almost glowed. There was much of a kind and sweet expression about the mouth; the countenance, altogether, plainly told of much care and some sorrow. There was a slight stoop in the shoulders; he wore his shirt-collar loosely, and without a neckcloth, but not in the manner of a coxcomb. This was Leigh Hunt, the most delightful essayist of the day. While I was looking at Mr. Hunt, a gentleman of very diminutive stature, with a good-humoured face, accented by his friend. He had a very slight bare lip, large gray eye, with a good deal of humour lurking about the corners of his mouth. His hair was thin, and the crown of his head was bald. When his conversation was lively, there was a little of the blarney in his accent. When he was gone, I found it was Crofton Crocker, the author of Ferry Legends. "Who is that good-humoured looking personage, with whom every one talks in turn, who speaks with a strong Irish accent, and takes snuff 'immensely,' as Mr. Butler would say?"—"Oh! that is Dr. Taylor, the best Hebrew scholar of the day, and author of several standard works. He is well versed in Oriental literature, and is a principal contributor to that capital journal, The Athenaeum. That very slovenly farmer-looking personage, with the top-boots, rather tall and elderly, is the Rev. W. Leslie Bowles, who beat Lord Byron in the 'Popo' controversy. His sonnets are very beautiful, and he has almost equalled Dr. Watts in his verses for children."—"London is a strange-looking being," said I.—"That half-man, half-woman, around whom so many persons are crowding. Who is she? I heard her talking, just now, of matters which women seldom converse on with gentlemen, and she seemed to understand her subject too."—"The political economist in petticoats—Miss Harriet Martineau. The enemy of over-population, and the writer of the Practical Treatise on the Art of Keeping up, but it is in vain to deny that she has handled her subject well. That young lady nearer, with the very intellectual countenance, and plain dress is a person of quite a different order of mind to Miss Martineau. She is one of the most delightful poetesses and novelists in our country. It is Miss Landon."

SUWARROW'S LACONISM.

His movements were quick as lightning; yet his motto was, "Haste is necessary, hurry is injurious." Prince Coburg on the Rungnith, in a French letter, urgently requests his assistance; he sends it back, with the Russian superscription—"I am coming—Suwarrow;" and in a few hours he arrives with sixteen thousand men. The yezir, with sixty thousand men is beaten. He scarcely approaches Ismail when the mighty fortress falls into his hands, and he writes—"The Russian standard flies on the walls of Ismail!" After the total defeat of the Polish army near Bresl Litzow, he wrote to Rumjanzow—"Sirakowsky's corps is no more!" A short time after, he writes—"Huzza! Warsaw is ours!" and receives the equally memorable reply—"Huzza! Field-marshal Suwarrow!" Catharine. He never walked—he always ran; and never rode but in a gallop. He often repeated—"Money is necessary in war, but time is still more precious. I act by minutes, and not by hours." His words were as concise as his letters. Pressed by the enemy on all sides, the Austrian General Melas asked him whither to retire. With a pencil he writes in reply—"To Placencia, s. e. forward." Melas obeys, Macdonald is beaten on the plains of Hannibal, and Suwarrow receives the victorious Melas in Placencia. Baron Thugot wished to draw from him his plans for the war. Suwarrow gave him a blank sheet of paper, and hurrying away, he said—"These are my plans." But when it was proposed to him to act on the defensive, he said with indignation to the foreign aid-de-camp, "Tell your prince he is a young man, but I am an old soldier; the words 'defensive' and 'defence' are not in my vocabulary. I have overthrown the theory of tactics hitherto employed, and made my own. Adieu." He had been the first to leave blockaded fortresses in the back of his army. He disliked ambiguity in speech, as much as he loved short and decisive replies. Asking one day an Austrian general, "Why did Hannibal not go to Rome after the battle of Cannæ?" who immediately replied—"Perhaps they had also a council of war at Carthage!" he instantly understood, and embraced him affectionately. When this same council wished to prescribe to him his warlike movements, he had not even the patience to read their instructions through; and wrote underneath, "Full power to the general-in-chief—reporting only to the emperor in person; such are my orders." His sayings were often very pithy, and he did not even disdain a pun. Hearing some person extolling the cunning of Dumouriez, he said—"He is not cunning who is considered as such." He delighted to repeat and explain his military tactics to his soldiers on the parade; and they were such that every one of them could understand them. He used to say, "The bullet is silly, but the bayonet is dangerous," and "huzza to the bayonet!" was for his army the signal for victory.

TALLEYRAND'S JOKES.

One day, a banker, with whom he was well acquainted, waited upon him to ascertain the truth of a rumour of the death of George III., which was expected to affect the funds. The banker, of course, anxiously apologized to the minister for the intrusion, and for the extraordinary nature of his request. "How!" exclaimed Talleyrand, with the imperturbable gravity peculiar to him. "There is no harm—no indiscretion whatever. I shall be delighted if the information I have to give is of any use to you." The banker was profuse of acknowledgments. "Well, now, I must tell you," continued Talleyrand, with an air of mysterious confidence, "some say the king of England is dead, others that he is not dead; for my own part, I believe neither the one nor the other. I tell you this in confidence; but, for heaven's sake, do not commit me. When the first counsel one day inquired how he was so rich, he replied, by a dexterous compliment—"I bought stock the day before the eighteenth of Brumaire, and sold it again next day." This was the date of Napoleon's first usurpation. Some of his compliments were still more delicately turned. Some one asked him the address of the princess of Vaudemont. "Rue St. Lazare," he replied. "But I have forgotten the number." "You have only to ask the first poor person you meet; they all know her house."

A SPECIMEN OF WELSH LITERATURE.

The Welsh poetical triads are part of a species of literature with which the reader may not be acquainted, as the Welsh is not taught in this country, either as a living or dead language. The following specimen contains many valuable observations expressed with singular brevity:

The three foundations of genius are—the gift of God, human exertion, and the events of life.

The three first questions of genius—an eye to see nature, a heart to feel it, and a resolution that dars to follow it.

The three things indispensable to genius—understanding, meditation, and perseverance.

The three things that ennoble genius—vigour, discretion, and knowledge.

The three tokens of genius—extraordinary understanding, extraordinary conduct, and extraordinary exertions.

The three things that improve genius—proper exertion, frequent exertion, and successful exertion.

The three things that support genius—prosperity, social qualifications, and aplomb.

The three qualifications of poetry—endowment of genius, judgment from experience, and felicity of thought.

The three pillars of learning—seeing much, offering much, and writing much.

NIAGARA FALLS.—An Englishman lately visiting Niagara Falls was asked his opinion:—"Very neat, upon honour—very neat!"

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S SCALES.

Original.

A MOKK, when his rites sacerdotal were o'er, In the depth of his cell, with a stone-covered floor, Resigning to thought his chimerical brain, Produced the contrivance we now shall explain— But whether by magic, or alchemy's powers, We know not—indeed it's no business of ours— O, no—for such projects wondrous had they, At last that he brought his invention to bear, In youth 'twas projected, but years stole away, And ere 'twas complete, he was wrinkled and gray— But success is secure, unless energy fails, And at length he produced "The Philosopher's Scales."

What were they? you ask. You shall presently see: These scales were not meant to weigh sugar and tea— O, no—for such projects wondrous had they, That qualities, feelings, and thoughts they could weigh; Together with articles small or immense, From mountains, or planets, to atoms of sense.

Naught was there so bulky but there it could lay, And naught as ethereal but there it would stay; And naught so reluctant but it must go, All which, some examples more clearly will show.

The first thing he tried was the head of Voltaire, Which retained all the wit that had ever been there: As a weight, he threw in a torn scrap of a leaf, Containing the prayer of the penitent thief.

When the skull rose soft with so sudden a spell, As to bound like a ball on the roof of the cell. Next, time, he put in Alexander the great, With a garment that Dorcas had made for a weight;

And though clad in armor, from sandals to crown, The hero rose up, and the garment went down.

A long row of almshouses, amply endowed, By a well estimated pharisee, busy and proud, Now loaded one scale—while the other was great

By those mites the poor widow dropp'd into the chest— Up flew the endowment, not weighing an ounce, And down, down, the farthing's worth came with a bounce.

Again he performed an experiment rare: A monk, with austere bleeding and bare, Climbed into his scale—in the other, we laid

The heart of our Howard, now partly decayed— When he found, with surprise, that the whole of his brother, Weighed less, by some pounds, than this bit of the other.

By further experiments, no matter how, He found that ten charaxes weighed less than one pleugh.

A sword, with gilt trappings, rose up in the scale, Though balanced by only a tennenny nail.

A shield and a helmet, a buckler and spear, Weighed less than a widow's uncrystallized tear.

A lord and a lady went up at full sail, When a box chanced to light on the opposite scale.

Ten doctors, ten lawyers, five courtiers, one earl, Ten counsellors' wigs, full of powder and curl, All heaped in one balance, and swinging from thence,

Weighed less than some atoms of candour and sense. A first water diamond, with brilliants begirt,

Than one good potato, just wash'd from the dirt. Yet, not mountains of silver and gold would suffice

One pearl to outweigh—'twas "the pearl of great price." At last the whole world was bow'd in at the grate,

With the soul of a beggar to serve as a weight. When the former sprang up with so strong a rebuff,

That it made a great rent, and escaped at the roof. Where balanced in air, it ascended on high,

And sailed up aloft—a balloon in the sky; While the scale with the soul in, so mightily fell,

That it jerked the philosopher out of his cell.

MORAL.

Dear reader, if e'er self-deception prevails, We pray you to try "The Philosopher's Scales:"

But if they are lost in the runs around, Perhaps a good substitute thus day he found:

Let judgment and conscience in circles be cut, To which strings of thought may be carefully put:

Let these be made even with caution extreme, And impartiality use for a beam:

Then bring those good actions which pride overrates, And leap up your motives to serve for the weights.

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

Above all, let me urge on those who would bring out and elevate their higher nature, to abstain from the use of spirituous liquors. This bad habit is distinguished from all others by the ravages it makes on the reason, the intellect; and this effect is produced to a mournful extent; even when drunkenness is escaped. Not a few men, called temperate, and who have thought themselves such, have learned, on abstaining from the use of ardent spirits, that for years their minds had been clouded, impaired by moderate drinking, without their suspecting the injury. Multitudes in this city are bereft of half their intellectual energy, by a degree of indulgence which passes for innocent. Of all the foes of the working class, this is the deadliest. Nothing has done more to keep down this class, to destroy their self-respect, to rob them of their just influence in the community, to render problems the means of improvement within their reach, than the use of ardent spirit as a drink. They are called on to withstand this practice, as they regard their honour, and would take their just place in society. They are under solemn obligations to give their sanction to every effort for its suppression. They ought to regard as their worst enemies, (though unintentionally such,) as the enemies of their rights, dignity and influence, the men who desire to flood city and country with distilled poison.

A PROMISE "IN FUTURO."

A president of the parliament of Paris, when presenting an address to the duke of Burgundy, then an infant, said, "We come to offer you our respects; our children will give you their services."

OFFICIAL NOTICES.

THE ST. NICHOLAS SOCIETY OF NEW-YORK.

[BY AUTHORITY.]

On the sixth ultimo, the members of this society celebrated their anniversary by a dinner, at the American Hotel, prepared by the prince of hosts, Mr. Cozzens. Our readers will, doubtless, recollect that, at the last celebration of the day, we were unanimously elected historians of the society; and, by virtue of that appointment, we now proceed to record the wondrous sayings and doings on this time-honoured festival. The great banner of the society, displayed at an early hour in the morning from the upper buttresses of the hotel, gave ample warning to every true New-Yorker that Saint Nicholas expected every man to do his duty; and, accordingly, at five o'clock, a numerous band had collected to pay homage to their patron saint, and to justice to the exquisite viands.

The Guests.—The Hon. Aaron Clark, mayor of the city; the Hon. Jeremiah Johnson, mayor of Brooklyn; the Right Rev. Bishop Onderdonk; the Rev. Dr. Schoonmaker, and the representatives of the national benevolent societies, of this city, were received by the president, in his official costume, in a room appropriated for the purpose.

The spacious dining-room was ornamented with the portrait of Saint Nicholas, executed, we believe, by Van der Velde, a distinguished Dutch artist. The other decorations, and the whole arrangement of the dining-room, were of the most simple and beautiful character. The dinner was faultless, and was universally pronounced the most elegant entertainment of the kind ever given in this city. Amid the choicest dishes of the modern school, appeared old fashioned smoked goose, pans eggs, and other Knickerbocker cookeries. The servants of the society, in the liveries of the old time, rendered everything complete. The president of the society, Gulas C. Verplanck, presided, assisted by vice-presidents Schermerhorn, Heyer, Benson, and J. A. King. After grace before, post had been said, by Bishop Onderdonk, chaplain of the society, the company proceeded to discuss, with due solemnity and grave deliberation, the business of the day. Thanks having been returned by the venerable Dr. Schoonmaker, of Long Island, the Non nobis Domine was sung in beautiful style by Messrs. Horn, Maynard, and Rogers.

The cloth having been removed, the president announced the following regular toasts:

1. Saint Nicholas.—The good holy man: whom our childhood loved, our manhood honors! Auld lang syne.
2. Our city—God prosper it. Home, sweet home.
3. The state of New-York.—A wilderness in 1609, an empire in 1836.
4. The President of the United States. President's March.
5. The National Benevolent Societies of our city. We extend to them the right hand of fellowship, and greet them as brothers; envious only to rival them in good works. Let us be cheerful.
6. The sons of New-York all over the world. Here's a health to them that's awa.

The daughters of Manhattan. Glee—Here's a health to all good lasses.

To the second regular toast, the Hon. Aaron Clark replied in a suitable manner, and offered the following toast:

William Durfee, the historian of New-York.

After the fifth regular toast, the representatives from the St. George's, St. Andrew's, St. Patrick's, New-England, and German societies acknowledged the compliment paid their respective bodies, and offered the following toasts:

By Charles Edwards, Vice-President of the St. George's Society.—American literature: already a planet, may its bright rings increase.

By D. Hadden, President of the St. Andrew's Society.—The commerce of New-York: its main pillar—good faith.

By Campbell P. White, President of the St. Patrick's Society. The memory of the founders of the Dutch West India Company, to whose public spirit and maintenance we are so largely indebted for the first improvements in this city.

By J. Hoare.—Peter Stuyvesant:

"His good remembrance, sirs,
Lies richer in your thoughts than on his tomb."

By C. W. Faber, Vice-President of the German Society:—
"Bendright mack! ranget."

The next toast being, according to ancient usage, the privileged one of the presiding officer, the President, before announcing it, proceeded to address the society to the following effect:

He began by congratulating the sons of St. Nicholas upon the general prosperity of the institution, and of its individual members; upon the continuance of the relations of peace and amity with all foreign powers, and upon the total, and he trusted, final cessation of all hostile inroads and depredations from the Yankees' borders within their borders. Above all, he congratulated them upon the unshaken stability of their ancient constitution, which, going down to us in its most important and unwritten provisions, from a remote and venerable antiquity, still continued without change to defy the assaults and innovations of this age of experiments.

By one of those ancient, unwritten articles, it had been made the duty of the chief executive officer of the society, upon every return of this high annual solemnity, to report to his assembled brethren the more weighty matters, touching the general welfare, which had occupied him and his official advisers, during the past year. This duty, said he, I shall now proceed to perform, with as much brevity as is compatible with the magnitude and deep interest of the affairs under consideration.

The first objects of your inquiries, upon assembling in this place, have, doubtless, been in relation to the new locality chosen for this solemnity, and the cause of this apparent innovation.

We met last year upon the old classic and poetical ground of our city, south of modern Wall-street, within the ancient city ramparts: the seat of the venerable Dutch dynasty. That venerated soil, I need not repeat to you; so often trodden by the feet of Van Twiller and Stuyvesant—illustrated by so many great events of our earlier history, must ever be in our eyes, what that time-honoured hill consecrated by the fate of Romulus and Remus and their prophetic vultures, was in those of the patriotic Roman. Thence, it might naturally have been expected, that we should continue to hold our high annual meetings within the precincts of that sacred region. But our erudite and enterprising board of stewards had planned out a grander scheme, of which the brilliant Delmonico festival is to be but the first act—the prologue—to a long and swelling theme of our city's glories.

They determined that three successive annual festivals should be held in rotation at various places, each associated with some recollections of history or antiquity, fit to be honored and cherished by the sons of St. Nicholas. Guided by a philosophy equally profound and practical, they aimed to form a living record of the bright epochs of our city annals, by combining in the minds of our youthful members those recollections with the most pleasing associations of friendship and festivity. As then the last location was selected in reference to the poetry and romance, and the grand historical reminiscences of our early story, so, that now chosen, is one fraught with political recollections, closely connected with our ecclesiastical polity, and especially rich in legal lore.

Its political recollections I need not dwell upon, for they are still fresh. It was here, in the fields, as this neighbourhood was called until the beginning of the present century, that occurred many of the most stirring scenes of popular movement or excitement during the trying days of the stamp act, just before our revolution, and the earlier times of the revolution itself, as well as afterwards, at the adoption of the new federal constitution, and the political contests that grew out of it. These reminiscences are doubtless sufficient to interest any soul. But there are yet others of deeper and graver interest, far less familiar to the public mind, and these it is now the praiseworthy aim of our stewards to revive and freshen.

This, my brethren, with reverence do I speak it, this is the consecrated ground of legal science! Here, where we now meet, was once the "Domestic Bowery," since well-known to our courts, as "King's Farm." It was here that beautiful Bowery, now indeed covered with vast piles of red bricks and gray granite, yet destined to bud and flower fit over in equity and law green in reports. On this spot, where our festive board is spread, in 1690 stood the humble rose-embowered cottage of the good Dutch domine, Everardus Bogardus, and here he bore his last child of old age, his sole heir, that lovely Annika, who, under her maiden name of Annika Jants, became the fruitful mother, not only of a numerous and worthy race, but of that famous and still-continued litigation with Trinity Church—so magnificent in its amount, so rich in its black-letter learning, and so gloriously protracted in its duration.

But the half is not yet told, touching the legal interest of this spot. Just on the other side of Broadway, adjoining the old domine's house, was the Shoemaker's Field, where at the beginning of the last century and the end of the preceding one, dwelt the rich and beneficent John Harberdrecht, cordwainer, formerly of Old Utrecht, late of New-Amsterdam. There he dwelt with his beloved though childless wife Mayken Harberdrecht, and here he watched over the budding beauties and virtues of his wife's younger sisters, Catalynde and Jannatta. There he died, after devoting one-third of the little farm of seventeen acres, lying on the east side of the Broadway and north of the Maiden's Path, to the support of the Dutch Church Memorial proof was then given of the wisdom of our ancestors and the profound skill of our old lawyer. With such a venerable and prophetic sagacity was that will drawn, as well as the comports conveyance from another quarter to Trinity Church, of the domine's Bowery, that after having fulfilled for a century and a half, (as perhaps they may for ever,) the pious intentions of the donors for the support of religion, the instruments were so contrived that as soon as any superfluous names would hereafter accumulate, it should, at once, overflow to the unspeakable relief of that meritorious and austere class of our population, the New-York bar. Such prophetic wisdom, I think, can scarcely be ascribed to any other source than the immediate inspiration of our own benevolent Saint Nicholas.

Yes, here, and just opposite us, were brought up the lovely and far-famed Annika Bogardus, and her no less lovely and no less pious daughters, Jannatta Van Kreeck and Catalynde Van Benthuysen. Here the damsels met, and confided to each other the secret of their loves, unconscious that they were all to become the future heroines of the law—unconscious that whole tribes of great-grandchildren would yearly every incident of their history, of their loves and their marriages, be so often and so reverently recalled to the ears of every juvenile of poetry or romance. For never, surely, have the woe of Juliet, or the wrongs of Desdemona, the epic tale of Angelica or Clorinda, or the gay adventures of Sophia Western or Di Vernon, been read and re-read with so rapt an attention, so deep and absorbing an interest, as has been old inspired by the simple story of Annika Jants, Catalynde Van Benthuysen, and Jannatta Bos. Little, indeed, could they have dreamed that their names were to be descended to the remotest posterity in the pages of learned reporters, whose grandmothers were yet unborn; that they were to become the subjects of foretold eloquence, of legal acuteness, of judicial wisdom; above all, little did they dream that the very sound of their own malicious names would hereafter call forth from their graves Bracton and Plowden, and Coke and Croke, and Foster and Litch and Levin, all those judges and creators old, who are doomed, for certain sins committed in their professional flesh, occasionally to revisit the precincts of the law, each in his parchment-shroud, making courts hideous.

Here, too, was the scene of our youthful lover of that goodly youth, Jan Peterson Bos, when he wooed and won the blessing of his father, and on this very spot, as ancient records tell, were they joined in holy wedlock by Domine Bogardus. When the good man joined their hands, the demon of filial discord, perched (as Milton describes Satan in Paradise) on the first parents) on the wide-branched elm that overshadowed the domine's roof, set like a cornucopia, and gazed with malicious triumph upon the scene as it unfolded before him in less than a century and a half the issue from that marriage would be arrayed in stern hostility, against the very successors in office of the kind old domine—how he himself, the strongest and fiercest spirit of the law, should breathe his own fire into their breasts, how he should arm their selected champions for the contest in mail of proof, from his own well-stored memory, and giving each his black-lettered shield, did them "Lay on, Macbeth!"

We are then, I repeat, upon the classic ground of our law; and when hereafter the volumes of Johnson and Wendell are what the year-books of Henry VII. now are, doubtless fall many a lawyer from the yet unset and unexplored future state beyond the Rocky Mountains, full fraught with learning of lapsed deities and desires to charitable uses and devices ad initium, and the rest of that learning which Lord Coke declares to be more perplexing to a lawyer than all his other learning put together—many such a lawyer will come hither in pious pilgrimage to visit the ground hallowed by the memories of Annika Jants and Jannatta Bos.

Our learned, pains-taking and philosophical stewards had another important, though secondary object also in view in this change of location and of our host with it. They propose to make these solemn festivities the means of a series of profound experiments conducted according to the strict Baconian method upon the principles of cookery and its several sciences and theories. The last annual banquet was prepared by French artists, according to the strict and severe principles of the classic school of science. The present, as you perceive, is an ingenious and excellent union of the English and Dutch kitchens, not without some admixture from other quarters. A few repetitions of these great and complicated experiments, the stewards trust, will not only lead to most salutary and agreeable practical results, but may also settle some great theoretical principles. One of these, long in doubt, seems peculiarly important.

The prevailing culinary philosophy teaches that perfect cookery is to be attained only by a selection and combination of the several excellencies of various schools. But high authority has held that this doctrine is erroneous, and that excellence is to be best reached by keeping the several schools of art quite distinct, and by carrying each to its peculiar point of perfection. So far did that exemplary and epicurean prelate, the late earl of Bristol, (better known in Irish politics as the bishop of Derry,) carry this doctrine, that for the purposes of his liberal hospitality he kept five several kitchens, so perfectly distinct, that he turned off his favourite French cook for peeping into the English kitchen to watch the roasting of a sirloin. Some ten or twenty years of experiments will enable the stewards to settle these and other vexed questions with the satisfaction of the whole society to their own private experience and judgment; and when it is considered how many nations have spent more time than that in manufacturing a government to their taste, and that even the United States have employed nearly as much in experiments upon so insignificant a subject as the currency, it must be conceded without dispute that this short term will be well spent, in clearing up these reconcile and doubtful points of culinary science.

The physical condition of our society is highly satisfactory. I will not dilate upon the subject of the public health, because an ample report (which will be soon submitted to you) has been prepared by the learned head of our medical department, Dr. Francis, enriched as usual with elaborate elucidations and digressions, philosophical and physiological, philological and phrenological, medical and moral, dietetical, ethical and aesthetical.

My next official duty is to inform you of the state of our fiscal concerns. These are in such a state as to demand no further legislation, but are conducted according to the rules prescribed by the wisdom of our forefathers, and administered with fidelity and prudence. At the close of our fiscal year we have no outstanding claim against our treasury, and no debt funded or unfunded. We have no bonds or treasury notes to provide for—none having been issued; nor has there been any default among any of the officers entrusted with the public funds. It is indeed a pleasure to inform you, which should mark all our executive communications, that our auditing committee for some time hesitated to pass the accounts of our worthy treasurer in consequence of an error in his favour of three cents and three quarters, wholly unexplained and unsupported by any proper voucher. It was not so much the amount of the sum that made the difficulty, as the evil, moral and financial, of example of sanctioning such a gross departure from the accuracy of our accounts, and the precedent it might hereafter prove for fraud or negligence.

Disinclined and rejecting the arts of modern bookkeeping by which such errors are shrouded over, your financial functionaries proceeded in a searching and laborious examination, until at last the error was satisfactorily traced to the rejection of fractions less than one quarter of a cent in an interest account—a discovery which relieved alike the conscience of our treasurer and the honour of our society.

The example of certain other governments had induced some of the younger members among our constitutional advisers to suggest the propriety of enacting penal laws, inflicting severe and ignominious punishment upon defaulting or absconding public officers, and, at the same time, requiring large securities from all officers entrusted with the public treasure. We had no hesitation in rejecting this proposition as wholly in contradiction to our character and usages, and those of our fathers. As the Romans in the days of their virtue held it to be a crime of the highest order, to be punished by the sword, we hold that knowing as we do the crime of public defalcation only from report of what takes place in other governments, no officer of St. Nicholas can be bound by stronger ties, or give more ample security than his own word and honour.

Such being the state of our treasury, I am not obliged to exhort you to any rigid economy in expenditures. On the contrary, that duty having been already performed, I am bold to invite you to imitate our ancestors and apply their noble motto of old Harberdrecht, Dando Conservat, by employing the savings of our judicious parsimony in the relief of distress and the patronage of art and genius.

Having thus recapitulated to you the principal matters which have occupied our several departments, the boards of stewards, of medicine and of finance, it remains only to speak to you of those points which pertain solely to the personal administration of your chief magistrate or those vice-presidents who may temporarily represent him.

When I last met you, brethren, in this solemn assembly of our state-general, I was able to show the clearest evidence of my having in all things trodden in the footsteps of my illustrious predecessors, by the gratifying fact that not a murmur of discontent had been raised against any measure of our administration. It is now somewhat otherwise. A prominent and capital measure of our administration has been assailed and misrepresented, and a vengeful and proscribed press has lent its aid to the shameless misrepresentation of our conduct and motives in assuming for public and official purposes—and those only—the primitive and constitutional decoration of your official head—the old-fashioned cocked hat.

To the enlightened and patriotic majority of our body who have thus far triumphantly sustained our administration, this measure requires neither defence nor explanation. To the hostile and misguided few who have given a willing ear to the calumnies of a purchased press, I might well be content to reply that I take the responsibility of using the high inherent prerogative of the executive, as I understand my own official rights and duties.

But I would, rather in the language of reason and argument, appeal to the sober second thoughts of our misled brethren. I do not, their owner though they be, have a joyless sort of a set: Carlyle, with his strong imagination, might fancy that they wept.

David Doleful gave no brow-sweat for his handsome fortune, nor did merit, put to interest, win him talents, but the blind goddess dropped her treasure gratuitously in his path. "It fell in his way," said Jack says of Worcester's rebellion, "and he found it." Yet doth he grumble of his ill-fortune! With the constitution of a horse and the health of a buck, he is ever whining about debility and inward aches! His wife is the best housekeeper in the country, his children dutiful and his domesticks faithful; still grumbleth he of "mismanagement," "disobedience" and "extravagance."

He sold some bank-stock—it netted him an unexpected profit; the next day he sold more, with greater gain; at which he cursed his stars because the previous sale had been a sacrifice! For many hours afterward he groaned gall and spleen, and thrice that day he kicked his unoffending dog. With everything around him to render him happy, David Doleful makes himself miserable. Always glowering over the dark side of the picture, his distempered imagination multiplies the horrors, and the dim perspective crowds with forms of evil. Expecting mishap, he huggeth to himself its counterfeits anxiously; and, fancying that he is in the iron-armed embrace of the real Simon Pure, snivels like a whipped school-boy.

How unlike Jerry Cary! Jeremiah, little like his biblical name, save that he is full of harmony, never laments anything. "Ride si sapia" is his motto, and he is right. It is better to laugh than cry. Ill-luck has often battered at his patience, but never succeeded in disturbing its equanimity. Well-do I recollect, how good-humouredly at school he bore the flagellations due the peccadilloes of others. In truth, he made the best of everything.

Nature had not formed his person in her most classick mould, maugre whatever she had done for his mind. At school his face was distinctly freckled, his hair—in courtesy it was styled auburn; and his "organ of smell"—that was unequivocally snub.

"Never mind!" said Jerry, "I shall not be troubled by the petticoats. My face is my orgie." In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, such a conclusion would have been correct, but Jerry was fated to stumble over the solitary exception; inasmuch as a young and rather handsome heirress, forgetting his defects of phiz, and seeing only his contented disposition and intellectual worth, fell in love with him one day, and he, very good-naturedly reciprocating the compliment, married her.

Proceeding home in a carriage from the church where the union had just been consummated, the vehicle upset, spilled the bride and brides-maid, and broke a leg of the bridegroom.

It was, especially, mal-appropos to break a limb upon such an occasion, and Jerry had as much reason to repine at the accident as any one, similarly situated, could have, but he bore it with his usual good nature.

"Ah!" said he, one day in the last quarter of his damaged honeymoon, in answer to an expression of regret, endearment and sympathy which had escaped his interesting spouse—"Tis all for the best, Susy! I desired a little in-door life. Besides, but for this accident, my love, business would not have allowed me so much of your company. So, ha! ha! upon my word, I look upon it as one of the most fortunate events of my life. I do, indeed!"

"Now, now, you bear it too cheerfully! I declare you do!" exclaimed his wife, tossing her pretty head a little—a very little angrily: "A broken leg so inopportune is, to say the least, an excessive annoyance!"

"Ha! ha! All for the best, my love. But stay! I had forgotten that being 'flesh of my flesh, and bone of my bone,' you suffer as much as I from these shingles and bandages!"

Susan's first child was, unfortunately, born blind. "Not so very unfortunate, after all!" said Jerry. "It might have been worse. Let us thank an omniscient Providence that the dear little fellow is not club-footed. Surgery may, perhaps, remedy his sight; and if it can't, why—why, after all, the faculty of seeing is so often abused—so often a curse to its possessor! It changed Lot's wife to a lump of salt, you know!"

Such is Jeremiah's philosophy; and for all trials, great or small, he makes it applicable.

His wife broke a pitcher—a costly one.

"Dear me! What a pity!" said she, provoked at her own carelessness.

"Not a whit!" responded Jerry. "I never liked that pitcher. Such an awkward handle! I'll get another."

His chimneys were contrary. There are few who can keep their patience in smoky rooms; Jeremiah, however, after fully ascertaining that with his house the nuisance was incurable, forthwith began to extol the virtues of smoke, and it was not until after he had sold his becom-making residence, and purchased an abode more conducive to comfort, that he would allow that smoke was not an indispensable necessary to civilized life.

His little blind boy withered and died, like a sunless rose, ere he could lisp "father!" Susan had been a second time a mother, but her love for her first-born burned brightest, for to the pure flame of maternal love was added interest for the darkness which shrouded his vision like a continual night. Even so was the poor boy endeared to the heart of his father. Sad indeed, then, was the ceremony with which the little sufferer was consigned to the grave, where all are blind alike.

They returned to their dwelling. The prattle of the sightless one no longer greeted their foot-fall—all seemed cheerless and desolate to Susan, and sitting down, she hid her face in her hands and wept. The heart of Jeremiah was sad, but not to abandonment, like that of his wife. He opened the Bible given him by his mother on her death-bed, and, drawing his chair near to Susan, read aloud that beautiful chapter wherein our Saviour asks for little children to be brought unto him, "for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

When he had concluded, he closed the book and clasped the hand of his wife affectionately within his own.

"Susan!"—said he, and his voice sounded like gentle music in her ears—"let us not murmur. God is just—is merciful: If he had lived, it would only have been to grope through the world. Now he is in heaven, where to all, all is light. Let us deserve to meet him there."

Only a few years afterward Jeremiah was reduced to comparative poverty. The bulk of his property had been invested in the stock of the bank, which failed, unable to pay a shilling on a dollar. Thus compelled to dispose of his expensive establishment, change his style of living altogether, and, with his wife and four children, take to "short commons," his spirits did not desert him.

Said Jerry, "Never mind!"—two words which he never failed to throw at the teeth of every mishap which he encountered—"Never mind! I like variety. I'm tired of riding in a carriage. I broke my leg in one once. Walking is an exercise that I need very much. Come, come, this is not so bad an affair after all—it will test the value of my friends. Besides, now, I can earn the bread we eat. Ah! it will be a labour of love, and that enriches the soul! I can almost say that I am glad this accident has happened: I can, indeed!"

Let no one think that our patient friend's philosophy is the apathy of the stoic. It arises from no lack of sensitive and acute feelings, but from a benevolent determination to make the best of everything. This is the secret of his contentment under a load of mishaps and reverses.

Ever striving to render all around him happy, he is a sterling friend; never repining at the decrees of Providence, he is a true Christian.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

REASONS FOR JOHN SMITH TO CHANGE HIS NAME.

New-York, December 20, 1838.

DEAR SIR—There is a subject on which any one might be eloquent; emphatic, energetic, but I fear there is no pen adequate to convey to you the importance of it. It is a curious subject, no less a one than to ask a man to change his name!

"Smith, you will certainly have to change your name."

We thought at first of approaching you with a round robin, as the conspirators did in the olden time. We intended to set forth the many and the cogent reasons why such a change should be made, and as our signatures would follow one another in a circle, the ring-leader of so daring a proposition would never be known. On the whole, however, it was thought most advisable to write a letter, and I volunteered to incur the risk of your taking offence—as if any one of the name of Smith could take offence at a proposal of this kind.

To say your name is Smith is enough—it speaks volumes in itself. To be sure, it is a word of only one syllable, but look at the letters which compose it! They are, individually, the most contemptible in the alphabet, and always serve to usher in whatever is pitiful or worthless, and there is no other method of conveying an impression of a Small—Mean—Insignificant—Trashy—Humbug, but by appropriating the five initials—and these five initials what are they when combined—why—SMITH!

No honest man could change his name for that of Smith even were it, Sheepshanks, Pot, Kettle, Vinegar or Bellows, of which names there are many on record. He would not change any of these, objectionable as he thinks them, for one that would place him behind a screen all his life. No, he would not take the shadowy name of Smith, even under the expectation of inheriting an estate. Not for the reason, that no one of that name could by any possibility have an estate to bequeath, but that he would lose his personal identity.

I doubt whether there are at this day more than two men who could find any reasons strong enough to be induced to take the name of Smith. These two men—par nobis scriptum—our two recent, glorious defaulters—they might find it convenient to preserve their incognito; and in what way could they effect it so completely as to veil themselves in this misty, gauzy apology of a man?

Do you think the police-officers would ever run after a man by the name of Smith? They never pursue the crime, but the criminal, and this criminal must have a name—is Smith a name—ergo, our two noble defaulters would remain unwhipped of justice even on the idle supposition that the government issued warrants against them. "Why don't they prove an alibi!" said Weller, sen. Smith is an alibi in itself. Let rogues, therefore, hide behind this magnetic board, for they will be invisible to us; but, like Dr. Elliotson's two hospital girls in London, this board will be no obstruction to them.

Smith, therefore, is a nonentity, a dead letter—a dead letter, did I say? Why, he that owns it is dead and buried. The very playwrights make fun of it. In a recent farce one of the characters is made to say, "Smith, Smith, I am sure I have heard that name before." Did you ever see a man that did not blush deep crimson when you asked his name, if it be that of Smith? Talk of the man who lost his shadow, Schlemiel, I think, he was called; what was that compared to the loss of the substance, for he that loses his personal identity is lost indeed.

It has been often said that if you are in Broadway and call out Mr. Smith, every tenth man will turn; but if you call out John Smith, every other man will look round.

No Smith ever gets rich or gets fame; if by chance one of the name does a clever thing or writes a clever book, who can identify it? What Smith reaps the benefit of it! The honour is diluted to a homopathick dose, and the Smith who ought to swallow the whole allopathick credit, gets only the millionth part of a drop to his share.

Do you think that the Messrs. Carvill or Harper would be so indiscreet, or so insane, as to buy the copyright of a work from any man by the ubiquitous name of Smith?

Men never think of calling their dogs Smith. Caesar, Pompey, Carlo, Napoleon, Victoria, these are the names, but not Smith; a sensible dog would not answer to it. Young puppies might; those that are in their blind state must put up with it till their eyes were open, but no longer. If John Smith were to engrave his name on a dog's collar, tens of thousands would whistle for him, for the name is Legion; nay, if "Legion" were engraved on the collar of a stray dog, the most natural thing in the world would be to carry him to a Mr. John Smith.

Every man that wants to travel incog., either to escape civilities or the penitentiary, calls himself Smith; not Smith by itself, but Captain Smith. No woman faints on board a steamboat, or at the theatre, or in Niblo's Garden, but there is a Dr. Smith, nay, several Drs. Smith, ready to officiate.

Good, honest, ingenious old Tom Smith, the famous blacksmith that once flourished in Courtlandt-street, told me that he often wondered and wondered, his name being Smith, that he should have been so foolish as to double his cognomen—that he should tack it to head and tail—Smith, the blacksmith! However, said the poor, vexed man, I thank heaven that I am not rich, for I might then have sent my son to college, and as sure as fate he would come to a doctor, which would be worse than all.

A Dominie Smith might, perchance, die a bishop, but no thanks to his name; he climbs up the ladder by holding fast to the skirts of some patron saint. He is not Bishop Smith, but the bishop of St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke, or St. John, or the bishop of Georgia or Maine.

No one likes to relate an adventure of which a man by the name of Smith has been the hero, (can such a name belong to a hero!) he dreads the thousand and one questions that will pour out upon him—"Which Smith? Where does he live? Has he a middle name? What is his first name?" Many a good joke, many an excellent anecdote has been smothered because the name of Smith was in it.

Paradise could not hold all that have come and gone by the title of Smith. St. Peter would be afraid of a disturbance, he would not open the gates to let any more in, I am convinced.

The proverb says, that if all lost things went to the moon, how full of good advice it would be. And I say that if all doctors went to Old Nick, how full of Smith's his furnace would be.

It is said that the legislature will not grant permission to a man to change his name unless it be one that has an improper meaning, such a one that he could not offer to a lady without a blush, or in case of the expectation of an inheritance. Read this letter to them, and they will see at once that Smith is no name at all when inheritance is in question, and that a man does not only blush when offering it to a lady, but even to that august body the legislature themselves. Depend upon it, there will be no debate: you will receive your new name by return of mail!

I remain yours, in the hope of this change; but alas! I shall know you no longer if you are still to be John Smith; for crowds upon crowds are flitting before me, and all unreal. You will merge in the misty mass and become a hallucination. Adieu.

CHARADES.

I.

My first—but how describe to thee
What I myself scarce know!—
The source of love and joy; to me
Too oft, alas! of woe.

It is the gayest, saddest thing,
That heaven to mortals gave.
It flutters most on rapture's wing,
It withers o'er the grave.

My next I've sought, with toil and pain,
In various realms to find,
My search, alas! how very vain!
Its home is in the mind.

Mary, mayst thou, on whose dear breast
My whole in beauty glows,
Enjoy within that peace and rest
My whole alone bestows.

II.

Up—up—Lord Raymond, to the fight,
Gird on thy bow of yew;
And see thy javelin's point be bright,
Thy falchion's temper true:
For over the hill, and over the vale,
My first is pouring its iron hail.

No craven he! yet beaten back,
From the field of death he fled;
My second yawned upon his track,
The lion's lonely bed;
He smote the monarch in his lair,
And buried his rage and anguish there.

At dawn and dusk my whole goes forth
On the ladder's topmost round;
He looks to the south, and he looks to the north.
He bids the bugle sound;
But many a cheerless moon must wane,
Ere his exiled lord return again!

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

A WESTERN HEROINE.—The ladies who have received their juvenile education towards the villages of some of our States, though they may be deficient in tawdry, filigree, and cross-stitch, have managed to pick up some startling accomplishments, which partake decidedly more of the useful than the ornamental. A lady in Arkansas, Mrs. McBride, has lately distinguished herself in such a way, as to be embalmed in a newspaper paragraph. She was sitting quietly at home, engaged probably in some trifling occupation of elegant leisure; mending horse-shoes, or shaping axe-handles for example, when she was informed by one of her children that the dogs had trod a path within half a mile of the house. Having ascertained that she was in a neighbourhood of powder and lead, moulded some bullets, loaded her gun, and proceeded to the place and brought down her game at the first fire. The report of the gun started up another partner near at hand, which ran up a tree, within half a mile of the other. She again loaded her gun, and killed the second also at the first fire, from the top of one of the tallest trees. Such exploits remind one of the ancient history of this colony, when a sturdy yarewau would shoot an Indian, if necessary, with as little remorse as Mrs. McBride shot the panther.

NOT AT HOME.—The Philadelphia Spirit of the Times tells the following story at the expense of one of its customers:—"The services of collectors, it is known, are various as they are sometimes ingenious—and more especially so with collectors of newspaper bills. Ours has just related to us the following, which being good as well as late, we give it for the benefit of all parties. Dropping in at the place of business of a slippery customer, yesterday morning, he addressed the servant with—'Is Mr. Butler within?'—'No, he is out of town.'—'When can I see him?'—'I don't know—have you any special business with him?'—'Yes; there is a small bill which I wish to settle.'—'Well, said the servant, 'I don't know whether he will return this week or not.'—'But I wish to pay the bill, as I am to leave town immediately.'—'Oh; you wish to pay him some money?' He is up stairs, I'm thinking; I will call him. Please to walk in; take a chair, stir your hat, if you please. Mr. Butler will be with you in a moment.'"

VENETIAN JUSTICE.—There was formerly a law in Venice by which all the goods in the chamber of the deceased became the property of the priest who attended him in his last moments. It is so happened, on one occasion, a man died possessed of a considerable fortune in bills, bonds, notes, etc., which he kept in a portfolio under his pillow, and when, on his decease, Mons. Core proceeded, while the body was yet warm, to appropriate to himself. This the heir naturally resisted, and kicked the priest down stairs. The cure immediately preferred a complaint to the inquisition. The holy fathers ordered the offender to pay a fine of ten francs, and declared that, in future, if any one dared to pick his irreverence so far as to kill the priest, they should be flogged twenty! After this decision few ecclesiastics attempted to enforce so ticklish a law.

ECCENTRICITY.—A gentleman of original habits, the Baron de R., who has the mania of travelling on foot, in search of the picturesque, is perambulating France. If he finds any prospect impeded by a clump of trees, or even by a wood, he immediately enters into an arrangement with the owner of the land, hires workmen, and without regard to expense has it all cleared away to open out the view, which, when rendered complete, he enjoys for a few days, and then departs, never, perhaps, to see it again. Once, it is said, he wished to burn down a farm-house and buildings which destroyed a fine prospect, but could not prevail on the owner to judge him in this frink of fancy.

AN ORIENTAL APOLOGUE.—A blind man having contracted a violent passion for a certain female, married her, contrary to the advice of all his friends, who told him that she was exceedingly ugly. A celebrated physician at length undertook to restore him to sight. The blind man, however, desisted his assistance. "If I should recover my sight," said he, "I will be deprived of the love I have for my wife, which alone renders me happy." "Man of God!" replied the physician, "tell me, which is of the most consequence to a rational being, the attainment of happiness, or the attainment of truth?"

IMPORTANCE OF ECONOMY IN TRIVELS.—Two commercial men were lately disputing about the extent and importance of the houses which they represented, when one adduced as an instance of the extent of the correspondence of "his house," the fact that they saved two hundred pounds a year in ink by not putting strokes across the t's. "Oh," said the other, "that is nothing; our house saves upwards of three hundred pounds a year by not putting dots over the i's."

BURNS AND WOMEN.—Burns was a sort of male coquette; his desire to please women, and to gain their notice, never slept, and on this subject he betrayed too much vanity in his conversation. He found beauty in many of those to whom he paid attention, which was solely created by his own imaginations. His earnestness of manner, and the power of his eye, made him a general favourite with females. Many of his songs were on the lips and in the heart of every Caledonian nymph. The knowledge of this fact seemed to please him more than any other subject of his ambition.

SPIRITERS.—Some of our fair readers, perhaps, are ignorant of the origin of this term: will they allow us to enlighten them? Among our industrious and frugal ancestors, it was a maxim that a young woman should never be married until she had spun herself a set of body, table and bed linen. From this custom, all unmarried women were termed spinsters—an appellation which they still retain in all law proceedings.

CHART OF HEALTH.—Love.—A compliment of the heart growing out of an inordinate longing after something difficult to obtain. It attacks persons of both sexes, generally between the ages of fifteen and thirty; some have been known to have it at the age of sixty. Symptoms.—Absence of mind; giving things wrong names; calling tears nectar, and sighs sighs; a fondness of poetry and music; gazing on the moon and stars; loss of appetite; neglect of business; loathing for all things—save one; blood-shot eyes, and a constant desire to sigh.

Effect.—A strong heart-beat; pulse high; stupidly eloquent eyes; sleeplessness, and all that sort of thing. At times, imaginations bright—hovers of roses, winged cupids, and buttered peans; and then again, oceans of despair, racks, torments, and pistols.

Cure.—Get married.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We acknowledge the receipt from Washington of the voluminous Congressional Sketches by Dragon; there is so evident a political bias throughout, that we must, though with reluctance, decline publishing them. The personalities, however clever, with which they abound, indicate contrivance to render them inappropriate to our columns. We have received from a German correspondent a number of political translations in his native language from Mrs. Hemans. They appear to be executed with spirit and fidelity, but would do better for the merriment of Vienna than New-York. "Dramaticus" is referred to as being so wrong in supposing that we know any more than himself of the secrets of the green-room. We must decline the contributions of "T. V.," "Poldias," "Rosa," "S. T. P.," "Versus," "Qu.," "Lennon," and "S. N. M." The article on the theory of Stores is at the disposal of the author. Its length renders it thieved to our purpose. "No Annulla." Ladies promoting Broadway in verse must not be allowed of gentlemen fail to recognise their fair friends. We admire the elegance of these enviable wits, but totally disapprove of their monopolising the hidden smiles which are lost upon these screens of lewdy.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 12, 1839.

The Lady's Book.—We cheerfully avail ourselves of the commencement of a new volume, to say a word or two in behalf of this really valuable periodical. Modest and unassuming, as becomes a lady's book, it is, nevertheless, a most agreeable, well-stored and diversified miscellany, full of choice and capital contributions from the best of our native writers, in addition to which it not unfrequently furnishes original articles that bear the stamp of foreign and celebrated penmanship. Here, for example, in the January number before us, we find the productions of Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Hale, Mrs. Cornwall Baron Wilson, Mrs. Osgood, Mrs. H. B. Stowe, Mrs. Buchanan, Miss Leslie, Miss Miles, Grenville Mellen, C. W. Everett, W. B. Tappan, J. T. Fields, Professor Alden, and many others not unknown to fame, making altogether a host of contributors, of which any publisher might be justly proud. All whom we have named are, we believe, permanent correspondents. The truth is, our friend Godey, (than whom, we take this occasion parenthetically to say, a kinder or a better cannot be found,) has chosen the true course to make his Book attractive and popular. In these times of stirring competition, he who would prosper must strive; and, acting upon this maxim, he has laboured diligently not to fall behind the general progress. Wisely avoiding a system of paltry economy, he has been liberal in his outlays, both as regards mere mechanical appearances, and also in reference to the richer material that supplies his pages. His Book is neatly printed and handsomely embellished, and his list of correspondents needs no eulogium. Many of the names it embraces are of those whom it has long delighted us to honour, and who have often given grace and zest to our own pages. Under the judicious editorial management of Mrs. Hale and Miss Leslie, the Lady's Book has gained a high literary standing; and as their services are to be continued, the work, of course, will maintain the position it has acquired. Though from the variety of its contents it offers inducements to readers of both sexes, it is more especially devoted to the ladies; and it advocates their interest with becoming spirit; while, at the same time, it supplies articles expressly intended for their gratification. It is published monthly by L. H. Godey, Philadelphia, at three dollars per annum.

Croton water-works.—It is expected that the Croton river will be flowing and ramifying through our city, about the year '41. What a day of jubilee will it be, that sees our vast population plentifully supplied with pure, soft water! It should be celebrated in a manner worthy of the occasion. No man should be privileged to wear a long face on that day, unless it were Mr. Knapp; the worthy individual whose vocation it has been to supply our citizens with "pure spring" water. A new and powerful argument will be put into the hands of the temperance people, and the cold water and moonshine men will be almost tipsy—with excitement. Let there be, on that occasion, a grand jet d'eau constructed in the Park, and another on the Battery, and let the whole city quaff in the sparkling element to the health of the originators and builders of the Croton water-works.

Chiming of bells.—Why is the beautiful custom of chiming bells so totally out of use in this musical city? In Philadelphia and Boston, it is much in vogue, especially in the summer season, and we never heard that the effect was other than grateful to all hearers. There is no music which appeals to the sympathies of so many at the same moment, or which is more soothing and beneficial in its influence. We have often thought that there was no fiction in the story of the Russian nobleman, who was diverted from the commission of the crime of murder, by the recollections and associations of his days of youthful innocence, awakened by suddenly hearing the chime of the bells of St. Petersburg. What is become of the chiming bells of Trinity Church?

New public buildings.—The workmen continue busily engaged upon the new Exchange, and its gigantic proportions begin to loom up and assume an imposing and symmetrical shape. A short distance above, in Wall-street, the new Custom-house lifts higher and higher, every day, its white marble front. These two buildings will be honourable monuments of the taste and enterprise of the country. The foundation has been laid for the erection of the new building for our Athenaeum library in Broadway, opposite the Athenaeum Hotel. This structure is to be of brown freestone, a very appropriate and beautiful material, obtained from the quarries of our own state.

New theatre.—We learn that the ground in Chatham-street, near the corner of Roosevelt, has been leased for the erection of a new theatre. The location is an eligible one, but another theatre for New-York is as superfluous as a fifth wheel for a coach. Would it not be wise to wait until the theatres now in existence receive from the community an adequate support?

Theatrical—new plays, etc.—If the legitimate drama be on the decline, it cannot be for the want of new plays. We learn from the London correspondence of the Star, that the theatrical market is likely to be liberally supplied the coming season. A new tragedy, founded on the tragic fate of Ruzio, is in preparation at Covent Garden. Bulwer is writing a play, in which, Salvator Rosa will be the hero. It will be produced in February. The adventures of the artist are of a romantic and dramatic nature. Jerrold is busy on a new five act play, and Bernard on another. Knowles has a new play on the anvil. The story is historical, and founded on the well-known incident of the vesper of Palermo. The subject has been several times attempted, and most recently by a modern French poet, and by Mrs. Hemans. But we believe it has, as yet, formed the foundation of no successful stage-play. We cannot doubt that Knowles will do it justice. A new opera from Rooke, the author of Amilie, may soon be expected. We hope it will reach us before Shirreff and Co leave us. A new farce by Haynes Bayly, (decidedly the most successful of English farce-writers,) has been produced at the Haymarket. It is called Mr. Greenfish. Dickens's Oliver Twist and Nicholas Nickleby have been successfully dramatized. In the latter piece, Mrs. Keeley played the part of Smike. Van Amburgh continues to draw at Drury-Lane. We see the London papers announce, in flaming letters, a "Life of Van Amburgh, the celebrated beast-tamer," by one Mr. Washington Warren, of New-York. Vive la humming!

Periodicals.—A new series of Dr. Bartlett's widely-circulated and ably-conducted journal, the Albion, has been commenced with the new-year. It makes a beautiful appearance, and presents new claims upon the liberal support of the community. The Expositor is the title of a weekly journal, recently commenced in this city, by Louis Fitzgerald Tassiro. It is printed in a good style, and has, thus far, been edited with talent and good taste. We do not doubt it will attain a permanent and profitable establishment. The old New-England Galaxy, of Boston, has been revived by a son of the original editor and proprietor, and has entered, we trust, upon a prosperous career, under the auspices of Mr. Joseph H. Beckingham. The Baltimore Monument, conducted and published by Messrs. M'Jilton and Arthur, is the title of an excellent monthly publication, which we are always glad to see upon our table. It is worthy an extensive support.

Omnibuses.—We perceive that some of the omnibus managers have taken our hint as to the propriety of drawing up their vehicles close to the kerbstone, for the purpose of admitting or "letting out" passengers. Ladies, especially, should always refuse to cross a muddy street to enter an omnibus, when, with a slight exertion on the part of the driver, they might be spared the danger and the inconvenience. This subject is not of too trifling importance to call for an especial ordinance from the Mayor—for if omnibuses are licensed for the public convenience, it is proper that that convenience should be consulted with deference and attention.

Mr. Simmons's lectures on the poets.—We are glad to see that Mr. Simmons's course of lectures, at Clinton-Hall, on the English poets, have been attended by crowded and fashionable audiences. An introductory lecture, and two succeeding ones on Shakespeare, have already been delivered, and a third on Milton is advertised for Monday next. We can assure those of our readers who have not heard Mr. Simmons, that they have lost a rare intellectual entertainment. He is the best classicist we have ever heard. His style is brilliant and vigorous, and his resources of illustration are remarkably fertile, ingenious and original. His present course of lectures has, perhaps, been one of the most popular and best attended ever undertaken in this city.

New books.—We have received from Messrs. Lee and Blanchard, Oliver Twist, complete in two volumes, from the prolific pen of Charles Dickens. The same publishers have also issued a new novel, by Mr. Kennedy, entitled "Rob of the Bowl." It is an admirable fiction, and will, doubtless, run to several editions. "Bogota, or an Expedition to New-Grenada," by J. Steuart, is the title of an interesting volume from the press of the Messrs. Harper. It conveys much new and valuable information, respecting men and things in New-Grenada, and is written in a condensed and attractive style.

Mr. Dunlap's exhibition of paintings.—The exhibition of paintings at the Stuyvesant Institute, which closed on Saturday last, netted to our estimable fellow-citizen, Mr. Dunlap, about one thousand dollars profit. This was creditable to the city, and to the committee by whose exertions the exhibition was got up. We are happy to learn that Mr. Dunlap's history of New-York is in a state of forwardness, and will be forthwith put to press.

Grandjean's composition for the hair.—Our opposite neighbour in Barclay-street, Mr. Grandjean, offers a composition for the hair, which is really superior to any preparation of the kind we have ever tested. Its efficacy in strengthening and softening the hair has been abundantly proved, and, it is an article, the demand for which is already extensive, and must increase as its valuable properties become more known.

The churches of New-York.—We have seen, a little book, very neatly got up, published by R. Carter, 58 Canal-street, and for sale by all the booksellers, giving a succinct account of all the churches built in New-York, from the time of the first place of worship in the fort, at the foot of Broadway, to the present day, with the successive preachers. This work appears to us a very pretty and appropriate holiday present to the young, at this season, and containing much valuable information for the old.

POLISH DANCE.

CELEBRATED AS A FAVOURITE OF MADAME CELESTE—ARRANGED FOR THE PIANOFORTE BY WILLIAM WOOD.

ALLEGRO SCHERZANDO.

NEW MUSIC.

The following are the words of Mr. Horn's beautiful new melody, as sung by Mrs. Horn at the recent concerts and musical soirées. It is a production of exquisite merit, and must of course become universally popular. It has just been published by Davis and Horn, No. 411 Broadway. It is a fault in the copy before us, that the author's name is omitted. It should have been given in the title-page; but we presume the composer found the words in the newspapers as usual, and does not know himself to whom he is indebted for so much sweet poetry. Can any of our correspondents enlighten us upon this subject? We should like to know who the bard is, and it would be gratifying to find that he is a native writer; but we presume it will, like "I've been roaming," "Allen Water," etc. turn out to be the effusion of some one of the old poets.

ALL THINGS LOVE THEE—SO DO I.

Gentle waves upon the deep,
Murmur soft when thou dost sleep;
Little birds upon the tree,
Sing their sweetest songs for thee!
Cooling gales with voices low,
In the tree-tops gently blow.
When in slumber thou dost lie,
All things love thee—so do I.

When thou wak'st, the sea will pour
Treasures for thee to the shore;
And the earth, in plant and tree,
Bring forth fruit and flowers for thee!
While the glorious stars above
Shine on thee like trusting love:
From the ocean, earth and sky,
All things love thee—so do I.

THE FINE ARTS.

MUSIC AND POETRY.

On these exhaustless subjects, Mr. P. F. White intends to deliver a lecture at the Boston Lyceum. This gentleman is a graceful poet and a chaste musician, and his compositions have met with universal favour. Washington Irving and Thomas Moore have both spoken of his lyrical productions in terms of warm commendation. The efforts of such men as Horn, White, and Henry Russell, cannot be too highly appreciated. They would be cherished in any community having the least pretensions to taste or refinement. We have before us a letter from Thomas Moore, written to a friend in this city, from which it appears that Mr. White stands high in the estimation of that unrivalled minstrel.

PORTRAIT OF PROSPER M. WETMORE.

Inman has painted and Parker has engraved an admirable portrait of our gifted townsman, Prosper M. Wetmore, Esq. It is one of the best things that have emanated from the pencil or burin of either artist. A copy is hanging in our private office, and it seems almost an identity of the fine writer it portrays. It is one of the series of our PORTRAIT GALLERY, of which Irving, Halleck, Bryant, Willis, and Sprague, have already appeared. It will enrich the pages of the Mirror soon after the publication of one of Ward's chef-d'œuvres, engraved by Jordan, one of the most skillful artists in America, of whom very little at present is known. We feel quite certain that the subscribers to the Mirror will be astonished, as well as delighted, at the fidelity to nature and exquisite finish of these two elegant works of art. We hope to be able to place the first before them in the course of the present month, and the second very soon thereafter. We shall continue the PORTRAIT GALLERY of THE MIRROR, until we have published accurate likenesses of all our native writers, male and female, entitled to such a distinction.

MISCELLANY.

CUPID ANGRY.—A gentleman in this neighbourhood received, the other day, an appalling communication from his correspondent in Edinburgh. The latter, after having written a letter to his friend, in which he states, that "if anything new happens before the hour of post, I shall not fail to acquaint you," dropped down in an apopleck-ty and expired. The clerk who wrote the letter to the dictation of the master, upon learning this melancholy catastrophe, added, in a postscript, "Since writing the above, I have died;" and the letter was despatched accordingly.—Scotch paper.

THE KING'S ARMS.—A country fellow left his village one summer, and went to Windsor, for the loyal purpose of beholding his late majesty. On his return home he was asked by his neighbour if the night had answered his expectations. "Loch!" said the clo-hopper, "I was never so disappointed in all my life; why do you know now, that his arms were for all the world like the arms of any of us common men; and I wish I may die if I hadn't heard a thousand times that the arms of the king were a lion and a unicorn."

CONJUGAL BLISS.—It has been recorded by some anti-conjugal wag, that when two widowers were once condoling together on the recent bereavement of their wives, one of them exclaimed, with a sigh, "Well may I bewail my loss, for I had so few differences with the dear deceased, that the last day of my marriage was as happy as the first." "There I surpass you," said his friend, "for the last day of mine was happier."

A SCORE.—A drunken fellow being asked by a publican "to pay his score," amounting to ten pots of beer, replied, "No, no, wait till I've had twenty, and then it may be a score indeed."

THEATRICAL ANECDOTE.—There was a drunken pantomimist of the name of Wood, who was once attached to Manly's company. This fellow wished to appear in a speaking part, and at a very short notice found himself entrusted with the character of Orano, in the play of Pizarro. This gentleman has to deliver an account of Alonzo's deportment in the battle-field, and of his final captivity by the Spaniards. Sheridan's words bothered poor Wood, who, at the appointed time, marvellously disempowered by drink and fright, delivered himself, in choice cockney vernacular, of the following condensed report:

I seed him up—and I saw'd him down.
And then I—I saw'd him taken prisoner.

"Did ye?" roared Manly from the back of the boxes, "then I'll saw you off, Mister Wood, as a useless log, Mister Wood. Come round here for your week's salary, Mister Wood, and then cut your stick, Mister Wood!"

THE TAVERN DINNER.—A party of bon-vivants who recently dined at a celebrated tavern, after having drunk an immense quantity of wine, rang for the bill. The bill was accordingly brought, but the amount appeared so enormous to one of the company, (not quite so far gone as the rest,) that he stammered out it was quite impossible so many bottles could have been drank by seven persons. "True, sir," said Boniface, "but your honour forgets the three gentlemen under the table."

CAUTION TO LADIES.—"You are the very person I wanted," said a lady at a ball the other evening, to an officer of the Guards; "you must dance with Miss ———. Come, I'll introduce you to her." "Excuse me, I am no dancer." "Oh, but you can't refuse now. She is a very pretty girl, and has thirty thousand pounds." "Why, really, I am not a marrying man myself—but, if your ladyship pleases, I'll mention her to our man."

DAMAGES FOR A HEARTBREAK.—A young lady in Vermont has recently recovered no less than twenty-two thousand dollars from her sweetheart, who had broken his promise to marry her.

EARLY DREAMS.

Oh! never another dream can be
Like that early dream of ours,
When the fairy Hope, lay down like a child,
And slept amid opening bowers.
Little we recked of our coming years,
We fancied them just what we chose,
For whatever life's after lights may be,
It colours it first from the rose.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. Terms, FIVE DOLLARS per annum, payable, in a cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

O. P. Scott, Printer, corner of John and Gold-streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL, DEVOTED TO LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR.] SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NUMBER ONE BARCLAY-STREET, NEXT TO THE CORNER OF BROADWAY. [PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

VOLUME SIXTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, 1839.

NUMBER THIRTY.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE CHARTER OAK.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

CHARTER OAK! Charter Oak!
Tell us a tale
Of the years that have fled
Like the leaves on the gale:
For thou bear'st a brave annual
On thy brown root, and stem,
And thy heart was a casket
For Liberty's gem.

Speak out in thy wisdom,
Oracular tree,
And we, and our children
Will listen to thee;
For the lore of the aged
Is dear in our eyes,
And thy leaves and thine acorns
As relics we prize.

I see them—they come—
The dim ages of old—
The sires of our nation,
True-hearted, and bold;
The axe of the woodman
Rings sharp through the glade,
And the worn Indian hunter
Reclines in thy shade.

I see them—they come!
The gray fathers are there,
Who won from the forest
This heritage fair;
With their high trust in heav'n,
As they suffer'd or toil'd,
Both the tempest and tyrant,
Unblenching, they toil'd.

CHARTER OAK! Charter Oak!
Ancient and fair,
Thou didst guard of our freedom
The rudiment rare;
So, a crown of green leaves
Be thy gift, noble tree,
With the love of the brave,
And the thanks of the free!

TALES OF ROMANCE.

FRANCIS OF VALOIS; OR, THE LADIES' PEACE.

BY AGNES STRICKLAND.

THE beams of the setting sun stole beneath the heavy velvet curtains, that partially shaded the barred and grated windows of the apartment occupied by Francis L. of France, during his long and weary imprisonment in the gloomy fortress of the Alcazar, at Madrid, and tinged with deceitful brightness the sunken temples and faded cheek of the illustrious tenant of this lugubrious abode, as he reclined in a state of listless languor on his embroidered couch.

Francis had pined away many months since his disastrous overthrow at Pavia, in that restless fever of hope deferred, which maketh the heart sick. One day excited by the deceitful professions of his imperial rival, Charles V., and another, plunged into utter despondency, by the vexatious delays and disappointments to which he was doomed, till the mental travail which he endured produced a bodily illness of an alarming character.

It was at this critical period that his accomplished and amiable sister, the celebrated Marguerite of Valois, the widowed duchess of Alençon, with a degree of generous self-devotion, which, even in those days of chivalrous romance, was regarded by the princes of Europe with admiration and surprise, demanded and obtained from the Emperor Charles permission to visit her royal brother in prison.

An indefinite hint of the possibility of such an event as her arrival had been conveyed to Francis; but the more eagerly the presence of this beloved sister was desired by him, the more was he disposed to regard the idea of her coming as an improbable chimera, which was held out to amuse and cheer his drooping spirits by his faithful attendants.

On the present evening he was aroused from his feverish languor to a state of intense excitement, by hearing his inexorable jailer, Don Ferdinand Alarcon, summoned by the sentinel who had been patrolling with a lady, at the door of the ante-room.

"How now!" cried Don Ferdinand, stepping to the portal.

"It is a lady and her page, who are desirous of an interview with the king of France," was the reply.

"My duty to the emperor will not permit me to accede to their request," said Alarcon.

"We bring an order from the emperor," said the page, presenting a paper to Alarcon.

"This order," observed Alarcon, after he had carefully perused the pass, "empowers me to admit the duchess of Alençon and her attendant, into the presence of my illustrious prisoner; but I must first be convinced of the identity of the persons specified. Will you condescend to let me see you without your veil, madam?" continued he, addressing the lady.

She moved the enveloping screen for a moment, with a look which caused Alençon to recede three paces backward in surprise, as she significantly observed, "The emperor's order is not, then, sufficient warrant for my admittance?"

"Pardon me, madam; but you can scarcely expect one, who has the honour to be so well acquainted with your voice and features, to mistake you for the sister of the king of France."

"Have you, then, the audacity to dispute the written words of your imperial master?" inquired she.

"If there be any little underplot among the ladies," muttered Alarcon, "I trust the reckoning will be settled by the parties concerned."

"I will exonerate you from all blame," replied the lady, "except that of disputing the pass of which I am the bearer."

"Then, madam, I am to announce you, I suppose, as her grace the duchess of Alençon," said the sullen official, flinging open the jealously-guarded door of the inner room.

The sick monarch started from his couch, at the sound of that dearly-loved name, and extending his arms with passionate emotion, as Alarcon ushered the lady into his chamber, exclaimed,

"I am not, then, wholly abandoned of heaven! Heaven only knoweth how I have panted to embrace thee, my sweet sister. What, not a single word, or look, or kiss to bestow on thy unfortunate brother, Marguerite!"

"I fear I am the cause of disappointment to your majesty," said the lady, seating herself beside the couch. "I am not the lady of Alençon, but I come to cheer you with the tidings of her approach. Your royal sister greeteth you lovingly by me, and will be with you this present evening, heaven and the emperor willing."

"Blessings on the sweet voice that whispers such joyful news in the sick ear of a woful captive," said Francis; "but I must be permitted to look on the face of my gentle visitor," pursued he, removing the muslin in which the lady's face and figure had hitherto been enveloped. The features on which he gazed were unknown, and yet appeared familiar to the royal scrutinizer; they were noble, beautiful, and expressive both of dignity and goodness. Her age, which is a difficult point to ascertain in a fine woman, did not appear to exceed two-and-twenty; but the self-possession and easy grace of her manner might have belonged to a more advanced period of life.

"Your name, fair lady?" said the king.

"I am called Mademoiselle de Heilley," replied the lady, looking down, while a suffusing blush mantled her delicate cheek.

"You are then my subject, my charming friend," rejoined the king, with great animation, taking her hand.

"It is your custom, sire, to make so free with the ladies of your court?" asked the lady, with a smile.

"I am always proud to offer my homage to beauty," replied Francis, gallantly raising the hand which he held to his lips.

"Are you quite sure," pursued he, looking into the lady's eyes, "that my sister did not make you the bearer of some tender token of her love to me?"

"This ruby heart," replied the lady, taking the richly-wrought gold chain to which the gem was suspended from her neck.

"I shall wear it for the sake of her from whose lovely hands I receive the precious pledge," exclaimed Francis, bending one knee before his fair visitor.

"Come, invest me with the order of which I perceive you are the grand mistress."

"What order does your majesty mean?"

"That of St. Cupid," returned the king.

"Your majesty has, I fear, been long a practised votary of that mischief-loving little traitor," said the lady, throwing the chain about his neck.

"You hold me now your lawful captive," said the king, kissing the glittering links of the chain.

"For how long?" asked the lady.

"For ever."

"Or till you see a fairer face than mine."

"It is impossible."

"You are a perilous wooer, sire; and for my own peace, I have resolved never to see you again, till you are the husband of the queen dowager of Portugal."

"I will marry her to-morrow, then."

"Donna Eleonora will have cause to be flattered, when she understands the reason of your haste; but are you ready to perform the conditions on which your marriage with that lady depends?"

"My fair friend, we will not waste the sweet moments by discussing so painful a subject."

"Donna Eleonora has said that she would be prouder of being your wife, if you were only a landless knight, than of sharing any other crown in Christendom."

"And who empowered you to make this communication to me, sweetheart?" inquired Francis, taking Mademoiselle de Heilley by both hands, and bending a searching scrutiny upon her face. "Oh! my sister, the duchess of Alençon, was it! Mighty fine! I guessed as much when you began to talk of the Austrian; but I am not to be tricked by female diplomatsies! I am of full age and understanding to judge for myself, and, therefore, when you next favour me with a visit, my fair plenipotentiary, I hope it will be to make love to me on your own account, in which case I will endeavour to make you a more grateful return than I at present feel disposed to do."

"It is said that your majesty's heart is in the possession of the beautiful Française de Poix, your own subject."

"I have had leisure to repent me of the guilt and folly of my conduct in that instance, during my weary hours of sorrowful captivity and sickness," returned Francis; "and this broken heart has now centered all its affections upon France, and my fair young sons, and that dear sister, who will, perhaps, only arrive to close these eyes in their last repose." He bowed his face upon his pillow as he spoke, and sobbed with deep and passionate emotion, unrestrained by the presence of a stranger. It was, however, no stranger's voice, but accents that had been sweetly associated with all the best and purest pleasures of his life, from childhood upwards, that now, with tenderest words of comfort, interrupted this pause of agony, while dear familiar arms enveloped his wasted form in the fond embrace of a sister's holy love.

Francis uttered an exclamation of surprise, for the mysterious avant courier of his royal sister had disappeared, and Marguerite of Valois herself was hanging over his sick couch, and mingling her tears with his. He tried to welcome her, but could only falter out, "Marguerite, mine own true-hearted sister!"

"Rouse yourself, my pined eagle!" she replied; "your imperial jailer is at hand, and I would not for the honour of Valois, that the proud Spaniard should see that the victor-plumes that soared so triumphantly at Marignan, could droop in hopeless despondency under any reverse of fortune."

"It is the body, not the mind, that hath succumbed," said Francis, pressing his sister's hand to his throbbing temples.

"Let the ethereal and immortal principle, then, wrestle with the earthly load that cumbereth and oppresseth its energies," returned his sister. "Charles of Spain, alarmed by the account of your indisposition, comes this evening to visit you, and his foot is even now on the threshold."

"I will defy the cold-blooded fox to his teeth," exclaimed Francis, starting from his couch.

"Not so, my brother; fight him with his own weapons, diplomatic coolness and reserve."

It was not in the nature of Francis to follow this prudent counsel, and when his imperial rival, attended by his chancellor Gattinari, and his own physician, whom he had brought to visit his illustrious captive, entered, he reproachfully addressed him in these words:

"Your majesty has then come at last to see your unfortunate prisoner die!"

"Not so, my brother and my friend," replied Charles, advancing to the foot of the couch, "but to speak of hope and speedy restoration to health and to liberty. I have also brought an old friend and faithful vassal to visit you, who will be only too happy to renew his homage."

"If your majesty means my traitor constable, Bourbon, I will not consent to be insulted with his presence. I trust there is none other subject or vassal peer of mine, over whom your majesty possesses the slightest influence," exclaimed Francis, passionately.

A smile of intelligence was exchanged between the emperor and the duchess of Alençon at these words. "Be calm, my brother," whispered she, laying her hand on his arm; "no insult is intended." At the same moment, on a signal from the emperor, Pepin, the dauphin's foster-brother, advanced from the ante-room, leading by the collar his royal master's favourite dog Clovis. Instead of bounding joyfully to greet his captive lord, the sagacious animal, with that mysterious tact which is instinctive to his race, paused, and looking wistfully in the monarch's face, uttered a low piteous note of recognition and sympathy.

"No traitor in sooth, but the most faithful and devoted friend art thou, my poor Clovis!" cried Francis; "but how came he at Madrid?"

"My sister, Donna Eleonora, understanding your majesty was suffering from indisposition, despatched an especial messenger to your royal sister the duchess of Alençon, requesting her to make your favourite dog and his little attendant the companions of her journey, and I petitioned my fair and illustrious guest to permit me to have the pleasure of presenting Clovis to your majesty."

"You had a fairer companion on your journey than these, my sister," whispered Francis, to the duchess of Alençon, as soon as the emperor and his followers had withdrawn.

"Whom does my royal brother mean?"

"Your charming attendant, Mademoiselle de Heilley. When shall I see her again?"

The countenance of Marguerite of Valois assumed an expression of uneasiness at these words. "If I had been aware that any previous acquaintance had existed between yourself and Mademoiselle de Heilley, I would have selected some other attendant," said she.

"My good sister," replied Francis, "I never saw your fair suzette till this evening, when you obligingly sent her to announce your kind visit."

"My brother, you are dreaming," said the duchess; "Mademoiselle de Heilley has never quitted me for a moment, till I left her in the ante-room just now."

"You did not then make her the bearer of this jewel?" demanded Francis, producing the ruby heart and chain.

"Certainly not. But it is plain that some fair lady has been your visitor, since the heart and chain are rather of too substantial a nature to be the creations of a feverish delusion. I will, however, summon my lady in waiting, that you may be convinced that you were mistaken with regard to its being Mademoiselle de Heilley."

When Mademoiselle de Heilley entered, Francis was compelled to acknowledge that she was not the lady who had used her name. He was evidently chagrined at the discovery, complained of fatigue, and permitted the ladies to withdraw.

When the duchess of Alençon came to visit her royal brother the next day, she was pale and sad, and her countenance bore the traces of mortification.

"The object of my journey to Madrid has been frustrated," said she. "Donna Eleonora, your promised bride, has left Madrid, and undertaken a pilgrimage to Guadalupe, as an excuse to avoid seeing me, or it may be that she has taken umbrage at something you have said of her to my mysterious visitor, who was, doubtless, some practised siren whom that wily dissembler, Charles of Spain, sent hither to bewitch you, calculating on the great defect in your moral character."

"I will stake the fairest province in France, that she with whom I discoursed last night was not less chaste than beautiful," exclaimed Francis; "though with regard to my own conduct, I believe I was foolish enough to make love to her."

"Oh! doubtless you acted with your usual want of discretion; but upbraidings are unavailing. It is enough that you have mortally offended your affianced bride, and frustrated all my plans for your deliverance."

"Have you tried your influence with Bourbon, Marguerite?" asked Francis, eagerly.

A deadly paleness chased the lively bloom from the cheek and lip of the royal widow, as she replied mournfully:

"Even to that degradation have I stooped for the sake of my king and brother."

"And—and the traitor!"

"Is willing to renounce his treasons, to sue for pardon on his bended knee, to his captive liege lord, and to place his sword, his fortunes, his life, his honour, even, at my disposal; but, Francis, he is powerless. Like you, I have been the dupe of Charles of Spain, and he has not the means of repairing the mischief he has wrought."

"Not if I reward him with my pardon, and your hand, Marguerite?"

"The terms on which you would purchase his good offices have been made known to him," replied she, mournfully; "had they been offered previously to the battle of Pavia, you had been now on the throne of France, and master of the Milanese."

"Impossible; you were not then a widow, Marguerite, and from the moment that our mother plighted your reluctant hand to Alençon, Bourbon became my deadliest foe."

"Such, indeed, has been the result of my mother's cruel policy, and your unkind acquiescence in the sacrifice of one who deserved better things at your hands, Francis of Valois. But I spare reproaches; you are reaping the bitter harvest of your own sowing."

"But, my sweet Marguerite, you are now released from your weary bondage to the poison Alençon, and are free to wed with the object of your earliest affections, Bourbon."

"No, Francis; Bourbon cannot now repair the wounds he has inflicted on his country. He has explained to me, in the bitterness of his vain repentance, the impossibility of his rendering you any assistance. He is neither trusted nor respected by his new allies, the foes of France. Would that he had died on the blood-stained field of Pavia, when his rebellious sword severed the last link that bound him to the heart of Marguerite of Valois!"

"You have, then, told him this?"

"No; he told me that thus he read my feelings—that he was unworthy of me, and being unable to repair his crimes, he dared not sue for reconciliation. We have parted to meet no more on this side the grave, and all I now live for is my country. I still hope to see the means of restoring to France her king, if he will be true to himself."

The duchess of Alençon then unfolded to her royal brother a prospect for his escape from prison, into which Francis eagerly entered. The plan followed through the treachery of one of his attendants, who, having quarrelled with his colleague, Le Rochepot, who was more fully trusted than himself, he, out of revenge, denounced the plot to the Spanish authorities. Francis was, in consequence, subjected to a more rigorous confinement than before, and the Emperor Charles, understanding the share which the duchess of Alençon had taken in arranging the matter, took measures for arresting her person as soon as the date of her safe conduct had expired; and Marguerite, while bending all the energies of her ardent character to the great object for which she had entered Spain, the deliverance of her royal brother, had been so inattentive to the lapse of time, as to have arrived within two days of the limits of this period.

She received a hasty warning of the emperor's design from Bourbon, and having taken a hurried farewell of Francis, and received from his hands an instrument whereby he abdicated the throne of France in favour of his son the dauphin, she left Madrid privately, and travelled with such expedition, that before Charles had received certain intelligence of her flight, she was beyond the reach of his power.

After her departure, Francis sunk once more into a state of listless melancholy. His appetite failed; he refused to take air, exercise, or recreation; sleep forsook his pillow, and a dangerous relapse of fever, brought on by agitation and anguish of mind, succeeded, Gattinara, the honest chancellor of the Emperor Charles, to whom the state of the royal captive was reported by the physicians, thought proper to announce it to his imperial majesty in the following blunt terms:

"Will it please your majesty, that the last consolations of the church be administered to the king of France?"

"The last consolations of the church to Francis of Valois!" repeated the emperor, in surprise; "what next will he require?"

"Embalming and interment, if it be your imperial pleasure to grant him the favour of royal exequies," replied Gattinara. "The fact is, my lord, you have delayed the fulfilment of your promises so long, that in all probability Francis of Valois will get his release to-night from a higher power than yours, and you will be regarded by Europe in the light of his murderer."

"Nay, then," cried the emperor, "he shall be espoused to our royal sister, Donna Eleonora, to-morrow."

"It is the opinion of six physicians, that Francis of Valois will be wedded to another spouse before to-morrow."

"In that case no time is to be lost," cried the emperor, "for we shall not be able to claim any benefit from the treaty he has signed, not even a dowry for my sister. Lannoy," pursued he, turning to the vicerey of Naples, with whom he was engaged in a game of chess, "go to the queen of Portugal, and tell her to repair, with her ladies, to the Alcázar."

"Your majesty forgets that Donna Eleonora is still absent on the pilgrimage which you compelled her to undertake."

"That is an unlucky circumstance, but not without remedy: the parties must be espoused by proxy."

"Where shall we find a proxy who can prepare himself for so important a ceremony in so short a notice?" asked Gattinara, coolly. "Your majesty's imperial consort, and the ladies of her court, are not at Toledo, consequently you cannot select a noble maiden for the purpose of representing your illustrious sister, without great difficulty and loss of time, to say nothing of the pride and importance of the Spanish nobles in their family arrangements. And this is so extraordinary a business."

"What is to be done, Lannoy?" said the emperor.

"Something, or nothing, it is plain," replied the vicerey, with a sarcastic smile; "and if I did not fear giving offence to Her Majesty Donna Eleonora, I would ride off to Madrid, and receive the nuptial ring from King Francis, in her name."

"And as her proxy?" asked Gattinara, dryly.

"Why not? a proxy only means a representative who expresses the consent of an absent person, which, as we all know Donna Eleonora has no objection to this alliance, I will venture to do, with regard to her marriage with Francis of Valois."

"Ride, then, with all the speed you may, Lannoy, that we may claim a dowry for my sister as his widow," cried the emperor.

In an incredibly short period after this conversation, the feverish alarums of the royal captive were interrupted by the entrance of a priest, who, approaching the bed, with his breviary in his hand, asked, "if his majesty of France were disposed to enter into the holy state?"

"Not much, I confess," replied Francis; "however, heaven's will be done. Are you about to administer the last sacrament, father?"

"There are two others which, in your majesty's case, must precede that consoling ordinance, namely, matrimony, and penance; and for the first of these I am come to prepare your majesty."

"Matrimony!" cried Francis, in a feeble voice, "will you be pleased to produce the bride?"

"Don Ferdinand Alençon," said the priest, "I charge you, in the name of the emperor, to introduce the proxy of that illustrious lady, Donna Eleonora, the queen dowager of Portugal, into this chamber, and to arrange everything for the immediate celebration of her majesty's nuptials with the king of France."

"How now, Lannoy!" exclaimed Francis, as the vicerey, booted and spurred, dashed with dust, and breathless with hard riding, entered the chamber; "is it from your hands that I am to have the honour of receiving my Spanish bride?"

"No; it is Alençon who is to act as the deputy of our imperial lord, on this occasion, and I am to have the honour of representing the illustrious bride," replied Lannoy; "your majesty will be graciously pleased to excuse my whiskers and shoes, I hope."

"C'est égal," muttered the astonished bridegroom, with an expressive shrug. The bearded representative of the bride gave an authoritative nod to the priest to commence the spousal rite, and Francis, supported in his bed with pillows, allowed his trembling hand to be guided, by his page Pepin, to place the nuptial ring on the huge finger which Lannoy thrust forth to receive the symbol of union between the imprisoned monarch of France, and the sister of his imperial master. At the conclusion of this farcical solemnity, Francis sunk back on his pillow in a state of exhaustion, so nearly resembling death, that the proxy of his future queen rode back to Toledo, with fiery speed, to announce to Charles V. that the prediction of the physicians would assuredly be verified.

Contrary, however, to their opinions, the crisis of the fever terminated favourably, and Francis slowly, but surely, recovered from his perilous sickness. The Emperor Charles paid him friendly visits during his convalescence, and the arrangements for his restoration to liberty were soon after completed. Hostages were, however, demanded by the emperor, for the fulfilment of the hard conditions of his release, and the payment of his enormous ransom. These hostages were to be either the heirs of twelve of the noblest families in France, or his two sons, the dauphin and his brother Francis Henry.

Francis rushed to the eyes of the royal vicerey of Marignan, when the bitter alternative was submitted to his consideration; but he replied, without hesitation, "Mine own fair sons must be the victims, then; I cannot ask any of my peers to resign a father's fondest hopes to break my chains." The young princes were accordingly conducted to the frontier town of Andaye by Marshal Lentre, and on the eighth day of their journey, the memorable scene of the exchange of these royal children for their father, took place. Francis, guarded by Alençon and Lannoy, and fifty horsemen, appeared on one bank at the moment that Marshal Lentre, with the dauphin and his brother, reached the other.

A barge had been moored in the mid-stream of the Bidassoa, which formed the border of demarcation between the hostile realms of France and Spain. On the deck of this vessel, the long separated father and his sons met and exchanged a warm embrace, as a prelude to a yet longer parting. "It is not meet that the foes of France should behold me in my hour of weakness," exclaimed Francis, desisting the cruel moisture from his eyes; and straining his children once more passionately to his throbbing breast, he tore himself from their caresses, leaped into the boat which had brought them to the barge, and springing to the shore, mounted his royal charger, which was in waiting for him there, waved his hand, and shouting, "Once more a king!" rode off at head-long speed, not trusting himself to cast a backward glance towards the Bidassoa, where he last, containing the precious pledge which he had given for the fulfilment of the hard conditions of his release, was rapidly gliding towards the hated shores of Spain.

The first use which the enfranchised monarch made of his freedom, was to protest against the whole tenor of the treaty to which he had been induced to affix his signature, while labouring under an access of morbid excitement; and regardless both of the matrimonial engagements into which he had entered with Donna Eleonora of Austria, and the perilous position in which his children were placed, he allied himself with his former enemy, Henry VIII. of England, and took an early opportunity of declaring war against Charles. Three years of harassing campaigns, equally ruinous in their effects to the prosperity of France and Spain, succeeded; and during this period the sons of Francis were confined to the custody of Donna Eleonora, the affianced bride of their father, and by her they were cherished with not less than maternal tenderness. She superintended their education with the same care which she bestowed on that of her young daughter the infanta of Portugal, and finally succeeded in winning the affection of the youthful hostages: while she gently, but earnestly, exerted the influence which her virtues and talents had acquired for her in her own family, in endeav-avouring to compose the difference between her imperial brother and her affianced husband.

The death of Francis was, from the cradle to the tomb, peculiarly affected by the power of female influence. Left an orphan at the early age of three years, he was educated by his widowed mother, Louise of Savoy, whose ascendancy over his affections was at times perniciously enough exercised after he came to the throne; but, on the other hand, the bright genius and energetic spirit of his high-minded and accomplished sister, Marguerite of Valois, which were ever exerted for his good, were productive of the happiest effects, both on his fortunes and his character. It was from the clear head and brilliant imagination of this amiable princess, that the felicitous idea first emanated, of referring the differences between those irreconcilable foes, Charles and Francis, to a female congress, composed of the emperor's aunt, that veteran stateswoman, the Lady Marguerite, regent of the Low Countries, Louise of Savoy, the mother of Francis, Eleonora of Austria, and herself. It was to the mildness, patience, and good feeling exhibited by these royal diplomatists extraordinary, that the exhausted realms of Austria, France, and Spain, were indebted for that happy termination of their hostilities which is emphatically styled, in history, "THE LADIES' PEACE."

It was on the fifth of August, 1529, nearly three years and a half from the day when Francis I. regained his liberty at the price of resigning his sons into the hands of his ungenerous rival, that a scene not less interesting than that which we have previously described, took place on the bosom of the watery boundary between France and Spain, where the constable Montmorency gave the sealed cases containing the money stipulated for the ransom of Francis I. in exchange for the betrothed bride of Francis and his sons. The illustrious party landed at Bordeaux, and Eleonora, still wearing the dress of a royal widow, entered, with a fluttering heart, the presence of her long wedded, but as yet unknown lord, leading, in either hand, the princely heir of France and his brother, who, but for her contrivance, not even of a mortal, would, in all probability, have been doomed to life-long captivity in a Spanish fortress.

Francis rose from his chair of state, and advanced to pay his first compliments to his Spanish bride rather with the formal courtesy of a royal act of ceremony, than the alacrity of a lover.

"I bring your majesty a dowry more precious than both the Indies," said Donna Eleonora, practising this two-fold compliment; "and I ask of you in return for the three years of maternal care which I have bestowed upon them, is that you should regard me, not as the sister of your foe, but as the happy instrument of restoring your children to your arms."

"If that sweet voice deceive not my ear, I have long regarded you with tender feelings still," exclaimed Francis, with sudden animation.

"Come, my fair sister, it is time to elucidate the mystery," said the duchess of Alençon, removing the veil which had hitherto enveloped the person of the royal bride, and revealing to the eager gaze of her king and brother the well-remembered features of the lady who had visited him in the Alcázar; and Francis, bending his knee before his blazing consort, exclaimed: "My wife and my queen, behold how faithfully I have worn thy chains!" He opened his embroidered pourpoint as he spoke, and pointed to the glittering links that she had thrown about his neck on the eventful evening when she availed herself of the duchess of Alençon's pass to obtain an interview with the captive monarch, who had been a suitor to her brother for her hand.

The scheme had been devised between Donna Eleonora, and Marguerite of Valois, but the circumstance having been betrayed by Alençon to the Emperor Charles, had exposed the fair dowager of Portugal to a severe reproof, and the sentence of a pilgrimage to Guadalupe, as a punishment for the bold step she had ventured, to avenge a pretension to any future meetings between her and her affianced lord. On the following day, the marriage of Francis and Eleonora was celebrated at Bordeaux with great pomp, and was hailed by the war-worn people of France as the last auspicious seal of "THE LADIES' PEACE."

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

A RUSSIAN ALMAKAZ.

When the caterie of Almack's was first established, the fair and noble dames who constituted its committee, and selected the wife of the Russian Ambassador as one of their chief celebrities, were little aware how recently emancipated from barbarism were the countrywomen of the beautiful and accomplished princess, and how rapid had been the progress of civilization among the imitative Muscovites. What Peter the Great found the Russians on his accession to the throne is well known, as well as how he laboured for their moral and intellectual advancement; what he did for manners is unrecorded, and for this reason, that his own was so little polished. While, therefore, he was zealously employed in instilling the useful arts by precept and example, he neglected, as perhaps he little knew, the charms of cultivated society. To how and shape Limbo, to fashion him, to cast metal, to quarry stone, and perform all the laborious duties of infant civilization, were deemed by him the most praiseworthy accomplishments of the Russian nobleman; and it is therefore little to be wondered at, if the Graces under his auspices failed to hold their court amid the frozen marshes of the Neva. The intercourse that was kept up between Russia and the other states of Europe had produced little effect at St. Petersburg, and none at Moscow; and when the Muscovite ambassadors appeared at Versailles, they were looked upon as scarcely less barbarous than a deputation from Otahie would appear at the present day.

But what the Czar Peter could not effect was reserved for the Empress Catherine Alexiowna, who, in regard to the softening influences of the sex, proved the truth of Lord Derby's axiom, that "women are so much civiler than men." How she accomplished her object, (if, indeed, our fair readers will admit that she did accomplish it) we purpose to show.

Two principal external signs of polished society is the prevailing character of dress, and to this point the empress first directed her attention. But ignorant of the classical and picturesque costumes of the south of Europe, and probably conversant only with those of England and Holland, where the Czar Peter acquired his accomplishments, she drew from thence all the improvements (such they could be called) which she inflicted on her court, and introduced the use of taffeta, damask, brocade, lofty head-dresses, narrow waists, and high-heeled shoes, in lieu of the rich sable cap, the fur cloak, while she gently, but earnestly, exerted the influence which her virtues and talents had acquired for her in her own family, in endeav-

It was, however, to little purpose to change the externals of society, if a corresponding alteration were not to take place in the manners which direct mankind from within; and, holding in high estimation the usages of Great Britain, she resolved upon the introduction of mixed assemblies, where, for the first time, men and women should mingle in society upon equal terms, and lead the amenities of life by a public observance of its forms. With this view she published the following imperial ukase, which we think will amuse our fair readers, even if it fail to convey an idea of the youth of —that new and polished nation.

Whose names want nothing but pronunciation, and who figure now the first in the glosse and mazourka—whose tongues speak all languages, and who have become the cynosure of grace, of diplomacy, and of courtesy.

UKASE RELATIVE TO ASSEMBLIES

"It is decreed, etc.
"The person at whose house an assembly is held shall signify the same by hanging out a bill, by way of advertisement, to both sexes."

There was no Journal de St. Petersburg in those days, and the mystery of cards of invitation was of course unknown.

"2. The assembly shall not open before four or five o'clock in the afternoon, nor continue later than ten at night."
A reversed regard was here paid to the early habits of the uncivilized in all countries, though ten o'clock at night was rather bold for a first move; however, it was qualified in a subsequent article.

"3. The master of the house shall not be obliged to meet his guests, or conduct them to his company, but must find them candles, chairs, liquors, and cards, dice, or other requisites for gaming."
This was not exacting much by way of sacrifice to the Graces, but entailed rather a serious expense on the giver of such an entertainment, when the Russian propensity for candles is considered, and that tendency towards strong liquors, when the example was set by the czar himself, and of which the evidence appears more in detail hereafter. The allusion to the materials for gaming is characteristic of that habit, which prevails as strongly in savage as in civilized life, and will do for either.

"4. There shall be no fixed hour for coming or going away, it is enough for a person to appear in the assembly."

That is to say, the first lessons in politeness shall not last too long, lest they tire the well-willing student.

"5. Every one shall be free to sit, walk, or game, as he pleases, and none shall hinder him, on pain of emptying the great eagle (a gout bowl full of brandy) it shall likewise be sufficient on entering or retiring, to salute the company."

This must have been an admirable means of ensuring propriety of behaviour, when we consider the great disinclination of the Russians to brandy, and the soothing nature of a pint of the raw material upon any offender. How the delinquents managed to salute the company afterward, is a matter for much conjecture.

"6. Persons of distinction, noblemen, superiour officers, merchants and tradesmen of note, head-workmen, especially carpenters (here the ceremony of the duck-ward is gratefully considered), and persons employed in the chancery, (chancelleries) are to have liberty to enter the assemblies, as likewise their wives and children."

This was a widely-extended privilege, and seems to have included all except the actual serfs. It would almost do for New-York or Philadelphia.

"7. Particular places shall be assigned the footmen (except those of the house) that there may be room enough in the apartment designed for the assembly."

A wise regulation, and one which it would be well to consider, in all its bearings, even now, and in this country. The next is a glorious article.

"8. No ladies to get drunk, upon any pretence whatever, nor shall gentlemen be drunk before nine."

This must have been a bold innovation indeed, and speaks volumes in favour of the general sobriety of Russia; while it sternly prohibits one sex, how tenderly considerate it is for the wants of the other. The penalty of breaking this rule is not mentioned, perhaps it consisted in being compelled to drink brandy again!

"9. Ladies who play at forfeits, questions, and commands, shall not be virtuous; no gentlemen shall attempt to force a kiss, and no person shall attempt to strike a woman in the assembly, under pain of future exclusion."

This being interpreted, may mean to give the gentlemen carte blanche for pommeling each other, or for indulging in any domestic severity they please at home, where virtuous ladies were subjected to legitimate control. It was a delicate thought to decree that the marks of favour which ladies bestow in public (!) should not be enforced, and the bearded décorés observed it, no doubt, implicitly.

Such were the Empress Catherine's famous Code Civile, in which there appears to us to be only one omission. No mention is made of the knout to stimulate the polite trepidation.

COLLECTIONS AND RECOLLECTIONS.

STATALIC GROTTO.—A discovery has recently been made in the department of L'Ardèche, two leagues from the Pont St. Esprit, of some immense natural grottoes, seven in number. The first has the appearance of a magnificent cascade, and after a walk of a quarter of an hour a rock is arrived at, which being mounted leads to a second, and then on to the seventh. It is in this last that nature appears to have collected together all that can be imagined of the most curious and interesting kind. On all sides are seen the most beautiful stalactites and petrifications, producing the most singular effects, and presenting the most astonishing pieces of natural sculpture. At some parts of the grotto the vaulted roof is so high as to be out of sight, and in others within the reach of the hand. Some of the magnificent columns of stalactites which support are so large that six men could not encircle them. The echoes produced are equally astonishing, and if one of the columns be struck with a cane the vibration is so great that the immense pile of rocks seems to be falling to ruin. A thorough examination of the grottoes cannot be made under seven hours. The first persons who entered the grotto discovered a skeleton, which is supposed to have been there about fifty years, judging from its appearance.—French Paper.

ADIEU.—In using this expression, which habit has rendered trivial, few persons recollect its real origin and meaning, and that in pronouncing it they recommend their friend à Dieu—to the protection of God.

AUTHOR OF "THE SEASONS."—Thomson was one of the most genial, unaffected, and lovable of all the genus irritable. Not one speck of gall or envy seems to have mingled in his composition. We fancy we see him, with his hands in his breeches pockets, eating peaches, from the sunny side, in Bobb Doddington's garden—loitering in his bed till past noon, because he had "no motive" to rise early—or sauntering about his garden-walks at Richmond, muttering his wayward fancies, and moulding them into immortal verse. Yet, withal, he was an accurate and enthusiastic observer of nature. He must have studied deeply in his early days, and during his fits of abstinence and seclusion; for latterly he was too social and companionable a man to burn the "midnight taper" over his books in the acquisition of knowledge. Genius, however, is a wonderful instructor, and can perform greater miracles than ever were achieved by Arabian dervise or magician. Thomson was utterly free from that amor ætæternus habendi, which Ovid classes among the sins of his iron age. It is related, as showing how heedless he was in his money concerns, that in paying a bill to his brewer, he gave him two bank-notes rolled together instead of one. When the mistake was pointed out to him, "Never mind," said the easy, good-humoured poet, "I have enough to go on without it!" A better anecdote is told of his having been robbed of his watch between London and Richmond, "Pshaw, d—n it," said he, "I'm glad they took it from me, 'twas never good for anything."

PERSEVERENCE OF ZEALONY.—A wife.—One thing every husband can do in prevention, and that is to give no ground for it. And here it is not sufficient that he strictly adhere to his marriage vow; he ought further to abstain from every act, however free from guilt, calculated to awaken the slightest degree of suspicion in a mind, the peace of which he is bound by every tie of justice and humanity not to disturb, or if he can avoid it, to suffer it to be disturbed by others. A woman that is very fond of her husband, and this is the case with nine-tenths of English and American women, does not like to share with another any, even the smallest portion, not only of his affection, but of his assiduities and applause; and as the bestowing of them on another, and receiving payment in kind, can serve no purpose other than that of gratifying one's vanity, they ought to be abstained from, and especially if the gratification should be purchased with even the chance of exciting uneasiness in her, whom it is your sacred duty to make as happy as you can.

PRINTING IN CHINA.—Printing began in China, by means of stone plates, about the year 830, and, though no accurate account of the process has been given, we hear that the plate was blackened, and the characters being sunk in the stone in low relief, the paper became black and the letters white, which is still the case with a much improved method of lithographic printing that the Chinese have long adopted. Stone plates were soon superseded by wooden ones, the letters and figures being worked in high relief, by cutting and filing down the wood all round them. The characters, therefore, as with us, are black when printed, while the paper continues white. Movable types, made of burnt earth, were tried at least seven centuries ago, but terminated in a return to the old method. The Chinese paper is so fragile and transparent as to be printed only on a single side.

THE EARLIEST ARCHITECTURE OF ROME.—The city of Rome, like the inhabitants, was at first rude and unadorned; the houses, agreeably to the name given them, (truces), were only a covering and defence against bad weather. They were not formed into regular streets, but flung together as chance directed; the walls were half mud, and the roofs pieces of boards. Anything finer than ordinary was used in decking the temples; and when those began to be furnished with the statues of the gods, (which was not till long after Numæ's time,) they were either of earthware or wood. The chief ornament, both of the temples and the houses, was their ancient trophies, which were trunks of trees loaded with the arms taken in war.

TAGLIANI.—The Emperor Nicholas, however hardened he may be to the dictates of common humanity, is sensible enough to the charms of Tagliani's dancing. Recently his majesty was plesed to send a baguette from the hands of the dancer, and presented it her in return with one composed of precious stones—a very pleasing exchange, under the circumstances, doubtless, to the former. Nor is the enthusiasm she excites confined to the emperor; for we read that the empress also, "in a fit of enthusiasm, detached her rich bracelets from her wrists, and threw them at her feet." Such are the honours paid to "la déesse de la danse."

CHAIN OF RELIGES.—Bismuth and sulphur form the link between earth and metals—vitriols unite metals with salts—crystallizations connect salts with stones—the amianthus and lophophytes form a kind of tie between stones and plants—the polyopus unites plants to insects—the tube-worms seems to lead to shells and reptiles—the water serpent and the eel form a passage from reptiles to fish—the anigra are a medium between fishes and birds—the bat and the flying-squirrel link birds to quadrupeds—and the monkey equally gives the hand to quadruped and to man.

DR. SAVAGE.—This learned divine, who died in 1747, travelled in his younger days with the earl of Salisbury, to whom he was indebted for a considerable living in Herefordshire. One day at the levee, the king (George L.) asked him how long he had resided at Bournemouth with Lord Salisbury. Upon the king's asking how long, "Why," said the king, "you said there long enough; how is it you did not convert the pope?" "Because, sir," replied the doctor, "I had nothing better to offer him."

MORS.—The duke of Wellington recently appointed his brother, Lord Maryborough, to the vacant civic post office of governor of Deal Castle, for which it was mentioned, Sir H. Hardinge had applied. "Well, (said one), I thought Hardinge knew better how to play his cards than to mis-Deal." "I can tell you that it may be, (observed H—), but I know this, the duke won't revoke."

A HINT.—A king of Prussia sent to a tribe of Bedonkoine the Caliph Mustapha, a very celebrated physician, who inquired on his arrival how they lived. "We never eat till we are hungry, and then not to repletion," was the answer. "I may return, then," said the doctor, "I have no business here."

CONTRAST LOVE.—Sierra, who used his wife very ill, was one day talking to General in a fine sentimental manner, in praise of conjugal love and fidelity. "The husband," said Sierra, "who behaves unkindly to his wife, deserves to have his house burned over his head."

"If you think so," said Garriek, "I hope your house is insured." BEAUTY.—Salezco de Pedraña praising an old lady for her beauty, she answered, that beauty was incompatible with her age. To which Salezco replied, "We say, as beautiful as an angel; and yet the angels are, of all creatures, the most ancient."

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

WHAT IS LIFE?

Original.

SAY, what is life!—a feeble flower,
Declining as it blooms;
Which bears at heart the withering power.
The center that consumes!—
A wintry cloud, an April beam,
A stage for empty strife,
A waking thought, a troubled dream—
Ah, such is life!

A web of checker'd hopes and fears,
A bubble on the wave—
A shade, composed of smiles and tears,
A pilgrim to the grave!
A bark upon the waters tost,
(The sport of storm and strife,)—
Her rudder gone, her anchor lost—
Ah, such is life!

And what is death!—a dreaded doom
To pleasure's silent slave;
Who roars to sleep amid the gloom
That wraps the silent grave.
To quit this scene of earthly joys,
Oh! who would yield his breath?
Resign ambition's gilded toys,
To welcome death!

The soul that feels affliction's pang,
To life's dark ills a prey,
Soars to the source from whence it sprang,
And spurns the cumbrous clay.
No more may terrors shake my breast,
Or waste my feeble breath;
Death robs the cradle of our rest,
Then welcome death!

L. L. T.

TOPICS FOR THOUGHT.

Sir John Gage, constable of the Tower, when he led Lady Jane Grey to execution, desired her to bestow on him some small present, which he might keep as a perpetual memorial of her. She gave him her table-book, wherein she had just written three sentences, on seeing her husband's body; one in Greek, another in Latin, and a third in English. The purport of them, was, that human justice was against his body, but the divine mercy would be favourable to his soul; and that, if her fault deserved punishment, her youth at least, and her imprudence, were worthy of excuse, and that God and posterity, she trusted, would show her favour.—Nares.

The first Greek musicians were gods; the second heroes; the third bards; the fourth beggars.—Dr. Barrow.

A distressed mother in England, reduced from a fall to a scanty diet, and bewailing the loss of her son, receives no consolation from being told of a woman in France, whose son fell in the same battle, and that the taxes are equally increased in both countries by the same war. "But kings, and ministers, and generals, and historians proclaim, as a glorious contest, every war which appears to have been as fatal to the enemy as to their own party; though half of each nation is slaughtered in the field, and the other half reduced to slavery. This is one of the bare-faced impositions with which mankind are perpetually insulted, and which calls upon us, in the name of humanity, to pursue this inquiry into the causes of war.—Barrow's Advice to the Privileged Orders.

Instead of shutting himself up in an island, and abusing all the rest of mankind, the philosopher should make the world his country, and should trample beneath his feet those prejudices which the vulgar so fondly lug to their bosoms.—W. Lawrence.

The Cashmerees, the men, are noted all over India for their address, treachery, decent, cunning, lying, and every other malpractice; they are very litigious and quarrelsome, but seldom proceeds to blows with them; they are very mischievous, spreading hundreds of false reports every day; are in general great cowards, and have no dependence on each other. There is a bridge in the middle of the city, called Zannah-kaddie, on which is a small beazar; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their famous lounge, and the focus for all the reports and news that are daily spread. They have no public schools or colleges; there may be about one hundred musjeds, mostly made of wood; some of them are of brick and mortar walls. The Seekhs have prohibited their assembling to pray in them, lest they should cause a disturbance and rebellion. The whole of the present revenues of Cashmere, as collected by the Seekhs, is now thirty-six lacs of rupes per annum, of which the land-rent, grain, and saffron, give only twelve lacs; and twenty-four lacs are collected from the duties on shawls and merchandize: this is equal to about twenty-seven lacs of Indian money. The soil is very rich and fertile, and not one eighteenth part of the arable land is brought into cultivation; this is their

WESTWARD, HO!

Arranged to a popular western melody, by Charles E. Horn, and dedicated to George D. Prentice, Esq.

THE WORDS BY GEORGE P. MORRIS.

I.
 Droop not, brothers!
 As we go
 O'er the mountains,
 Westward, ho!
 Under boughs of mistletoe,
 Log-huts we'll rear,
 While herds of deer and buffalo
 Furnish the cheer!
 File o'er the mountains—steady, boys!
 For game afar
 We have our rifles ready, boys!
 Aha!
 Throw care to the winds,
 Like chaff, boys!—ha!
 And join in the laugh, boys!
 Hah—hah—hah!

II.
 Cheer up, brothers!
 As we go,
 O'er the mountains,
 Westward, ho!
 When we've wood and prairie-land,
 Won by our toil,
 We'll reign like kings in fairy-land,
 Lords of the soil!
 Then westward, ho! in legions, boys!
 Fair freedom's star
 Points to her sunset regions, boys!
 Aha!
 Throw care to the winds,
 Like chaff, boys!—ha!
 And join in the laugh, boys!
 Hah—hah—hah!

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE LIFE OF AN ARTIST IN ROME.

From "The Romance of Hyperion."

BY PROFESSOR LONGFELLOW.

I OFTEN reflect with delight upon the young artist's life in Rome. A stranger from the cold and stormy north, he has crossed the Alps, and, with the devotion of a pilgrim, journeyed to the eternal city. He dwells, perhaps, upon the Pincian Hill; and hardly a house is there which is not inhabited by artists, from all lands. The very room he lives in has been their abode from time out of mind. Their names are written all over the walls; perhaps some farther record of it is left in a rough sketch upon the window-shutter, with an inscription and a date. These things consecrate the place in his imagination. The names, even though unknown to him, are not without associations in his mind.

In that warm latitude he rises with the day. The night-vapours are already rolling away over the Campagna sea-ward. As he looks from his window, above and beyond their white folds, he recognizes the tremulous blue sea at Ostia. Over Soracte rises the sun, above his own beloved mountain, though no longer worshipped there as of old. Before him the antique house, where Raphael lived, casts its long, brown shadow down into the heart of modern Rome. The city lies still asleep and silent. But, above its dark roofs, more than two hundred steeples catch the sunshine on their gilded weather-cocks. Presently the bells begin to ring, and, as the artist listens to their pleasant chime, he knows that in each of those churches, over the high altar, hangs a painting by some master's hand, whose beauty comes between him and heaven, so that he cannot pray, but wonder only.

Among these works of art, he passes the day; but oftener in St. Peter's and the Vatican. Up the vast marble staircase, through the Corridor Chiamamenti, through vestibules, galleries, chambers, he passes as in a dream. All are filled with busts and statues, or painted in daring frescoes. What forms of strength and beauty! What glorious creations of the human mind! And in that last chamber of all, standing alone upon his pedestal, the Apollo found at Antium, in such a majestic attitude! with such a noble countenance! life-like, god-like!

Or perhaps he passes into the chambers of the painters, but goes no farther than the second; for, in the middle of that chamber, a large painting stands upon the heavy easel, as if unfinished, though more than three hundred years ago the great artist completed it, and then laid his pencil away for ever, leaving this last benediction to the world. It is the transfiguration of Christ, by Raphael. A child looks not at the stars with greater wonder, than the artist at this painting. He knows how many studious years are in it. He knows the difficult path that leads to perfection, having himself taken some of the first steps. Thus he recalls the hour, when that broad canvass was first stretched upon its frame, and Raphael stood before it, and laid the first colours upon it, and beheld the figures, one by one, born into life, and "looked upon the work of his own hands with a smile, that it should have succeeded so well." He recalls, too, the hour, when the task was accomplished, the pencil dropped from the master's dying hand, and his eyes closed to open upon a more glorious transfiguration; and at length the dead Raphael lay in his own studio, before this wonderful painting, greater than any conqueror under the banners and hatchments of his funeral!

Think you, that such sights and thoughts as these do not move the heart of a young man and an artist! And when he goes forth into the open air, the sun is going down, and the gray ruins of an antique world receive him. From the palace of the Cæsars he looks down into the Forum, or towards the Colosseum; or westward, and sees the last sunshine strike the bronze archangel, which stands upon the tomb of Adrian. He walks amid a world of art in ruins. The very street-lamps, that light him homeward, burn before some painted or sculptured image of the Madonna. What wonder is it if dreams visit him in his sleep—nay, if his whole life be to him a dream! What wonder, if, with a feverish heart and quick hand, he strive to reproduce these dreams in marble or on canvass?

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

MAELZEL'S AUTOMATON CHESS-PLAYER.

Translated from an article by Depping, in a late French journal.

IN our notice of the celebrated mechanist of Ratisbonne, (Maelzel,) we alluded to the chess-automaton of Baron Kempelin, which Maelzel repaired, and exhibited to the public of Europe and America for twenty years, the secret of which was not detected, neither at its first nor second appearance in Paris, although separated by an interval of thirty-two years; nor were the public more fortunate in London, in 1819, when the automaton was narrowly observed by many clever mechanists. At last the mystery was discovered in Paris, and published in a monthly journal devoted to the game of chess, by M. de Tournay. Two of the confederates of Maelzel reside in Paris. Their names are well known to the members of the chess-club; and since the death of Maelzel, having no interest or obligation to remain silent, they no longer hesitate to reveal their co-operation. The mystery may, therefore, now be considered as known; and the problem of the machinery of the automaton chess-player completely solved.

Every one must remember that his first impression, upon seeing the chess automaton, was the concealment of a human being within the box, who directed the arms of the automaton. Baron Kempelin, and after him Maelzel, always opened it on both sides, previous to the exhibition, that the spectators might convince themselves it contained nothing but wheels, tubes and springs, and which it was quite impossible that a human being could be concealed from their observation. Thus the ingenious inventor succeeded in imposing upon the credulity of the public.

The wheels, etc., were partly painted upon a thin partition, which could be easily displaced, and thereby conceal the person within the box, who, of course, entered it before it was rolled into the exhibition-room. The doors being successively opened, the spectators were permitted to see only half the interior at a time, which enabled the person concealed to pass from one side of the partition to the other, and in cases of necessity even to take refuge within the body of the automaton. So far, it was a mystification unworthy of figuring in the history of the mechanical arts. But let us see what afterward happened. First, it was indispensable to find a man who was able to shift his position within the machine and direct the moves of the automaton, who should be capable of playing the game with sufficient skill to overcome any antagonist who might present himself, and whose moves he could not see. Hence it became necessary that the state of his adversary's game should be made known to him, and therein consisted the merit of Kempelin's wonderful invention. The invisible person was seated upon a small stool, lighted by a candle, which the exhibitor took care to place within the machine at the commencement, in order, as he said, to convince the public that nobody could be concealed within undetected.

An opening was contrived in the box to supply the invisible person with air. The chess-board used was of that kind called Echiquiers de Voyage, invented to play in carriages and at sea; they differ in no respect from those in ordinary use, except each piece being pointed with an iron pin, to fix it firmly upon the square. This precaution was necessary, lest by any accident the game of the invisible player might be disarranged.

The board upon which the automaton played, was placed upon the box, visible to the audience, immediately over the head of the hidden player; it was extremely thin, and had its counterpart exactly represented upon the reverse, or ceiling of the box within. Each square was provided with a small iron lever, which balanced or turned upon a pivot, and the pins of the pieces used by the automaton being strongly magnetized, attracted the levers of the squares upon which they were placed, causing them to fall back when the pieces were moved, thus indicating to the invisible player the exact state of the game, which, as he could not see above, he was compelled to follow with the most painful attention.

Hence he was obliged to remember each piece moved upon the squares above.

The squares of a miniature board were numbered corresponding with the numbers of the squares of the board over his head, that he might not be exposed to mistake the moves. On his left side he had a movable iron handle, connected with springs, in the left arm of the automaton, which the player directed at will. By this contrivance the automaton was enabled to seize a piece with his left hand and remove it from one square to another. The invisible player saw above, upon the reverse chess-board, whether he directed correctly the arm of the automaton. From the beginning, every one wondered that the automaton moved his left arm instead of his right; this, it was answered, was an error of the inventor, discovered too late to rectify. But errors of this sort are rarely committed, and it is now well known that the inventor placed the machinery upon the left side of the hidden player designedly, that his right arm and hand might be at liberty to direct his play more readily upon his own board. His antagonist was always obliged to place the pieces upon the centre of the squares; without this precaution the magnetized pieces would not have been perpendicular to the iron levers upon which they were to act, and thereby reveal to the invisible player the moves of his antagonist.* There is, however, one circumstance sufficient to explain, viz.: how the hidden player could direct the arm of the automaton with sufficient precision to enable its wooden fingers to seize the diminutive pieces placed upon the board. All mistakes in moving from one square to another might be avoided, although even that must have been very difficult; but how were the fingers of the automaton made to open and close exactly upon the piece to be moved? To effect this, an admirable precision of mechanism was indispensable, combined with the nicest practice of the invisible director, in order that the operation might be perfectly performed. Even admitting these two conditions to have been skillfully fulfilled, it is yet difficult to comprehend them.

The invisible person was then the soul of the machine, and it became indispensable for the exhibitor of the automaton to have, at his disposal, a person, who would consent to be confined within a narrow box for several hours in a painful position, and to remain there nearly motionless; but, above all, not to betray his presence whatever might happen. Besides being capable of directing the machine perfectly—in an affair, as we know, of the utmost delicacy—he must be able to play a first-rate game, to encounter the play of any antagonist who might choose to contest his skill.

Baron Kempelin was fortunate enough to find a person who ably fulfilled these conditions. While he exhibited the automaton, it was nearly always victorious, which still further increased the astonishment—we may almost say the stupefaction of the public. Nevertheless he was vanquished in Paris, by Philidor and by Lezat; but sufficient glory remained, even after a defeat by such consummate masters of the game. When Maelzel got possession of the automaton, he took the greatest pains to find out an able assistant. He was not acquainted with the name of the person who accompanied him to Germany; but at Paris he engaged M. Boucou, who is even now regarded as one of the best players belonging to the Panorama Club. It is, however, almost impossible to believe that a man of his large dimensions could, by any manner of means, ensconce himself within a box of four feet in length, three in height, and two in width, and yet be able to play a skilful game of chess. Afterward he was superseded by an Israelite, of small size, (Alexandre,) who still resides in Paris, and is the author of an excellent work, "L'Encyclopédie des Echecs." The Palamède mentions a third person, M. Mouret, (with but one leg,) a man of wit and humour, who consented to accompany Maelzel in his peregrinations, and who became his co-partner in the profits of the concern. In England he engaged the services of a Mr. Lewis. But the person who performed the part of the invisible player for the longest period, was an Alsatian, of the name of Schlumberger, alias Mulhosen, after his native town.

He went with Maelzel to the United States; remained fifteen years with him, and died there, three months before his celebrated friend and patron. He possessed, in an eminent degree, all the qualifications necessary to his employment. He was the pupil of one of the first professors of the art, du Café de la Régence, and played a strong game. His tenacity and suppleness enabled him to ensconce himself readily within the partition of the machine, and to pass, with the utmost ease, from one part of it to another, whenever it was the pleasure of a curious spectator to examine the interior. Shut up within so narrow a space, it was very difficult, as well as painful, to avoid, by the slightest noise, the pressure of a living being. The profound stillness and attention of the audience while the game was playing, would have rendered the slightest sound audible, and, doubtless, it was to divert the attention of spectators, that the inventor introduced clock-work, which was always wound up at the commencement of the exhibition and put in motion at each move, in order to mask the deception.

We have been told, that upon one occasion the invisible player in a moment of forgetfulness, or from intense reflection upon the game, was guilty of the indiscretion of sneezing—the sound of it was distinctly audible from amid the machinery, and rudely interrupted the profound silence of the assembly. It was certainly the most critical moment in the whole life of Maelzel, who, with admirable presence of mind, exclaimed, "Good heaven, a spring is broken! Ladies and gentlemen, permit me to suspend the exhibition for only a quarter of an hour, to repair the machinery!"—when, immediately, he rolled the box behind the curtain, and did not spare his reproaches to his unhappy confederate.

At another time, a person who suspected the secret, and who wished to expose Maelzel, cried fire, fire, with might and main, during the exhibition. Amid the confusion of the audience, Maelzel had the self-possession to withdraw his machine. It was, indeed, high time, for the invisible gentleman was upon the point of popping out of his hiding-place, in the presence of the company, overcome with fright and amazement.

The necessity of having a confederate to assist him in his exhibitions, subjected Maelzel to a most unhappy state of dependence, more especially when there were arrangements to settle; a predicament which often happened, as poor Maelzel was by no means so good an economist as he was a machinist, and never had the reputation of being the most punctual of paymasters.

* Maelzel's exhibitions in the United States differed from those described above. He always gave a duplicate board to the antagonist, and removed the pieces correspondingly upon the board of the automaton.

The Palmeade gives a ludicrous anecdote touching this point. Maelzel, being at Amsterdam, was engaged to exhibit his automaton in the presence of the court of the king of the Netherlands. Half an hour previously to the exhibition, he discovered that his confederate was absent without leave; he ran to his hiding-place, and found M... who then assisted him, undressed. "What does this mean—what has happened?" exclaimed he, in amazement. "I have a fever," replied M... "The deuce you have! why you were in good health but a moment ago." "Very true, sir, but the attack was as sudden as a flash of lightning." "Ay, but the king will soon arrive, and what will he say?" "Say! why, that the automaton has a fever." "A truce with your jests. I have no desire to laugh, for the receipts will be large, and must be returned. Let me entreat you to get up!" "Impossible!" "I will call in a physician." "Quite useless." "Is there, then, no means of putting this vile fever to flight?" "Certainly, but one, only." "Well, what is it?" "It is to pay me down the fifteen hundred francs which you owe me." "But that cannot be done to-night." "Yes, yes, it must be done forthwith." Poor Maelzel was obliged to yield to the confederate, and to count him out the money—after which the automaton played his game of chess admirably well.

The secret now being generally known, the machine of Kempelin (repaired by Maelzel) has lost its attraction; still it must always be regarded as a very ingenious invention. Previously to its appearance, no one would have believed it possible for a person to play a game of chess, shut up within a box, without being able to see the pieces on the board upon which the game was played.

It is said that Kempelin had been piqued into the invention of his machine, by a challenge of the empress of Austria, whom he had attended in his quality of chamberlain, to witness magnetic experiments. He promised to show her an experiment much more astonishing, and within six months produced his automaton, the real secret of which, in reality, depends upon the power of the magnet.

We did not, in our first article, enumerate all the curious productions of Maelzel's genius. We ought not to have forgotten his mechanical legs, rendered so unfortunately necessary, after the murderous battle of Austerlitz. Legs, which a German writer, in an article dictated by enthusiasm, pronounced to be no less comical than those furnished by dame nature herself.

E. N. D.

SKETCHES AT HOME AND ABROAD.

OLD ENGLISH WRITERS.

BY WILLIAM COX.

CUPID'S CURSE.

The following beautiful ditty is from an old dramatic pastoral written by George Peal, about the year 1684, entitled, "The Arraignment of Paris;" which pastoral, had it been in all parts equal, would, in the opinion of one of the most profound, accomplished, and good-hearted critics England has produced, (Charles Lamb,) have left the famous "Faithful Shepherdess," of Fletcher, only a secondary place in this species of literature. A copy of this song was sent, by Lamb, to a favourite composer of the day, with a hint that it only wanted "fit musical numbers to be the rarest dialogue in the language." I do not think the hint was ever taken; or, if so, the task was executed in such a manner, as altogether failed to withdraw this graceful little poem from the obscurity into which it had undeservedly fallen. The honour of doing it justice, therefore, still lies open for the achievement of any gentleman skilled in the concord of sweet sounds;" and should Horn or Bishop chance to cast their eyes upon it, perhaps the "Mirror" may yet have the good fortune to be the medium of presenting this gem, set in appropriate brilliants, (crotchets and quavers,) to the world.

The scene of the pastoral is laid in Mount Ida, and in the vicinity, where Paris, there in obscurity and concealment, is dallying away the hours with his then beloved Eonone. By way of passing the time, he invites her to sing; she declines; but, on being pressed, complies in the following fashion:

Eonone. There is a pretty sonnet, then, we call it "Cupid's Curse," "They that do change old love for new, pray gods they change for worse!"

Paris agrees to bear a portion of the burden of the song which the luckless Eonone has selected with somewhat of a prophetic spirit, and straightway the woods of Ida are filled with Cupid's Curse.

SONNET.

Fair and fair, and twice so fair,
And fair as any may be,
The fairest shepherd on our green,
A love for any lady.

PARIS.

Fair and fair, and twice so fair,
And fair as any may be,
Thy love is fair for these alone,
And for no other lady.

EONONE.

My love is fair, my love is gay,
And fresh as bin the flowers in May,
And of my love my roundelay,
My merry, merry, merry roundelay—
Concludes with Cupid's curse—
"They that do change old love for new,
Pray gods they change for worse!"

Both. { Fair and fair, etc. } repeated.

SONNET.

My love can pipe, my love can sing,
My love can make a pretty thing,
And of his lovely praises sing,
My merry, merry, merry roundelays;
Amen, to Cupid's curse—
"They that do change old love for new,
Pray gods they change for worse!"

Both. { Fair and fair, etc. } repeated.

There is a natural freshness, and light and airy tenderness about this, dashed with a shade of deeper feeling, that is especially delightful, and there cannot be a shadow of doubt about the propriety of the malediction. What say you, ladies! Is there not more heart, spirit, and sincerity in it, than in the maudlin stuff so abundant in novels and so scarce in real life; in which, the deserted fair one prays her faithless swain "to forget her," hopes he may be happy with some other "object of his affections," and so on! Angels are scarce, and no true woman forgets, or likes to be forgotten; and though she may be of so high, pure, and tender a nature as thoroughly to forgive, and altogether eschew active malice, or the wishing of evil, yet, should the woman for whom she has been forsaken chance to pay her false lover in his own coin, and elope with another, her feelings might, possibly, be of that mixed character which the believers in the perfectibility of humanity would do well not to scrutinize too closely, or they might, peradventure, damage their theory. There is little doubt but that ninety and nine out of every hundred of the fair creatures, from the blossom at the boarding-school to the full-blown beauty of the ball-room, will with hearty emphasis say "Amen!" to Cupid's curse:

"They that do change old love for new, pray gods they change for worse!"

EPITHETS.

There is some profitable advice to be gleaned from the following extract from an old play, written upwards of a couple of centuries ago, by Shirley, entitled, "The Changes." Young versifiers and incipient poets would do well to scan it over. The adjective is too useful and convenient a part of speech to be roughly reprobated. Poets would have to labour hard to make smooth work without it; and a judicious sprinkling of such "flowers" and ornaments of the language, is often productive of the happiest effects; but then, on the other hand, when used to excess, they are certainly enfeeble and render mawkish the verses they are meant to strengthen and enrich. A too copious infusion of them, smothers a sentiment or obscures a description, pretty much in the same way that an undue portion of sugar in your coffee overpowers and utterly annihilates the original flavour or aroma of the berry; therefore, like all other sweet matters, adjectives are to be sparingly used. You may get too much honey.

Here is the passage, with the arguments for and against:

Capewit.—Adjectives! would you have a poet without Adjectives! They're the flower, the grace of our language. A well chosen epithet does give new soul To fainting poses, and makes every verse A bride! With adjectives we bait our lines, When we do fish for gentlemen's loves; And with their sweetness catch the nibbling ear Of amorous ladies. * * * * *

I will maintain 't against A bundle of grammarians, in poetry The substantive, itself, cannot subsist Without its adjective.

Friend.—For all that, Those words would sound more full, methinks, that are not So larded; and if I might counsel you, You should compose a sonnet clean without 'em.

* * * * * When the sense First framed, is tied with adjectives, like points, And cannot hold together without wedges, Hang 't, 'tis pedantic, vulgar poetry! Let children, when they versify, stick here And there these puny words, for want of matter, Ports write MARCULINE NUMBERS!

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

PARISIAN THEATRICALS.

Victor Hugo's new tragedy—new star in the French theatrical firmament.

VICTOR HUGO'S new tragedy of Ruy-Blas has been produced at the theatre of the Renaissance with partial success. The plot is a strange one, and, though improbable, possesses considerable interest. VICTOR HUGO does not pretend that it is an original one; it suited his purpose, and he made use of it: like Molière, he takes his goods wherever he can find them. In order to fully explain the story of the new piece, I think it better to go back a little, and remind you that Diderot, in his Jacques le Fataliste, has given us the account of a most frightful vengeance, imagined and carried into execution by a woman. Abandoned by her lover, and smarting under the insult, she seeks out a wretched creature from the streets, the slave of a woman of rank. She gives her a noble house, servants, carriages, good name, and wealth. Lures are thrown out to attract the deceiver: he comes, pays court to the golden idol, and at last proposes for her hand, and is accepted. The morning after the marriage, the horrid truth is revealed to the unfortunate husband, and a woman's vengeance is complete. From this striking story, M. Auccol constructed a vaudeville, which he called Léontine, and a highly interesting production it was. VICTOR HUGO has now turned the incidents to account, merely changing the sex of the deceived and deceiving party, and making a servant the instrument of vengeance. The queen of Spain, wife of Charles II., has humiliated Don Salluste, a Spanish nobleman, and banished him from court. He seeks revenge: he finds a being vile and degraded: he gives him a name, rank and opulence. He manages to have him introduced at court, and gives him orders to spread every lure to captivate the queen. The plot succeeds: she hates her husband, and becomes enamoured of the stranger: her love prompts her even to comply with an invitation to her lover's house, written, however, by Don Salluste: she is discovered there by her enemy, and informed that her lover is his creature; that her character is gone, and that by the laws of Spain the punishment for her weakness is death. The instrument of this vengeance, however, really loves her: he turns on his employer, reproaches him with his baseness, and then stabs him to the heart. He afterwards poisons himself, and the piece ends.

Such is the tragedy of decidedly the most powerful living dramatic writer of France. He has badly chosen the story; for what we can believe possible with the female heart, we see could never take place with man. Diderot seems quite aware of the difficulty which exists even in rendering the story credible for woman, as he dwells at length on every charge, and prepares the readers, as much as possible, for the succeeding step. Then, in the play, the sudden advancement of Ruy-Blas is improbable; as is his obeying his master, after becoming a man of greater power. The writing of the piece in many parts is stilted and careless. The second act and the fourth are tiresome, and lead to nothing, but other parts are of great beauty and force. The dénouement is of wonderful power. The audience were absolutely struck with wonder, and the piece concluded amid the loudest applause. The lacquey was well performed by Frederick Lemaître, whom you have seen in London as Robert Macaire; the other parts were filled by actors whose names are not very familiar to the English ear.

The great event of the week has been the visit of the king to the Théâtre Français, to witness Corneille's noble tragedy of Cinna. The audience was most brilliant, and the house was crowded, although the intention of the royal visit was known but to few. The royal party arrived at seven o'clock: it consisted of the King and Queen of the French, the King and Queen of the Belgians, Madame Adelaide, the Princess Clementine, the Duc de Nemours, and six others. The king was warmly received, though not enthusiastically. Old age has laid a heavy hand on him lately: he looked broken and infirm: he was in good spirits, however, and awarded his approbation lavishly enough during the evening. Sigier, Beauvallet and Mdle. Rachel played with great ability. Sigier is, without dispute, the greatest actor in France: he is low in stature, and slight in person, something resembling the elder Kean; he was Talma's favourite pupil, and frequently reminds one of that great actor in parts of his performance; at other times he bursts forth like the great Kean, and carries the whole house with him. He played the part of Augustus on the night of the king's visit. Beauvallet was the Cinna of the night: he was deservedly applauded in the third act, when, after struggling between honour and love, he yields to the latter, and consents to become an assassin to please his mistress.

As to Mdle. Rachel, she really surprised me: she is now about seventeen years of age, (it is said not seventeen yet,) yet she filled her part with a dignity and propriety which were admirable. I saw her in Voltaire's play of Tancrède, filling the part of Alménide, in the early part of the week; and I conceived that she filled in the part: before the king her success was incontestable. There is no doubt that this young girl possesses great talent; indeed, considering her age, I deem it wonderful: her principal merit consists in the calmness and depth of dramatic energy: she possesses a tranquil force, which frees the spectator from all fear of her falling in any passage, no matter how violent or deep the passion of it may be. One always feels that whatever degree of power is displayed, a far greater quantity remains behind: in stern and determined characters, such as Medea or Lady Macbeth, she must be unequalled: in tender or sensitive parts, such as Juliet or Desdemona, she would fail. There is an inflexibility, an iron fixedness about her acting, which evinces but little sensibility: she wants flexibility of voice and sensibility of soul, which are to talent what grace is to beauty. On the other hand, she possesses a grand and noble simplicity and a fine taste, which lead me to believe that she will become hereafter the first actress in France.

You may wonder at my dwelling on this topic so long; but a really great actress is rare, and this young girl assuredly is already one. You would scarcely believe that a few years ago she ran the streets as a gipsy, gaining a precarious livelihood by singing and dancing; her history is a curious one, though she has not yet reached her seventeenth year. The king waited to the end of the performance, and expressed himself most graciously to every person. Mdle. Rachel was standing in the inner lobby, with all the curiosity of her age, to see the royal party go on: no longer the severe and majestic matron, but the gay, lively girl, proud of the applause she had received. The king recognized her, and stopped short, to say how much he had been delighted with her acting; the queen said even more, and the delight of the blushing girl was at its height, when, after receiving the compliments of the other members of the royal party, Louis Philippe added, "Business prevents my often visiting the theatre, but I will return to see you." What a moment! Praised by two kings and their queens in person, and able to attract so sagacious a monarch as Louis Philippe, occupied as he is by state affairs, to visit her again! Poor child! less has turned wiser heads.

GAETIES AND GRAVITIES.

TRYING TO PLEASE EVERYBODY.

HINTS TO EDITORS.

Ours reader cries, your strain's too grave,
Too much morality you have,
Too much about religion;
Give me some witch and wizard tales,
Of slipshod ghosts with fins and scales,
And feathers like a pigeon.

I love to read, another cries,
Those monstrous fashionable lies—
In other words, those novels,
Composed of kings, and priests, and lords,
Of border-wars, and Gothic hordes
That used to live in hovels.

No, no, cries one, we've had enough
Of such confounded love-sick stuff
To craze the fair creation:
Give us some recent foreign news
Of Russians, Turks, the Poles, or Jews,
Or any other nation.

The man of dull scholastic lore
Would like to see a little more
Of first-rate scraps of Latin;
The grocer-fair would have the price
Of tea and sugar, fruit and rice;
The draper, silk and satin.

Another cries, I want more fun,
A witty anecdote or pun,
A rebuff or a riddle;
Some wish for parliamentary news,
And some, perhaps, of wiser views,
Would rather hear a fiddle.

The critic, too, of classic skill,
Must dip in gall his gander-quill,
And scrawl against the paper;
Of all literary foils,
Bred in our colleges and schools,
He cuts the greatest caper.

Another cries, I want to see
A jumbled-up variety,
Variety in all things—
A miscellaneous hodge-podge print,
Composed (if only give the hint)
Of multifarious small things.

I want some marriage news, says miss,
It constitutes my highest bliss
To hear of wedding plenty;
For in a time of general rain,
None suffer from a drought, 'tis plain;
At least not one in twenty.

I want to hear of deaths, says one,
Of people totally undone
By losses, fire or fever;
Another answers, full as wise,
I'd rather have the fall and rise
Of reason, skills and beaver.

Some signify a secret wish
For now and then a favourite dish
Of politics to suit them;
But here we rest at perfect ease,
For should they swear the moon was cheese,
We never should confute them.

Or grave or humorous, wild or tame,
Lofly or low, 'tis all the same,
Too haughty or too humble;
So, brother editors, pursue
The path that seems the best to you,
And let the grumblers grumble.

THE DRESS-MAKER.

Let us "take a single victim," let us present the London dress-maker's girl, but a year in her teens, compelled, it may be, to aid in the support of younger brothers and sisters. How many bleak, savage winter mornings does she rise, and, with half-frozen fingers, put on her scanty clothes—all insufficient to guard her shivering limbs from the frost, the wind, and rain,—and, with noiseless feet, that she may not disturb "any of the lodgers," creep down three-pair of stairs, and, at six o'clock, pick her timid way through mud, and cold, and darkness, to the distant "work-room!" Poor, gentle thing!—now, hurrying on, fearing that she is five minutes too late, and now passing, and creeping into a door-way, to let some staggering drunkard pass, roaring and reeling home. It may be, too, that this little creature was born in the lap of comfort—was the pet, the hope, of a fireside—was the darling of a circle—the child of competence, of luxury. Death, however, has taken her father—the sole prop and stay of a house of plenty; and the widow, after struggling from year to year, has passed from bad to worse, and now, with four children—our little dress-maker's girl the eldest—pines in a three-pair back room, whence, every morning, our young heroine, with a patience and a pensive sweetness—the gifts of early adversity—sallies forth to unremitting toil.

Gentle reader—is this a false picture? Is this a coloured thing, tricked out to cozen sensibility?—the creation of a florid story-writer—the dimmy heroine of a foolish novel? Oh, no! do not think it: at this moment, hundreds upon hundreds of the fairest and the most delicate human buds—of creatures who, born in the regions of May Fair, had been painted, and their portraits scattered through the empire, as very triumphs of "the excelling hand of nature"—work twelve, fourteen, sixteen hours per day—for what? For just enough to prove how very little human nature may exist upon. To proceed.

Our little dress-maker has arrived at the "work-room." After two or three hours, she takes her bread and butter, and warm adulterated water, denominated tea. Breakfast hurriedly over, she works, under the rigid, scrutinizing eye of a task-mistress, some four hours more; and then proceeds to the important work of dinner. A scanty slice of meat—perhaps an egg—is produced from her basket: she dines, and sews again till five. Then comes again the fluid of the morning, and again, the needle until eight. Hark! yes, that's eight now striking. "Thank heaven!" thinks our heroine, as she rises to put by her work, "the task for the day is done!" At this moment a thundering knock is heard at the door. "The duchess of Daffodile must have her robe by four to-morrow. Again the dressmaker's apprentice is made to take her place—again she resumes her thread and needle: and, perhaps, the clock is "beating one" as she again, jaded and half dead with work, creeps to her lodgings, and goes to bed, still haunted with the thought that as "the work is very back," she must be up by five to-morrow.

Beautiful, and very beautiful, are the dresses at a drawing-room! Surprisingly delightful, as minutely described in the columns of the Morning Herald and the Morning Post! To the rapid imagination they seem woven of "Jine's work;" or things manufactured by the Fairy Queen, and her maids of honour: yet may imagination, if it will, see in the trappings the work of penury, of patient suffering, and scantily rewarded toil. How many sighs from modest humble work have been breathed upon that lace! How much of the heart-ache has gone to the sewing of that dounce! "All the beauty of the kingdom," says the Court Chronicler for the thousandth time, "was at her majesty's drawing-room!" What! all the beauty in brocade, in satin, and in velvets! Is none left for humble gingham—none for homespun stuff? Oh, yes! beauty that has grown pale at midnight, that wealthy beauty might shine with richer lustre the next court-day! Beauty that has pined and withered in a garret, that sister-beauty might be more beautiful in a carriage!

Can there be a more forlorn, more pitiable condition than that of the daily seamstress, growing old and lonely on the wages of her ill-paid craft. Follow her to her room—the roughest nook of some old, gloomy house, in some gloomy court; survey the abode of penury: of penury, striving with a stoutness of heart, of which the world knows nothing, to put a bright face upon want; to smile with patience on the greatest, as on the pettiest privations. This is the dress-maker, long since past her girlhood; the seamstress, no longer out-stared in the street—followed for her beauty—fattered by the rich; tempted with ease and luxury, when her own home offers nothing but indigence and hardest labour. This is not the young, blushing creature, walking in London streets, her path full of pitfalls; the lawful prey of selfish vice—the watched-for prize of mercenary infamy. No; she has escaped all these snares; she has, in the innocence and constancy of her heart, triumphed over all the seductions of pleasure; has, "with the wings of a dove," escaped this net spread for her by fiends with the faces of women. She has wasted the light-heartedness of her childhood, and the bloom of her youth, in daily, nightly toil; and arrived at middle age, she is still the working sempstress—the lonely, faded spinster, the human animal vegetating on two shillings per diem. Is not this the fate of thousands in this our glorious metropolis?

Among many of the most annoying trials of life, the trial of a new dress by a wayward, aristocratic customer, or what is infinitely worse, by purse-proud ignorance, is not the least to the poor dress-maker's girl, who may be commissioned to take the garment home. If there be a falling in a founce, the slightest error in a sleeve, if a cuff be a hair's breadth too broad, or a thread too narrow, down will come a shower of hard words—and that, sometimes from the proudest, and seemingly the meekest of mouths—about the astounded head of the dress-maker, who with helpless looks for the omission of others, or what is equally likely, for the forgetfulness or new whim of the lady herself, stands silent and abashed; or, flatteringly hearkens an excuse, or pronounces instant amendment. Such promptness, however, for the time, only increases the storm; until the culprit finds that silence is the best defence, and she is at length ordered "to take the thing away," and, if she please, "to throw it on the fire!"

Now, as we proceed, will all our lady readers put their fair white hands upon their gentle hearts, and with a solemn declaration declare that never, at any time of their lives, did such a scene as that above described pass between them and the dress-maker; the innocent scape-goat of the faults and the caprice of the employers and the employed! "We pause for a reply."

THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA CROSSED IN LOVE.

Madame Krudener lived for some time at Frankfort. She was the ornament of the aristocratic circles. She was gifted with the greatest beauty and the finest mind. M. Krudener saw her, fell desperately in love, and married her. His occupation called him to St. Petersburg, but foreseeing all the perils to which his beautiful young wife would be exposed at court, he made her take the most fearful oath to ensure her fidelity, and he swore himself, at the same time, that if he ever discovered her playing him a trick he would kill her on the spot. M. and Madame Krudener went to Russia; the moment she appeared at court the czar was struck with this creature with golden hair and a complexion brilliant as the day. The husband was immediately treated with the greatest distinction; he was pushed on in the diplomatic career to which he belonged, and a bright future was opened to him. In the meantime the emperor addressed himself to Madame Krudener, but she nobly resisted the temptation of the love of the greatest and certainly one of the finest men in Europe. He was much affected by her coldness, and became melancholy and unhappy, and exhibited all the despair of a young man. The facts soon became public, and the unrequited passion of the czar for the fair Madame Krudener was a common topic of conversation.

The world was astonished after astonished to see Madame Krudener in the train of the emperor during the last visit to Germany. It was believed that she had yielded; but such was not the fact, and the emperor continued as miserable as before. Indeed, he disclosed at Munich the secret of his passion and his disappointment; for he was seen at reviews, at the opera, at court, looking languishingly, and sighing, near this lady, and honouring her with the most marked attention; but every one remarked at the same time that the lady received those marks of favour with determined coldness, and that in appearing in the service of the emperor, when the emperor was present, she was discharging an unpleasant duty.

Such is love. It is the aristocrat more powerful than the aristocrat—it is the sovereign of the emperor.

REASONS FOR RISIBILITY.

"Why do you laugh so much?"—Query in a Ball-room.

Sweet coz! I'm happy when I can,
I'm merry while I may,
For life's at most a narrow span,
At best a winter's day.

If care could make the sunbeam wear
A brighter, warmer hue,
The evening star shine out more fair,
The blue sky look more blue,
Then I should grow a graver man—
But since 'tis not the way,

Sweet coz! I'm happy when I can,
And merry while I may!

If sighs could make us sin the less,
Perchance I were not glad—
If mourning were the sage's dress,
My garb should still be sad.

But since the angel's wings are white,
And even the young saints smile—
Since virtue wears a brow of light,
And vice a robe of guile—
Since laughter is not under ban,
Nor goodness clad in gray—

Sweet coz! I'm happy when I can,
And merry while I may!

I've seen a bishop dance a reel,
And a sinner jest and pry,
A knave at top of fortune's wheel,
And a good man cast away!
Wine have I seen your grave one's quaff,
Might set our feet afloat,

But I never heard a hearty laugh
From out a villain's throat!

And I never knew a truthful man
Make sad a young maid's day—
So, coz! I'm happy when I can,
And merry while I may!

THE PASSAGE BEHIND THE FALLS.

The most orthodox exploit expected of the visitor to Niagara is the "passage under the great shadow of the Horse-shoe Fall," and, although I have travelled too far to think it necessary to thrust my head into the mouth of every lion that yawns by the way-side, yet this lion both yawned so wide and roared so loud, that I considered it due to my cloth to accept the challenge. Accordingly I am just come home with a splitting headache, bloodshot eyes, and sundry rheumatic twinges, gained by the most awful conflict with wind and water that I ever engaged in. Putting myself into the hands of the negro guide, I was turned into a small room, to exchange my own uniform for one resembling, I should imagine, that of Neptune's merman guards, namely, a suit of green oil-cloth armour, fitting me like a sentry-box. In the same character two Prussians, with teeth chattering, were pouring forth, as they dressed, a volume of guttural congratulations on their respective performances in nature's great shower-bath. Having completed my disguise, I followed my Atlantic guide; and, pursuing his footsteps down the cork-screw and courage-awakening stair, that leads down the face of the cliff, I found myself Aladdin led by his gigantic Genie.

The prospect from the little path leading over the shattered crags of the foot of the Great Cresent—into whose tender mercies I was shortly to commit myself—is glorious beyond conception; and I felt the same desire to linger there as one has to admire the paintings in the ante-room of a dentist; my Ethiopian companion, however, dragged me forward through a shower of sulphur-smelling droppings from the rocks above, and in a moment I found myself blinded, buffeted, and breathless, in the midst of a hurly-burly of wind and water that defies description. "Look up!" cried my guide, during a momentary lull; and for one instant I distinctly saw the grand vault of over-arching water shooting from the impending rock, and passing me in its descent at the full distance of thirty paces. Presto! came an avalanche of water which knocked my hat down to my chin, followed by a hurricane of wind and spray from below that blew it off, and left me gasping like a dying tender! In the midst of my tribulation, I remembered the superb-minded couple who added trifles to the awful ceremony of wedlock by having it performed on the "Table Rock;" and I thought that they could not find a fitter spot for the baptism of their first-born than the spot where I then stood: the lady-mother would not have far to look for a wet nurse!

Having remained about five minutes at "Termination Rock," (the ultima thule of human footsteps, one hundred and fifty-three feet from the mouth,) in vain hopes of another glimpse through the continual cloud of mist, I beat a willing retreat, delighted to "revivere gradum" from that "hell of waters." Had there been a dozen Eurydicees at my heels, I should not have lost one of them—for I never once looked behind me! On my way out I inquired for the spot where an ambitious traveller, named Egerton, passed, according to his own account, two whole days in engraving his name on the rock beneath the sheet of water. It is already utterly obliterated!—such is fame! His humble servant is pensive now, grieved his name a better chance of immortality than all his own efforts have accomplished! As for me, I would rather drop into my grave, "unhonoured and unsung," than purchase distinction at such a price.

I can hardly understand how ladies can undergo the above awful ordeal—yet the names of many fair visitants to "Termination Rock" are recorded on the books. My gigantic guide seems proud of his guardianship of so many pretty charges. He told me that yesterday he had escorted a young Spanish lady "under the sheet," and that she was very nervous. I thought of Othello, as I looked in his sable face, and was not surprised at the maiden's alarm!

THE INDIGNANT POINTER.—A gentleman was visited by one that was as fond of the sport as he who could do better; off they started on a September morn with one of the best of the kennel; the dog, nothing loth, ranged, quickly found, and stood steady; up walks the gentleman—being long away the birds flew; the dog gave an insignificant look at his companion as much as to say, "You must mend this!" Again, and again, with no better effect than the first, the dog watching the flight of the covey till out of sight. He then gazed the gentleman a most expressive look of contempt, and trotted home to his master.

THE ANGELS' WHISPER.

AN ADMIRABLE BALLAD—WRITTEN AND COMPOSED BY SAMUEL LOVER.—PUBLISHED BY REQUEST.

ANDANTE.

A ba-by was sleep-ing, Its mo-ther was her has-band was far on the wild rag-ing sea, And Molto espressione.

tem - pest was swell-ing Round the Ash-er-man's dwell-ing, And she cried, 'Der-mot, dar-ling, oh! come back to me.'

Cres.

Ad lib.

Colla voce

2d—Her bonds while she numbered,
The baby still slumber'd,
And smil'd in her face as she bended her knee;
'Oh! bless'd be that warning,
My child, thy sleep adorning,
For I know that the angels are whispering to thee.'

3d—And while they are keeping
Bright watch o'er thy sleeping,
Oh! pray to them softly, my baby, with me;
And say thou wouldst rather
They'd watch o'er thy father,
For I know that the angels are whispering with thee.'

4th—The dawn of the morning
Saw Dermot returning,
And the wife wept with joy her babe's father to see,
And closely caressing
Her child, with a blessing,
Said, 'I knew that the angels were whispering with thee.'

THE FINE ARTS.

NEW PRINTS.—"Left left foremost." Painted by R. Farrier, and drawn on stone by T. Fairland. This print represents a veteran soldier, wearing a broom, with his wooden substitute for a leg stretched out, teaching a young laughing urchin by his side how battles are won and lost. The boy is beating a mimic drum, and is entering into the "pomp and circumstance of war" with equal enthusiasm of his preceptor. A pipe in the unoccupied hand of the merry old fellow, and a glass and pitcher upon the top of a water-but, are almost conclusive proofs of his not belonging to the temperance society. In the background there is a female with a child in her arms looking on the scene, from a cottage window, with the smile of a mother playing upon her lips. Altogether this is one of the most interesting productions of the kind we ever saw.—"The Ruined Gamester." An awful title, but not so dreadful upon examination. A boy with melancholy visage, leaning against a wall, is looking at three playmates interested in a game of marbles. He has evidently staked his all, stood the hazard of the die, and is meeting the chances of fortune with frowns. This is painted by C. A. Duval, and exquisitely engraved by G. H. Every.—"The Blind Beggarman." Here an object of charity is represented in the most glowing colours. An old man, upon whom the sun shines or not to him is equally the same. His eyes no longer perform their allotted office; but day and night admit only the same sad darkness. His hat is meekly held in hand for the reception of pity's kind offerings, showing a venerable head, over which many chilling frosts have swept, leaving a few scant locks rivaling even winter's snows. No one could look at this print without a feeling of sympathy for "the blind beggarman." These beautiful engravings are to be had of Davis and Horn, No. 411 Broadway.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—While enjoying the delights of a fine concert, it is usual to dwell on the masterly composition, the sweetness of the air, or the fine execution, yet it never occurs to us to praise the quality of the instrument. This is an oversight of more importance than at first sight would be considered; for it must be evident that, however refined the taste of the composer and of the performer, however delightful the strains as they stand upon the score, yet, without a sufficient instrument for their expression, it is utterly impossible to render adequate justice to beautiful ideas. This is well known to the professor of music, and hence the exceeding care with which he selects the medium through which he purports to display his talents before the public. The violinist, the flutist—the professor, in short, of any instrument of a portable nature—has generally a favourite or pet article on which he plays his obligato. It is not always so, however, with the pianist—that instrument is unwieldy; and a favourite, when once placed in his apartment, is seldom allowed to be moved. He, therefore, has recourse to a maker, and we may fairly judge of the general skill of the manufacturer by the frequency with which his instruments are used for such occasions. Viewed in this light, we cannot but remark on the almost general demand that is made by professors for the pianofortes of Stodart, Worcester, and Dunham, of our city. It is rare that we hear the sound of any other in our concert-rooms; and, certainly, the brilliancy of their tones and their sound quality justly entitles them to this pre-eminence. We have more than once observed the remarks of a reputed contemporary on this subject, in which we have always acquiesced; but the effects at a concert, lately given at the Apollo Saloon, by Mr. W. A. King, impel us to give utterance to the admiration we sincerely felt on hearing the fine specimen of manufacture then brought forward; and we take pleasure in recommending the instruments of Messrs. Stodart, Worcester and Dunham, to all who, being admirers of music, are desirous of cultivating good taste and beauty of tone in its execution.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"THE FAR WEST, OR A TOUR BEYOND THE MOUNTAINS."—We are gratified to find that this admirable work, from the pen of our esteemed countryman, Flagg, of Louisville, receives the commendation of the critics far and near. The book is a good book, and deserves the praise it receives. Prentice, of the Louisville Journal, (himself one of the most singularly-gifted of our native writers,) pronounces Mr. Flagg's book the best that has ever been published on the subject of which it treats—and Prentice's word has all the sanction of law authority with a great majority of those who read, and, what is more, purchase American works. The Harpers are preparing for a second edition. This is all as it should be.

"THE AMERICAN TRAVELLER."—This well-conducted journal deserves more than a passing notice at our hands. It is full of spirit and energy, and sustains a character for independence and spirit that is highly commendable. It is one of the exchange papers we open and read with pleasure. It has a circulation equal to that of any periodical in the country, for it contains useful and interesting information for all who travel by steamboat, car or stage. The editor, Royal L. Porter, Esq., is a flowing, easy, graceful, caustic writer, and possesses that tact for editing a public journal, without which talent, even though of a higher order, is unavailable. In the conduct of a newspaper, there is nothing like your practical man, when, as in the present instance, he combines high intellectual attainments, a ready fancy and sparkling humour. We are happy to perceive that in addition to the semi-weekly, Mr. Porter has issued the Weekly Traveller, on a sheet of the same size, to contain all the tales, poetry, news, miscellany, editorial matter, legislative and congressional proceedings, prices current, shipping and commercial proceedings, in short, everything furnished by the semi-weekly, that can interest families in town and country. When we consider that it is issued at the exceedingly low sum of two dollars and fifty cents per annum, we are sure that it will have an unprecedented subscription list. At all events, we hope it may.

"THE AMARANTH."—This is the title of the best English annual of the season. It is edited by Mr. T. K. Hervey, one of the most graceful and original of modern English poets. The Amaranth contains contributions from Sheridan Knowles, E. M. Fitzgerald, Caroline Bowles, Jerrold, Poole, and other well-known writers.

"THE HERPERIAN; OR WESTERN MONTHLY MAGAZINE." Such is the title of one of the best magazines in the country. It is published in Columbus, Ohio, and edited by William D. Gallagher.

"REPUBLICATION OF FOREIGN REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES."—The valuable periodicals published by Mrs. Lever, continue to be issued in a good style, and with remarkable punctuality. We are glad to learn that the enterprise has proved completely successful. "Bentley's Miscellany," for December, is as usual rich in entertaining matter.

MISCELLANY.

COMPLIMENTS.—One of the most flattering compliments Frederick of Prussia ever paid, was that which he addressed to the celebrated General Laudon, at the time of his intimacy with the emperor at the camp of Neiss. After they had discoursed for about an hour, the two monarchs sat down to dinner, with the princes and general officers in their train. Marshal Laudon, who had been invited among the rest, was about to seat himself at the bottom of the table, but the king bade him come and sit by him, saying, "Come here, General Laudon; I have always wished to see you by my side, instead of fronting me."

FRINDSHIP.—When the late king of Denmark was in England, he very frequently honoured Sir Thomas Robinson with his company, though the knight spoke French in a very imperfect manner, and the king had scarcely any knowledge of English. One day, when Sir Thomas was in company with the late Lord Chesterfield, he boasted much of his intimacy with the king, and added "that he believed the monarch had a greater friendship for him than any man in England." "How report lies," exclaimed Lord Chesterfield; "I heard no later than this day, that you never met, but a great deal of bad language passed between you."

A SARCASTIC REPLY.—A lady at Vienna having somewhat rudely remarked to Mr. Ward that it was strange that all the best society spoke French as well as German, while the English scarcely spoke French at all, or spoke it ill, Ward answered, that the English must be excused for their want of practice, as the French army had not been twice to London to teach them, as they had to Vienna.

MUSICAL SON NOT.—A gentleman at a musical party where the lady was very particular not to have the concord of sweet sounds interrupted, was freezing under the performance of a long concerted piece, and seeing that the fire was going out, asked a friend in a whisper, "How he should stir the fire without interrupting the music?" "Between the bars," replied the friend.

HUMAN HAPPINESS.—"I have lived," said the indefatigable Dr. Clarke, "to know that the great secret of human happiness is this: never suffer your energies to stagnate. The old adage of 'too many irons in the fire,' conveys an abominable falsehood; you cannot have too many—poker, tongs, and all, keep them all going." Daily experience, we are bound to say, verifies the remarks of the learned doctor.

"PELO DE SE."—A person having wilfully put an end to his life, by drowning in a canal, the coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Pelo de se." Upon hearing it, a Frenchman exclaimed, how can that be, for he "fell in de cut."

OUT OF THE WAY.—"Send them all to —," exclaimed a sacrilegious ruffian, speaking of some paupers. "Better send them to heaven, your honour, we shall be more out of your way there," replied one of them.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. Terms, FIVE DOLLARS per annum, payable, in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

G. P. Scott, Printer, corner of John and Gold-streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL, DEVOTED TO LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR.] SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NUMBER ONE BARCLAY-STREET, NEXT TO THE CORNER OF BROADWAY. [PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

VOLUME SIXTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 26, 1839.

NUMBER THIRTY-ONE.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE ENGAGED LADY.

BY SOLOMON SOLUS, ESQ.

"Well, well, I am glad you like Miss Clayton, she is certainly a very pretty girl for one so inexperienced; but, George, beware; don't fall in love—she's engaged!"

"Engaged!"

"Yes, sir, she's engaged; you seem to think it very strange!"

"Oh, not in the least, madam; she's surely very engaging!"

"It is queer you haven't heard of her engagement before—it's quite the common talk—I thought everybody knew it."

"Never a word before, I assure you—but, pray, to whom is she engaged?"

"O—to a gentleman!"

"To a gentleman, of course—whoever heard of a marriage contract between two ladies! To a gentleman, indeed! but I should like to know his name."

"Pretty well! Mr. Hubert, if you are not engaged, I'm mistaken—I fear my advice is quite thrown away!"

"Never mind the advice—the gentleman!"

"Why, sir, I believe he lives in Virginia."

"And the name?"

"Why, really, Mr. Hubert, you seem very much interested—but, to tell you the truth, I haven't learned his name."

The last speaker was a maiden lady of some—I was about to mention her age; but I have the worst memory in the world for dates, and I am afraid I shall not give it correctly. It would be of no use to consult the family Bible—she tore the record out long ago. But, if I am not very much mistaken, she was aged—I have not finished the sentence—she was aged about —. In short, gentle reader, Miss Polly Nipkins was a maiden lady, who could not rationally look to the future for her thirtieth birthday.

Although I am by no means free from the common antipathy to "old maids," I am inclined to be very tolerant of all such as are single against their own inclinations, since it were the height of injustice to make necessity a matter of reproach. If Miss Nipkins was an old maid, it was not entirely her own fault. If she never married, it was not because she would not. Unlike many in her situation, she could not be censured for having refused a score of good offers—she never had any. If, indeed, any gentleman was ever likely to be ensnared by her craft, it always happened that he "broke from her enclosure," upon further acquaintance. I am unable to account for her ill-success on any other ground than that of her ill-nature, which was well-edged, proverbial. With all the advantages afforded by a good education, respectable rank, and a tolerable person; her disposition, which was jealous, envious and mischievous, rendered her the bane of society, and the constant source of unhappiness to herself.

It is painful to state, what is true nevertheless, that human nature is very nearly the same in women as in men, and that even the fair are capable of the most unfair proceedings. It was the uniform policy of Polly Nipkins, in the process of a courtship (that's the best word I can find), elegantly to disparage every young lady of her acquaintance, whom she thought at all in her way; either to advance her own interest in the affair, or, in the event of a failure, to render the case of her lady-friends as hopeless as her own.

Having made the reader sufficiently acquainted with one of our colloquists, we will proceed to a brief description of the other.

George Hubert was a young man of twenty-two—I knew him well at college—handsome, talented and genteel, and every way a fine fellow. At the time of our story, he was residing in Fairfield, Connecticut; where he had arrived a few months before, for the purpose of completing, in the office of a respectable attorney at that place, the last year of his legal study preparatory to an admission to the bar. He was already a decided favourite of Miss Polly Nipkins, of whom he knew very little, and decidedly in love with Miss Sarah Clayton, of whom he wished to know more. Miss Clayton, like herself, was a "resident stranger." Early in May, she had left her home in Virginia, to spend the remaining months of summer at the residence of a wealthy uncle, in the cooler climate of New-England. Possessing an uncommon degree of personal beauty, high conversational endowments, and withal a gentle and affectionate disposition, Sarah Clayton was eminently qualified to be admired and beloved. Still, she was too bright a mark to escape the shafts of envy; and more than once, in the lapse of eighteen summers, had she been made to wish she were less attractive. George Hubert had met her but twice, when, much to his amazement, he was fast losing a heart which, up to that time, had been entirely his own. Like every incipient lover, he found himself on enchanted ground, enchained by a spell equally mysterious and delightful. Such were the feelings of Mr. George Hubert, when Miss Polly Nipkins told him that Miss Clayton was "engaged!"

"Engaged!" exclaimed George, as soon as he had escaped from the presence of Miss Nipkins, "engaged! it is impossible!"

But reflection soon told him it was by no means impossible for a pretty girl of eighteen to be engaged; in fact, it was one of the most natural things in the world. And then, everybody said Miss Clayton was engaged—at least, Miss Nipkins said "everybody said so;" "it was quite common talk"—and why should he doubt that Miss Nipkins told the truth? But George was too deeply interested to let the matter rest here. He resolved to make farther inquiry, and, if she was not engaged—well, what then? Perhaps she would choose to remain so! No matter! He was determined to know the truth, however unpleasant. His investigations were pursued with as much delicacy and skill as he was master of—the result was most propitious. She was engaged! To be sure, some of the young ladies had only heard the story, and could not vouch for its correctness. But others knew it to be true—there was no chance for a mistake. The gentleman was a dashing young merchant in Virginia, who sent Miss Clayton a letter every week. So said Miss Nipkins, and so said the postmaster's two daughters.

Do not say, gentle reader, that Mr. George Hubert should have gone directly to the lady herself to learn whether she was unengaged. Perhaps he would have done so upon more mature acquaintance—perhaps he did. As it was, Mr. Hubert was not in the least disposed to ask a question, which would probably be answered to his mortification. Besides, he had no reason to suppose that the lady regarded him in any other light than that of a common acquaintance. Although George had neither the assurance, nor the disposition to "pop the question" directly, he occasionally rallied the lady about her "beau in Virginia." Miss Clayton, however, was a lady of too much refinement to take great pains to prove that she was unengaged; or, to assert the opposite, whichever was true; and hence treated the subject with mild or indifference. Yet, hopeless as he deemed his case, and deeply as he felt the folly and danger of cultivating a passion for an "engaged lady," George could not deny himself the pleasure of her society. Chance and design brought him frequently into her presence, until at length the stranger was lost in the friend, and formal urbanity gave place to mutual kindness and esteem.

Thus passed a few weeks, when, with the recurrence of autumn, Miss Clayton received a request from her parents to return to her home in Virginia. She immediately prepared to obey the parental injunction, and, to the exceeding regret of Mr. George Hubert, and to the unpeakable joy of Miss Polly Nipkins, the ensuing week witnessed her departure. I believe it to be a pretty general truth, that, in any place, the amount of attention paid to each individual is inversely proportional to the number of inhabitants.

Accordingly, in every small village a recent arrival or departure seldom fails to create "quite a sensation," and furnish material for a fortnight's gossip. Miss Clayton had no reason to complain of neglect. When she arrived in Fairfield, the busy-bodies of her own sex assured each other she had come to get married! Now she had gone, they assured the public she had gone to be married! No one bad more to say about it than Miss Polly Nipkins.

"Well, Mr. Hubert, Miss Clayton has left us—I am sure we shall miss her very much—I am really quite attached to her."

"So am I," replied George, looking as if he meant more than Miss Nipkins could possibly understand.

"Quite a confessor, truly! I must be very disconsolate."

"Not at all!"

"But, do you know what took Miss Clayton home in such a hurry?"

"Humph!—a stage-coach, I suppose."

"Come, do joking—don't you think she's gone home to be married?"

"I don't doubt it."

"And yet you would hardly believe she was 'engaged!'"

"I know it."

"Well, you now believe she's engaged?"

"Yes, I believe she's engaged now."

The sentence was ambiguous—and Miss Nipkins didn't notice the emphasis. She continued:—"Well, it's queer enough, we never could learn the gentleman's name."

"I can tell you."

"Ah!—indeed! who is it?"

"George Hubert!"

"You don't mean yourself?"

"Myself—exactly! why not?"

"But I really thought—"

"I very much doubt it."

"But the letters you know—"

"Were from her brother—and you knew it too!"

"Allow me to beg—"

"I haven't a cent to spare!"

Here Miss Nipkins compressed her lips into the shape of a pair of shoemaker's pinchers inverted—trotted her foot with great rapidity, and looked like the most ill-used lady in existence!

"Madam," said Hubert, raising and taking his hat, "madam! accept from me a maxim, which I offer in the utmost sincerity and kindness—repeat it to every young lady of your acquaintance: as you regard your own reputation, and the reputation and happiness of your sex, never report a young lady to be engaged, till you know it to be true."

About two years after Miss Clayton's return to Virginia, I received the following note:

"DEAR SIR—I am to be married to-morrow!—you must be present by all means. We shall need your assistance. Miss Clayton would undoubtedly be happy to meet a word to her old friend, but just at this moment she is engaged. Yours, in haste, GEORGE HUBERT."

Te SOLOMON SOLUS, Esq.

GALEITIES AND GRAVITIES.

MORNING CALLS.

"Two carriage is at the door," said Lady Codrington to her daughter, "where shall we call this morning? at the Irvings?"

"What?" returned Claudia, who thought every moment wasted in which she was not exciting the admiration of the Lord Williams and Lord Alfred of Park-place and Belgrave-square; "to be bored with a repetition of coughs and colds, and conundrums, how they were caught?"

"Well, then, the Grabams? We have not visited them for an age?"

"Where shall we call this morning? at the Irvings?"

"I prefer to be a useless times that go there, to hear her retail her visits to Devonshire-house; how well the duke looked; how kindly the duke behaved; how attentive the duke was to her fright of a daughter; and how—but I've determined I won't call there, mamma."

"Mrs. Clifford, then?"

"Really," replied the acquiescent daughter, "all you propose are positively insufferable. Mrs. Clifford, indeed, with her pittance of pin-money?"

"She married for love."

"Married for nonsense! That's no reason why we are to be bored for patterns of gowns, caps, and bonnets, which she is too poor to have direct from Paris."

"Really, Claudia, you are too severe."

"Really, mamma, you are too yielding. I declare, before I had worn the hat three times which Lord Alfred admired so much, the pattern had been exhibited to all the hundred cousins; in the hundredth degree, of her plebeian husband. We positively must cut them!"

"You know, my dear, that Mr. Clifford's father is very rich and very old, and Mr. Clifford will inherit all his money."

"Yes," returned Claudia, who began to lose her temper at the list of "ineligibles" which were presented to her view; "and I know, too, that rich relations never die. There's my godmother, Lady Stepmore, as old as Methuselah, and as active as a hoyden of fifteen."

"My dear Claudia," exclaimed Lady Codrington, "how very lucky you have mentioned her. It never occurred to me that we owe a call to that excessively unpleasant person."

"Yes! I suppose we must go there, if we wish to be remembered in her will," replied the young lady, reluctantly.

"But I thought," said mamma, quizzingly, "you had no time to work for charity bazaars, and she is sure to ask you."

"Ode est differre," smiled Claudia.

"And no money for charitable subscriptions, and she is sure to beg of you—apropos of money, my dear child, you must not be so extravagant; your Paris milliner's bill was enormous!"

"Papa can afford it."

"But papa says he has lost so much at Brookes' this year, and there are such heavy complaints from his country estates, that he cannot afford it."

"I'm sure," returned the young lady with dignity, "I can't dress less than I do now. Lady Jane Harwood's bill was double the amount of mine."

"Lady Jane can afford it; but now for your odious godmother."

"To Lady Stepmore's the carriage drove, while Claudia indulged in pleasing anticipations of charity bazaars and charity subscriptions, and her mamma in inventing excuses for not calling before."

Lady Stepmore sat in her easy-chair, the very picture of any but an old maid. There was no evidence of human sympathy; there was no appearance of the human world; everything looked like herself, hard, rigid, and uncompromising. The library was composed of Pamela, Sir Charles Grandison, and Clarissa Harlowe, while even the antique tabby (not the maiden, but the cat) looked as venerably majestic as her mistress. The embroidery in which her ladyship shone was as old as herself; indeed, the ancient furniture and the ancient lady looked almost as ancient as the portraits of the family which were hung around; and, were it not for the purring of the cat, and the occasional movements of Lady Stepmore, they might have been regarded as ideal rather than real.

Her ladyship rose not to receive her guests, but looking as dignified as possible, gave them a formal welcome.

"How charmed I am, my dear madam," said Lady Codrington, "to see you looking so well."

"The 'odious godmother' remained completely unrelaxed in her dignity."

"Ah," she continued, "busy, as usual, working for some charitable institution, I know."

"Your ladyship is right," returned the old lady, glad to get a hit at her visitor. "I do not pass my time in gadding to and fro making morning calls, forgetful of my old friends."

"Ah! I knew you would think us insensitive; but the truth is, we have been staying away until we could surprise you."

"You have surprised me," said Lady Stepmey, cynically.

"And now," continued Lady Codrington, utterly regardless of the innendo, "your dear Claudia hopes you will accept the prize that has caused our absence."

"Hum!" said the ancient lady, very incredulously.

"We knew you would have some charitable work, some fashionable bazaar, under your protection; and our dear Claudia has been slaving, positively slaving, to get an article or two ready for your stall."

"The maiden began to look gratified. Your tabbies are generally avocuous."

"There's a dear good creature," she replied; "I knew you would assist me; but have you no news? I was sorry to hear of Mr. Deacon's death."

"Yes! and the way the widow behaved; how infamous; within three months she was at the opera flirting with every one—"

"That would flirt with her," put in Claudia, good-naturedly.

"Yes!" said the Tabby, with a claim to being a wit. "I always thought she was like her mourning, very demure."

"And very deceptive; but you are so hard," said Claudia toadily; and then the Tabby laughed, and both the ladies laughed, as in duty bound towards a relative. What will not a little wit (and plenty of money) effect?

"But now, my dear madam," said Lady Codrington, "we must bid you farewell—you will hear from us soon," said her ladyship significantly as she turned away.

"Claudia," she continued when out of ear-shot, "tell the man to drive to Howell and James's; we must buy something for her admirable bazaar, and make her fancy you have worked it; it will do just as well."

"There they go," said Lady Stepmey sarcastically, as she heard the carriage drive off. "Mother and daughter—both alike—a pretty pair they are; but if ever they get one penny of my money I shall be surprised!"

THE MISER AND THE CANTATRICE.

Love, all powerful love, conquers everything. It is that alone which can dissolve the stony heart of the miser, and compel him, to his own utter astonishment, to part with his beloved gold, which he considered more valuable than his existence.

A very ridiculous affair has lately taken place in La Belle France, which entirely justifies our exordium! A cantatrice, whose beauty and accomplishments almost equalled the sweetness of her voice in rendering her popular, lately made a tour through the provinces, where her success exceeded her most sanguine expectations. It so happened that the city of Marseilles was to be the scene of her exertions. The fame of her beauty and talents had preceded her, and expectation was on tip-toe to witness the first appearance of the celebrated Signora L.—.

The possession of enormous wealth, even if it be in the hands of a miser, does not always deaden the heart to the influence of divine music. So at least it was in the case of Monsieur F.—.

He was among the audience on the night of Signora L.—'s appearance before the musical public of Marseilles. Whether it were the lady's extraordinary musical talents, or her elegant and graceful carriage, or the influence of a beautiful face and figure, certain it is, that the heart of M. F.— was touched. Who can describe the conflicts in his breast between his love of money and his passion for the divine Signora. Venus conquered! and the wealthy provincial felt constrained by her power to lay his riches at her feet.

He despatched a billet-doux to the most amorous complexion to the lady; he offered everything but his hand. How was his offer received? The Signora was not only inexorable but ungrateful; she rejected the music, and addressed with scorn, and placed his effusion in the hands of a more honorable lover. The lover was as indignant as his mistress. He sent the miser a challenge! Poor Monsieur F.—, not only to be foiled in his pursuit, but to be compelled to fight a duel, it was dreadful! What could he do? "Love makes a man!" it made one of Monsieur F.—.

He accepted the challenge, and boldly and resolutely declared that he would not resign his claim to the lady upon any consideration whatever. He would fight, he would win, if necessary! Nothing but death should make him forego his pursuit!

The lover and the Signora were alike astonished; the former at the display of courage in the miser, so totally unexpected; the latter at an extraordinary proof of the power of her charms. It is certain that the lady expressed much anger at the presumption of Monsieur F.—, than she had previously done, and her lover could hardly boast that his arm was invigorated by the encouraging smiles of his lady-love. The two aspirants met! We of course cannot determine what was the cause of the result, whether Monsieur F.— were the better swordsman, or the lover were depressed by the coolness of the Signora, but it is certain that Monsieur, the miser, conquered.

Our fair readers may imagine that the lady would compensate her lover for his sufferings and mortification by her loving care and sympathy; if they do so, they are very much mistaken. Signora L.— did no such thing! Her thoughts dwelt more upon the bravery and devotion of the miser than upon the misfortunes of her lover; she never visited him during his confinement from his wound, but, on the contrary, showed an unusual degree of apathy and unconcern.

But we must return to Monsieur F.—; he proceeded to his house a conqueror, but what was conquest to him if he could not try the appropriate forces? Long and serious were his reflections! What chance was there that he could obtain the object of his passion? He feared that the lady's heart was impregnable; he hoped, if he made an offer of his hand, it would be accepted, and his Signora make a virtuous wife. He resolved to make the experiment! He wrote another billet of a more respectful nature than the first; he apologized for his former impertinence, and tendered his hand. It was accepted, and Signora L.— became Madame F.— to the infinite amusement and amazement of the good people of Marseilles. As for Monsieur F.—, he seemed a changed creature! He filled his fine old mansion with new and splendid furniture, set up a magnificent equipage, which eclipsed anything ever seen in Marseilles. Balls, routs, and parties were given in rapid succession, and Monsieur F.— thought himself a happy man. The honeymoon passed swiftly away; in the meantime the unfortunate love of Madame F.— had recovered from its wound, but not from that caused by the baseness and ingratitude of his mistress. It so happened that, when Marseilles had just closed to talk about the "Miser Married," that Madame F.— was invited to a party where her former lover was always a guest. Judge her confusion and dismay. But these soon wore away. Her lover was as polite as if Madame F.— had been a perfect stranger. She gradually recovered her self-possession and entered into gay conversation with her discarded enemy. Monsieur F.— was delighted. His lady's cheerfulness was a sure sign that her heart was his own! Poor Monsieur F.—, how he was mistaken! Propinquity is a dangerous thing. The next day the incontinent Madame F.— had fled! Monsieur F.— is still food for the laughter of the Marseillais. He is inconsolable.

WHEN I WAS IN MY PRIME.

BY CAROLINE ROWLES.

I mind me of a pleasant time—

A season long ago—

The pleasantest I've ever known,

Or ever now can know:

Bees, birds, and little tinkling rills

So merrily did hum and tinkle

The year was in its sweet spring-tide,

And I—was in my prime.

I've never heard such music since,

From every bending spray—

I've never pull'd such primroses,

Set thick on bank and brea;

I've never smelt such violets

As, all that pleasant time,

I found by every hawthorn root,

When I was in my prime.

Yon moory down, so black and bare,

Was gorgeous, then, and gay

With gorse and gowan blossoming

As none blooms now-a-day.

The blackbird sings but seldom now,

Up there in the old lime,

Where, hours and hours, I used to sing,

When I was in my prime.

Such cutting winds came never then,

To pierce one through and through;

More softly fell the silent shower,

More balmy the dew;

The morning mist, all mellowing haze,

Unlike this cold gray rain,

Seemed woven waves of golden air,

When I was in my prime.

And blackberries—so mawkish now—

Were finely flavoured then;

And hazel nuts! such clusters thick

I'd'er shall put in my teeth

Not strawberries, blushing white, as rich

As fruits of sunniest clime;

How all is altered for the worse,

Since I was in my prime!

KÖRNER'S FIRST AND LAST LOVE.

We gave, a few weeks since, a brief sketch of the life and writings of the poet Körner, "him of the lyre and sword." Mrs. Jameson, in her new work, presents a touching sketch of the life of an "splendid actress," Madame Arnetti, once Antoinette Adamberger, and the beloved of the warmhearted bar.

"It was not," says Mrs. Jameson, "ill we had been for some time intimate that I should allude to Körner. One evening, as we were sitting alone, she gave me, with much feeling and graphic power, and even more simplicity, some particulars of her first interview with him, and the circumstances which led to their engagement. I should tell you that she was at the time a favourite actress of the Court Theatre, and excelled particularly in all characters that required more of delicacy, and grace and dignity, than of power and passion; those of Thekla in 'Wallenstein,' and Jertina in 'Schuldi,' being considered as her masterpieces."

"At the period of Körner's interview, Antoinette was ill, in consequence of the extreme severity of the winter of that year, and the rehearsal of the 'Ornello Domino' was put off from day to day, from week to week. Körner became impatient. At this time he had not been introduced to Antoinette, and it was suspected that the beauty of Anna Kruger had captivated him. At length the convalescence of the principal actress was announced, the day for long-deferred rehearsal arrived, and the performers had assembled in the green-room. Now, it happened, that in the time of the late empress, the representation of Schiller's 'Marie Stuart' had been forbidden, because her imperial majesty had been greatly scandalized by the under-plot, which was between Queen Elizabeth and Queen Mary, and particularly by the catastrophe of the latter, regarding the whole play as extremely dangerous and derogatory to all crowned heads, more especially female ones. On her death it was considered as the sacrifice of an almost saint, and the performers presented a petition to that effect. The empress, however, steadily refused, on the plea that he had promised the empress never to permit the representation of the tragedy. The refusal had just been received, and the whole corps d'armées were in a state of commotion, and divided on the merits of the case. Körner, in particular, was in a perfect fever of indignation, and exclaimed, in no measured terms, against the edict which deprived the public of one of Schiller's masterpieces, in testimony to the courage of an old woman now in her grave, at eternal rest. The greater number of those present sympathized with him. The dispute was at its height when Antoinette entered the room, still weak from recent illness, and wrapped up in a cloak and fur. Her comrades crowded around her in congratulations and expressions of attention, and musical that the matter in dispute should be referred to 'Tony' Körner, meanwhile, standing by in proud silence; he had not yet been introduced."

"When the affair was stated, and the opinions of the majority vehemently pressed on her, she replied in her gentle manner, 'I do not pretend to judge about the injury done to the public, or the expediency of the measure; but I cannot help feeling that between right and wrong—between truth and falsehood—for myself, I can only say that if I had made a promise to a person I loved, or to any one, I would keep it as long as I had life myself, and the death of that person would render such a promise not less, but more binding, more sacred, if possible.'"

"This simple appeal to principle and truth silenced all. Körner said no more, but his attention was fixed, and from that moment he was in her power. His feelings were interested before he had even looked into her eyes; and it is no wonder that those eyes, when revealed, completed the conquest."

"Within a few weeks they were betrothed lovers, and within a few months they were married. Körner was a handsome, well-known, young and handsome, a poet and a hero, loving, and in the full assurance of being loved, with all the fairest visions and purport of the world before him. Körner was a handsome, well-known, young and handsome, a poet and a hero, loving, and in the full assurance of being loved, with all the fairest visions and purport of the world before him. Körner was a handsome, well-known, young and handsome, a poet and a hero, loving, and in the full assurance of being loved, with all the fairest visions and purport of the world before him."

"The betrothal was a happy one. Now, will you believe, that within three or four months afterwards, when Antoinette was under the obligation to resume her professional duties, the first character she was ordered to play was that of Thekla? In vain she entreated to be spared this cutting and every feeling of a heart yet bleeding from her loss; the greater her reluctance, the greater the effect which would be produced on the curiosity and sympathy of the public; this, I suppose, was the cold calculation of the director! It was not excused; and after going through the scene in which the Swedish captain relates to Thekla the death of her lover, the poor Antoinette was carried from the stage by her aunt almost lifeless, and revived only to give way to such agonies of grief and indignation as threatened her reason."

"Madame Arnetti is remarkably calm and simple in her manner, and more than twenty years had elapsed, since she had been thus insulted and tortured; but when she alluded to this part of her history, she became gradually convulsed with emotion, trembled in every limb, and pressed her hands upon her eyes, from which the tears would gush in spite of an effort to restrain them."

"Antoinette had suffered what a woman of quiet but proud temper never forgets or forgives. She had made up her mind to quit the stage, and there was only one way of doing so with honour. Four years after the death of Körner she married Mr. Arnetti, one of the directors of the Imperial Museum, an amiable man, considerably older than herself, and with whom she lived happily. Before I left Vienna she presented me with a book which Körner had given her, containing his autograph and the dramas he had written for her—'Die Töni,' 'der Grune Domino,' and others. I exclaimed thoughtlessly, 'O how can you part with it?' and she replied, with a sweet seriousness, 'When I married a worthy man who loved me and trusted me, I thought there could be no wavering of the heart between past recollections and present duties: I put this and all other objects, connected with that first period of my life, entirely away, and I have never looked back since. I believe me, even now, it is better in your hands than in mine.' And mine it shall never leave."

FASHIONABLE TOURISTS IN AMERICA.

All the world, at least the world of fashion, has visited the continent of Europe. The guests of Paris, the gayest and most magnificent, mixed with Asiatic barbarism of Moscow and St. Petersburg, the treasures of art and classical remains of Florence and of Rome, and the glories of the Rhine, have been described and admired by every writer in every form of words; by the classic Eustace, the learned Clarke, the satirical Lady Morgan, and the pert and gossiping Mrs. Trollope. Every nook and corner of the old world has been pruned into by the insatiable curiosity of English tourists; nay, even wars and rumours of wars, will not deter some from procuring their researches in countries where they have no especial nor indeed any sort of business.

America has hitherto pretty well escaped the brilliant eyes of our fashionable contemporaries. Captain Basil Hall and Mrs. Trollope have given us their ideas of America, and Miss Martineau has also given us a politico-economic view of our transatlantic brethren; and all the time the writers have been making up their minds to a very small portion of what might be done upon so fruitful a theme.

Now that the success of the great experiment, to open a steam communication (everything that Dr. Lardner has said and written on this subject, and the fact that the United States, has rendered a voyage thither, in a moderate time and in perfect safety, a matter of almost absolute certainty, we prophesy that our fashionables will not be slow to avail themselves of the opportunity of visiting the new world, and of instructing themselves in the manners and customs of the semi-barbarous inhabitants in the manners and customs of polished society; and the unhappy people of the United States, now sunk in the grossest Zolophaeism, may, perhaps, in time, if infinite pains be taken, be raised to the level of the European nations, and polished arts of life, and as Jonathan is a go-a-head individual, we don't despair that New-York may produce its Chesterfield, Philadelphia its D'Oreay.

A little time will elapse, perhaps, when Hart shall give us a set of New-York quadrilles or a Philadelphia galliot. But before this time our missionary fashionables must make up their minds and bodies to endure the privation and hardships attendant on missionary excursions. Rome was not made in a day, and the New-Englanders cannot be expected to be converted in a single season. Our transatlantic voyagers must not be surprised or disheartened if their cosmopolitan efforts be at first met with reviling and scorn, and perhaps laughter; but virtue is its own reward, and the ignorance and the simplicity of the natives will furnish them with ample food for reflection, as well as plenty of amusement. Besides, the scenery to be met with in the States is so magnificent a scene, that even the most fastidious and the most fastidious will let a levy of our fashionable beauties, and a mixed assortment of beaux from the Club-houses, take the wings of the morning, and the state cabins of the British Queen or the Great Western, and proceed on a voyage of mercy; and, whether successful or not, they will have the heartfelt satisfaction of knowing the philanthropy of their own intentions. Moreover, we take the liberty of hinting to our dandies that the American ladies are passing fair, and that their beauty is not inferior to that of the most celebrated beauties of our ladies that no women have more privileges than American virgins. At all events, we are sure that they will receive a hearty welcome.—London Court Journal.

MILTON.

Milton!—we approach the name with reverence. The austere dignity of his personal character, no less than the sublimity of his genius, overpowers the imagination, and we feel that we are treading on holy ground. He was the purest of all the poets; set apart and dedicated, as it were, to the highest and noblest services. His morning studies, "often ere the sound of any bell awaken man to labour or devotion," remind us of his own exquisite description:

"His sleep"

Was airy, light, from pure digestion bred,

And temperate vapours bland, which 'th' only sound

Of leaves and falling rills (Aurora's fan)

Litively dispersed, and the shrill matins

Of birds on every bough."

His first occupation was studying, in the Hebrew Bible, and with his studies, music and exercise, varied and interposed, the day passed over in nobler intellectual gratification and delight. His "celestial patroness" sometimes "brought him to his ear" the strains of paradise, and he knew and felt that these were inspirations which "after times would not willingly let die." His life was a true poem, "a composition and pattern of the best and honourablest things." Educated with great care from the "laureate fraternity of poets," years and years, the steady round of study led him, as he beautifully describes it, to the shady spaces of philosophy, and chiefly to the divine volumes of Plato and Xenophon. He imbibed a portion of that delicate, romantic quality predominant in the Italian poets; but what with Dante and Petrarch was an ardent, inextinguishable passion, with Milton was but a dream of fancy—a beautiful but cold admiration of female loveliness and perfection. Hence his youth glided away amid his academic bowers, without any permanent attachments; and in after years, the robust, intellectual character of his mind, his love of fame and of his country, must have led him to look with pity and contempt upon those who could consign

"The noon of manhood to a myrtle shade."

He was unhappy in his first marriage—unhappy in his children, and his life had fallen on evil days and evil tongues. He was alone, blind, and aged, with none to meet his enemies in the gate.

I WANDERED BY THE BROOK-SIDE.

BY R. M. WILNES.

I wandered by the brook-side,
I wandered by the mill,
I could not hear the brook flow,
The noisy wheel was still.
There was no chirp of grasshopper,
No chirp of any bird—
But the beating of my own heart
Was all the sound I heard.

I sat beneath the elm-trees,
I watched the long, long shade,
And as it grew still longer,
I did not feel afraid;
For I listened for a footfall,
I listened for a word—
But the beating of my own heart
Was all the sound I heard.

He came not—the sound he came not,
The night-came on alone,
The little stars sat one by one,
Each on its golden throne;
The evening air past by my cheek,
The leaves above were stirred,—
But the beating of my own heart
Was all the sound I heard.

Fast, silent tears were flowing,
When something stood behind,
A hand was on my shoulder,
I knew its touch was kind;
It drew me nearer—nearer—
We did not speak a word,
But the breathing of our own hearts
Was all the sound we heard.

COLLECTIONS AND RECOLLECTIONS.

A SETTLER.—Captain King, an early governor of New South Wales, was waited on by a country settler for the loan of a man to assist him in shingling his house. "Come to me," said the governor, "in six weeks' time, when the harvest is over, and I will find a man for you." Accordingly at the end of the time the settler, who does not appear to have been a man of much personal industry, again presented himself. "Go into that room," said the governor, "and you will see him." After a few minutes the man returned, saying he could not find him, though he had looked all about the room—even under the table and behind the sofa. "Not find him," said Captain King. "How is that?" "Come with me," said the settler, "Then, leading him a second time into the room, he made him look into a large mirror that was over the mantelpiece. "That is the man to shingle your house," said he; "take him with you, quick, and see that he does it."

WIG.—The full-bottomed flowing wig of the reign of Louis XIV. known, at the time, as a long Duvillier, from the name of a celebrated French wig-maker, was the invention of a French courtier to conceal some deformity in the shoulders of the Dauphin. It was introduced into England soon after the Reformation. A wig of this sort was an expensive part of dress; we are told that Steele's dress wig cost fifty pounds. It appears from a note in Hawkin's "History of Music," that it was common, in the beginning of the last century, for gentlemen to comb their wigs even in public places, and that they carried their combs in their pockets to display this act of gallantry.

PERSEVERANCE.—If a seaman should put about every time he encounters a head wind, he would never make a voyage. So he who permits himself to be baffled by adverse circumstances, will never make headway in the voyage of life. A sailor uses every wind to propel his vessel; so, should the young man learn to trim his sails and guide his bark, that every adverse gale should fill his belaying canvas and send it forward on its onward course.

REFLECTION.—Charlotte, a gentleman to his daughter one day, you are really too giddy, and I fear never give yourself time for reflection. "Pon honour, then, pa," replied the young lady, laughing. "you may make yourself perfectly easy on that account, for I generally spend half the day at the looking-glass."

NOSES.—The Russian minister to the United States, is called Somonoff, (say my nose off). An attack of the same lague in Washington, Blownozoff, (blow my nose off). Besides which, we have Col. Kumanoff, of the imperial guard, (cut my nose off). Marshal Polmanoff, (pull my nose off). General Nosobegun, (nose begone), and many others.

SINGULAR NOTICE.—The following notice was once posted up on the estate of a noble marquis in Kent:—Notice is hereby given, that the marquis of Camden (on account of the backwardness of the harvest) will not shoot himself nor any of his tenants till the sixteenth of September.

MUSICAL TASTE.—At a trial of skill in singing, between the cuckoo and the nightingale, the ass was chosen an umpire. After each had done his best, the sagacious ass declared that the nightingale sung extremely well; but for a good plan of song, the cuckoo was far his superior.

SIDEWALKS IN PARIS.—A gentleman recently writing from Paris says, "In the best streets in this city they have lately got sidewalks, and the folks are mightily pleased with them." They are certainly very handy conveniences about a city.

A GOOD YEOMAN.—He improveth his land to a double value by his good husbandry. Some grounds that wept with water or frowned with thorns, by draining the soil, and clearing the other, he maketh both to laugh and sing with corn.

VARIETY OF THE NEWS.—One of the cheap periodicals gravely informs its readers, that Toulouse is a large town—containing about sixty thousand inhabitants built entirely of brick.

JOSEPH GILLON.—Writer to the Signet, was an early friend of Sir Walter Scott, and a man of genuine honour. Calling on him one day in his writing-office, Scott said, "Why, Joseph, this place is as hot as an oven." "Well," quoth Gillon, "and is it not here that I make my bread?"

TRANQUILITY OF MIND.—A prevailing tranquillity is generally the characteristic of the first order of minds, as restlessness is of the second.

How to introduce a pas de deux into a new piece.—"I must have a dance of some kind, you know," said Mr. Polir to Nickleby. "You'll have to introduce one for the phenomenon, so you'd better make it a pas de deux, and save time." "There's nothing easier than that," said Mr. Lenville, observing the disturbed looks of the young dramatist. "Upon my word, I don't see how it's to be done," rejoined Nicholas. "Why, isn't it obvious?" reasoned Mr. Lenville. "Gadooks, who can help seeing the way to do it?—even astonish me! You get the distressed lady, and the little child, and the attached servant, into the poor lodgings, don't you? Well, look here. The distressed lady sinks into a chair, and buries her face in her pocket handkerchief. 'What makes you weep, mamma?' says the child. 'Don't weep, mamma, or you'll make me weep too!' 'And me,' says the faithful servant, rubbing his eyes with his arm. 'What can we do to raise your spirits, dear mamma?' says the little child. 'Ay, what can we do?' says the faithful servant. 'Oh, Pierre,' says the distressed lady, 'would that I could shake off these painful thoughts!' 'Try, ma'am, try,' says the faithful servant; 'rouse yourself, ma'am; be amused.' 'I will,' says the lady, 'I will learn to suffer with fortitude. Do you remember that dance, my honest friend, which, in happier days, you practised with this sweet angel? It never failed to calm my spirits then. Oh! let me see it once again before I die!' 'There it is—cue for the band, before I die—and off they go. That's the regular thing, isn't it, Tummy?' 'That's it,' replied Mr. Polir. 'The distressed lady, overpowered by old recollections, faints at the end of the dance, and you close in with a picture.'"

ESTIMATION OF THE MARINER'S COMPASS IN CHINA.—All the junks which are employed on the ocean carry the mariner's compass, although it does not appear to give the Chinese navigators confidence, as they never, if they can avoid it, steer boldly out to sea, but keep as much as possible within sight of land. The Chinese consider that they were the inventors of this inestimable little instrument, and it cannot be denied that they have had it in use for many centuries. According to Klaproth, the knowledge of this instrument was communicated to the Arabs by the Chinese, and introduced into Europe by the crusades. However much they may fail to rely on its virtues, they appear to be sufficiently aware of its powers. It is considered as a deity, and they treat it as such, and the others, with great ceremonial. Pieces of scented gossamer are kept constantly burning around it, as in the gossamer; while sacrifices of the youngest flesh and the finest fruits are offered to it. Here, ignorance appears to be the parent of superstition; but it is to be hoped that a knowledge of the laws of nature may open their eyes to the wisdom and excellence of the works of the Creator.—Fan-Qu in China, by C. J. Downing, Esq.

HATED OF THE SPANIARDS FOR THE FRENCH.—"I thought at once to have known you were no braggart gacacho," said the landlord, by your not making a noise on entering the house, calling for everything, and abusing everybody. How do you think one of these gentry, who came into Spain as friends, to tranquillize the country, behaved to the alcaldes? The Frenchman wanted a billet, and finding the office shut, went to the alcalde's house for it. The alcalde was at dinner, with a couple of friends; he begged the officer to be seated, saying he would send for the escribano and have a billet made out for him. "And am I to keep waiting for your clerk?" said the Frenchman; "a pretty joke, indeed." He will be here in an instant," said the alcalde; "pray have a little patience, and be seated." "Patience, indeed!" exclaimed the other, "make the billet out directly yourself, or I'll pull the house about your ears!" "Justice! senior," replied the mayor; "do you not see that I am at dinner?" "What are you at now," said the Frenchman; and laying hold of one corner of the table-cloth, he drew it, plates, dishes, glasses, and everything, off the table. This is the way your French friends behave to us!"—Scott's Ronda and Granada.

TAKE CARE OF THE PAINT.—"We were highly diverted last night to see a loafer, who had got his Christmas load on a little earlier than common, staggering along as though the street was altogether too narrow for his particular style of walking. He finally 'slipped'; against the side of a house, which had been newly painted, his shoulder coming in contact first, and his left hand, as a stay, hitting next with a force which would have nearly upset an omnibus. Shoving himself clear for a vigorous effort, and taking one of those circles, which none but a drunken man can do, before he finally brought up all standing, he took one glimpse at his shoulder, another at the house, and a third at his head, and exclaimed, 'Well, that's a careless trick, in whoever painted that house; to leave it standing out all night for people to run against!'"

THE DINER-OUT.—The diner-out must have a most passionate love for children. He must so comport himself that when his name shall be announced, every child in the mansion shall set up a yell—a scream of rapture—shall rush to him—pull his coat-tail—climb on his back—twist their fingers in his hair—snatch his watch from his pocket; and, while they rend his super-Saxony—load his shoulders—uncurl his wig—and threaten instant destruction to his repeater, the diner-out must stifle the agony at his heart and his pocket, and to the freely expressed fears of the mamma, that the "children are troublesome," the diner-out must call into every corner of his face a look of the most archaic height, and with a very chuckle assure the anxious parent that "the little rogues are charming!"

POUNCEING A JUSTICE.—Lord Hinchbrooke, the Cynic of the "Tailor," was a gay and dissipated nobleman of Queen Anne's reign. The following anecdote of him, we are assured by contemporary writers, is true. An old Justice in Westminster had committed him to the roundhouse for a drunken frolic, and obliged him to pay for some windows which he had broken on the occasion. Soon after his lordship knocked up the justice at midnight, alleging business of importance, which could not admit of delay. The magistrate made his appearance, after some time, in his furrow gown and double night-cap; when his lordship told him that he had had the misfortune that evening to tear his ruffe, and had only called on his honour to borrow a pin.

VIRTUE WITHOUT FEAR.—When, upon mature deliberation, you are persuaded a thing is fit to be done, do it boldly; and do not affect privacy in it, or concern yourself at all what uncertain censures or reflections the world will pass upon it. For if the thing be not just and innocent, it ought not to be attempted at all, though never so secretly; and if it be, you do very foolishly of those who will themselves do ill, in censuring and condemning what you do well.—Epictetus.

GOOD.—The mistakes of a layman are like the errors of a pocket watch, which affects only an individual; but when a clergyman errs, it is like the town clock going wrong—he misleads a multitude.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

SHE'S LAID IN THE EARTH!

Original.

SHE'S laid in the earth! but her bright spirit soars
To the regions of bliss, from these sorrowful shores;
She moved, in her beauty, an angel while here,
And I saw she was form'd for a happier sphere.

Oh, sad are the sighs for her absence I heave,
And sad are my tears—though 'tis fruitless to grieve;
Yet oft, through the dark mists of sorrow, I see
In fancy, my Mary still smiling on me!

Wherever I go, there's no object I trace
Can tear from my mind her loved form or her face;
Nor time can my soul in forgetfulness steep;
Her dream-wafted image still smiles on my sleep.

In nights calm and clear, 'mid the bright orbs I try
To trace her bluest home in the beautiful sky;
And I gaze on some star, till in fancy I see
Her far-shining spirit still smiling on me!

L. L. T.

TOPICS FOR THOUGHT.

Harrowing a thing as it is to behold a fellow-creature walking to his own grave in the full enjoyment of health and faculty, plunging with full consciousness into a state of existence the nature of which is to a mystery, there was something scarcely less painful in considering the motives of many of whom this mournful exhibition of man in his worst point of view was attended. We allude to the numbers of respectably dressed females, who seemed collected there for the purpose of beholding some pleasurable sight. Reflecting that in the old country no females attend such spectacles except those of totally depraved and vicious habits, that the delicacy and sensibility of the sex can neither delight in such scenes, nor be thereby improved, we feel bound to call upon their fathers, brothers, or husbands, as the case may be, to prevent their appearance in a place which ought not to yield them either delight or profit, and where they can expect no other feeling than those of bitter disgust at their want of moral decency.—Niagara Chronicle.

The barbarities and desperate outrages of the so-called Christian race, throughout every region of the world, and upon every people that they have been able to subdue, are not to be paralleled by those of any other race, however fierce, and however taught, and however reckless of mercy and of shame in any age of the earth.—Honett's Colonization and Christianity.

The glowworm possesses the curious property of causing its light to cease at will. Dr. Burmeister mentions the curious fact, that while catching some of the flying species in his hat, they would suddenly and entirely ceased to shine, that he has fancied that they must have escaped. When disturbed these insects emit a bright but frequently interrupted light; and when laid upon their backs they shine without intermission, in consequence of the continual motion in the endeavours of the insect to regain its position.—Westwood's Classification of Insects.

Reserve is generally the consequence of ill health, or grief of some kind, which makes people low-spirited, timid, and suspicious. Travelling or free locomotion has generally the effect of setting the blood in healthy flow, and dissipating mental as well as bodily impurities.

The torrent and the blast can mar the loveliest scenes in nature. War, with his ruthless hand, may rival the elements in their work of destruction; but it is passion alone that can lay waste the human heart; the whirlwind and the flood have duration in their existence, and have bounds for their fury, the earth recovers from the devastation of the conflict, with a fertility that seems enriched by the blood of its victims; but there are feelings that no human agency can limit, and mental wounds which are beyond the art of man to heal.—Cooper.

It is the unfortunate tendency of literary habits to enchain the studios of the seclusion of the closet, and to render them more conversant with the philosophy and erudition of bygone times, than with the sentiments and feelings of their fellow-men.—Madden.

Friendship, the wine of life, is should, like a well-stocked cellar, be continually renewed; and it is consolatory to think that although we can seldom add what will equal the generous first growth of our youth, yet friendship becomes immensely old in much less time than is commonly imagined, and not many years are required to make it mellow and pleasant, warmth will no doubt make a very considerable difference; men of affectionate temper and bright fancy, will coalesce a great deal sooner than those who are dull and cold.—Baswell.

Lady-Day, or Day of the Blessed Virgin, of the Roman Catholics, was heretofore dedicated to Cybele. "It was called Hilaria," says Macrobius, "on account of the joy occasioned by the arrival of the equinox, when the light was about to exceed the darkness of darkness;" and from the same author, as well as from Lampridius, it appears that it was a festival of the Mater Deum. Moreover, in a Greek Commentary upon Dionysius, cited by Dempster, in his Roman Antiquities, it is asserted, "that the Hilaria was a festival in honour of the mother of the gods, which was proper to the Romans."

Never to hear patiently of evil, nor speak that which is mischievous and wicked; to utter no lies, prevarications, or hypocrisy; to use no deceit nor over-reaching in trade or dealing; never oppressing the weak and humble, nor offer violence to your neighbour; to keep your hands from pilfering and theft; and in no way to injury a fellow-creature.—Brahminical Books.

Women should be acquainted that no beauty has any charms but the inward one of the mind, and that a gracefulness in the manners is much more engaging than that of their persons; that meekness and modesty are the true and lasting ornaments; for she that has these, is qualified as the ought to be for the management of a family, for the educating her children, for an affection for her husband, and submitting to a prudent way of living. These only are the charms that render wives amiable, and give them the best title to our respect.—Epictetus.

The Abbé Maury, who had rendered himself obnoxious to the democrats, during the French revolution, was one night seized by the mob, who looked around for a lamp-post to suspend him. "Pray, my good friends," said the abbé, "were you to hang me to that lamp-post, do you think that you would see any the clearer for it?" This well-timed wit softened the rabble and saved his life.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LOVE FILLS A BLISSFUL MEASURE.

Love fills a blissful measure,
But ah! before we sip,
The urchin, for his pleasure,
May snatch it from the lip:
Not smiles alone have power
On buds that passion rears;
They seek both sun and shower,
And love sends smiles and tears.

Though love's a tyrant ever,
His reign is in the heart;
Whose strings we'd sooner sever
Than lose the pleasing smart:
We love through life's commotion,
And oft, 'mid doubts and fears,
(Like beauty from the ocean)
Our bliss is born of tears.

When fortune's storms are sweeping,
And moon-like friendship's light
Shines coldly on our weeping,
Nor hasts through sorrow's night:
When dove-like peace flies from us,
Till o'er our cloudy fears,
Love builds his bow of promise
Above the flood of tears!

L. L. T.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF REAL LIFE.

MR. BEVERLEY LEE.

OR, THE DAYS OF THE SHIN-PLASTERS.

"Who's in or out, who moves the grand machine,
Nor stir my curiosity nor spleen.
Secrets of state no more I wish to know
Than secret movements of a puppet show;
Let but the puppet move, I've my desire,
Unseen the hand which guides the master wire."—Churchill.

"The benefits he sow'd in me, met not Unthankful ground, but yielded him his own
With fair increase; and still, I glory in it."—Mozzinger.

"The dearest friend to me, the kindest man,
The best conditioned and unweary'd spirit
In doing courtesies."—Shakespeare.

WALL-STREET was in commotion. The pavements of that busy, bustling mart were crowded with brokers, bank-directors, merchants, speculators, politicians, editors, and all the other representatives of the commercial metropolis. Care and anxiety were written on every countenance. It was a time of unusual embarrassment. Commerce, trade, and all the resources of the country were paralyzed. Discontent and murmurings were heard in every quarter. There was a panic.

"General Jackson has destroyed the country!" said one.

"Mr. Biddle has curtailed our discounts!" said another.

"All confidence is lost!" said a third.

"And every merchant in New-York must fail!" said a fourth.

"We are on the eve of a revolution!" ejaculated a patriotic little stock-jobber, the chairman of a ward meeting; "and if we don't do away with the government, the government will do away with us; therefore, I say, down with the government!"

"Down with the bank!" responded an administration worthy near him, with equal fervour and patriotism.

"Neither the government nor the bank are answerable for the present condition of things," said a meddling little secretary of an insurance company, who stepped in as mediator between the contending parties.

"To what is it owing, then?" asked they.

"To the great fire of the sixteenth of December, which destroyed one section of our city and twenty millions of property."

"Not at all," said the editor of a political journal, who was supposed to know everything, past, present and to come. "Our calamities are owing to the enormous speculations which have taken place in real estate. We needed a check of some sort. We were buying lots in the moon and laying out lithographic cities in the stars, and the consequence is a revolution unparalleled in our annals."

The conversation was here interrupted by the news that some twenty new bankruptcies had occurred among the oldest mercantile houses in the city; that one bank had stopped payment, and that a run had been commenced on the others. All was confusion and dismay. Individuals were seen hurrying to and fro with bags of coin upon their shoulders, of which they had just been draining the banks. Idle rumours were everywhere circulated.

The president of one of the banks had committed suicide, and others had absconded with the moneys committed to their trust. Mobs were forming to lay waste all the monied institutions of the city, and to tumble the buildings about the ears of their officers. The mayor had called out the military to preserve the public peace. The police patrolled the streets by day, and the watch was doubled by night. The citizens of New-York were in dread of fire and the sword.

The hour of three, p. m., when all business ordinarily ceases in Wall-street, at length arrived. The omnibuses, those most convenient things in the world, (only when you want them, particularly on rainy days, they are either full or going the wrong way,) rumbled over the pavements. The multitude began to scatter; but, long after the money depositories were closed, might be seen lingering around the bulletins of the newspaper-offices knots of anxious, discontented spirits, talking over the events of the day and anticipating the horrors of the morrow.

It was in one of these little assemblies that Mr. Beverley Lee, a handsome, fashionable, light-hearted young fellow, a contributor to the periodicals and an author of no mean celebrity, became a participant in the all-engrossing conversations of the times. Mivins, an opulent, influential broker, who was accounted "a good man" on 'change, and proudly denominated in that vicinity "a bear," took him by the button, and pointing out the ruins of a building that had fallen to the ground not long before, said—

"That, sir, is now all that remains of those who were nick-named the Rothschilds of this country."

"I am sorry for their misfortunes," said Lee.

"Sorry!" rejoined the broker, "if my wish could have been realized, not only they, but all the Jews in New-York should be buried in the ruins."

"Why so?" said Belmont, a calm, dignified, silvery-haired, feeble old gentleman, who stood next to Lee, and who had been listening to their discourse without taking any part in it.

"Because," said Mivins, raising his voice and clenching his hand with strong emotion, "in my opinion, it's a part of the religious creed of a Jew to cheat a Christian."

"The Christian religion did not teach you that precept," said Belmont, mildly, a slight flush passing over his fine countenance as he turned upon his heel to depart.

"Stop, sir," said Mivins, placing his hand upon the old gentleman's shoulder and detaining him, "if you mean anything by what you have just said, you mean to insult me, and thus I resent it," added he, furiously, spitting upon his garments.

Belmont instantly rushed upon his assailant, and Lee, perceiving his danger, flung himself between the parties just in time to receive the blow aimed at his new acquaintance full upon his own stalwart bosom. A scuffle ensued; but the parties were soon separated. Not, however, until cards had been exchanged and the residence of each individual ascertained. That evening Mivins was waited upon with a card, and a meeting appointed for the morning. "Lee did not refuse to meet until late that night," his mind was filled with contending emotions. It was the first time his person had ever been profaned by a blow, and he was on the eve of washing out the stain upon his honour with his blood. Of all characters on earth, he detested that of a duellist most; but he was young, ardent, and full of those false notions of honour which have deprived the world of some of its brightest ornaments. The few hours that were left him before the meeting, were employed in making his testament and in writing to one who was dearer to him than life. To her he enclosed a lock of his hair; and a tear fell upon its glossy brightness at the thought that they might never meet again.

At the break of day, which was cold, comfortable and misty, two small boats were seen shooting across the Hudson river towards the Jersey shore. They arrived at nearly the same time. Lee and Mivins stood upon the bloodstained spot where Hamilton fell. As the parties were about taking their stations, they were interrupted by the sudden appearance of the venerable Belmont, who had been the innocent cause of their meeting. Approaching Lee he said—

"Young man, this quarrel is mine;" and, turning to Mivins, he continued, "from you, sir, I expect atonement for the affront you put on me yesterday."

"I came here," replied Mivins, "to fight, not to talk. Finding myself in the wrong, however, I am willing to make such atonement as is in my power. Of you, sir, I ask pardon for what was done in a moment of excitement, and which, I hope, your generosity will forgive."

Mr. Belmont received his apology, and they approached Mr. Lee, who stood pistol in hand waiting the result of their conversation.

"Mr. Lee," said the broker, "if a voluntary apology will be accepted by you for an insult which I certainly never intended, I am prepared to make one."

"Proceed, sir," said Lee.

"The blow, sir, was not directed at you," but at this gentleman. I sincerely regret what has happened, and as an evidence of my conviction that I was to blame, allow me to state in the presence of these gentlemen, that had not this interruption taken place, I intended to have received your fire unretarded; and, if I were living, to have made the concessions which I now freely tender."

Lee took the broker's proffered hand and they all returned to the boat of Mr. Belmont. When they were seated, Belmont said to Mr. Lee—

"You, sir, have done me a service, and I have registered it, 'where every day I'll turn the leaf to read it.' Like the Indian missionary, 'injuries I write on sand, but benefits upon marble.'"

Lee did not reply, but there was something in Mr. Belmont's tone and manner that strangely interested him, and he returned the pressure of his hand with all the warmth of glowing friendship.

But little of moment occurred on the water except meeting, when about half way across, a mysterious-looking craft running full of a schooner in the mist, which it was afterwards ascertained contained the burly person of old Hays and a posse of police-officers, making their way to the scene of action; but, as usual, these worthies were too late to prevent the violation of the law or a breach of the peace.

After the veritable events, which, like faithful chroniclers we have just recorded, a scene of confusion took place in the city of New-York which baffles all description. The banks suspended specie payments; gold and silver were at a high premium. The town was inundated with a species of small paper currency, issued by every individual wishing to make money, specimens of which have been preserved as curiosities to the present day. These were small pieces of paste-board commonly called "shin-plasters," having printed thereon in Roman capitals, "good for six and a quarter cents," or any other sum which seemed good to the person issuing the same, and having his own christian and surname legibly written in the right hand corner of the paper. These circulated as freely among the community as omnibus tickets or bank notes, and possessed really about as much intrinsic value.

The term shin-plaster originated with an old soldier of the revolutionary war, who, after fighting the battles of his country, was left to poverty and want by a government, who paid him for his services in what was commonly denominated, "continental money," which, after the peace, it refused to redeem. This old soldier had received a wound upon the leg at the battle of "Bunker Hill," and believing that the money was printed upon paper of an adhesive quality, and knowing it to be good for nothing else, he was in the habit of dressing his wound with the rags, and calling them "shin-plasters;" hence the name, which will always stick to them to the end of the world.

The city, as we said, was in commotion. The inhabitants scorned beside themselves. Every one appeared to be acting a part in the great comedy of the "Road to Ruin." The example set by the merchant was followed by all other classes. Stopping payment was universal. All business was at a stand still. Men assembled in clusters on the corners of the streets. Argument ran high, and the everlasting words of General Jackson—Tammany Hall—The Monster—Bribery and Corruption—Nick Biddle—Veto—Pewter Mug—Ruin—Loco-Foco—Real Estate—Henry Clay—The People—Fanny Wright—and other villanous compounds, were dinned into the ears of all who would listen to them. Enormous hand-bills were posted about the city, calling public-meetings in the Park. Committees of ten thousand were appointed to go to Washington and Albany. Processions of tatterdemalions moved through the streets with bands of music and colours flying. Those who had notes to pay were shining it to borrow the money. If they succeeded, the notes were paid; if not, they were laid over, and nothing more was thought of the matter. Men of all professions, callings, and occupations, were idle, except the notaries, who fattened on the distresses of all around them, and were busy from the time the banks closed until late in the evening, protesting the notes of all unfortunate makers of the same who were unable to cancel them as they had promised.

Woful were the misgivings of the merchants; woful were the forebodings of the mechanic; and woful were the apprehensions and countenances of all misguided victims who had speculated in building lots and lithographic cities!

Mr. Beverley Lee, we are sorry to say, was one of this latter class. On his leaving college, he came into possession of fifty thousand dollars. Being an embryo author, whose craft taught him to build castles in the air—a man of fancy—young, ardent, and inexperienced, and hearing what immense fortunes had been amassed by speculating in lots, in an evil hour he attended a sale of real estate at the "Merchants' Exchange."

He bought lots on the Avenues—he bought lots at Harlem—he bought lots at New-Brighton—he bought lots at Skanetates—he bought lots at Jamaica—he bought lots at Buffalo—he bought lots at Cahawba—he bought lots at Texas—and, in short, he bought lots all over. He had building lots, and water lots, and all sorts of lots. He was the owner of towns, villages and counties.

To obtain these invaluable privileges, he had paid every farthing of his fifty thousand dollars, had given his notes for several hundred thousands, and mortgaged his estate to an unimaginable amount.

He was a great landholder—one of the lords of the soil. His word was good on 'change. Bank directors took their hats off to him. Dealers in fancy stocks greeted him with smiles; and Mr. Beverley Lee was a man estimated to be worth millions of dollars. While this delusion lasted, everything went swimmingly. What the people thought of Mr. Beverley Lee, Mr. Beverley Lee thought of himself. It was an exceedingly agreeable thing to be rich—very rich, enormously rich, and to become so too all of a sudden, and without the least exertion. Mr. Beverley Lee purchased a town-house, a country-house, a villa on the banks of the Hudson, and he embellished his mansions with gorgeous furniture. He gave entertainments to his friends, and regaled them with costliest viands. He rolled in riches. It was pleasant—very.

Time, however, that rigid schoolmaster, taught Mr. Beverley Lee a lesson, which it would have been better for him had he sooner learned. He knew he had become suddenly rich, but it never occurred to him that he might become suddenly poor. True, he had read that riches take to themselves wings and fly away; but he had read that passage as applicable to other men, not to himself. When the veto came, he opened his eyes, and began to look about him. He feared there would be a storm, but he did not look for a tornado. First came the assessors, and demanded of him a thumping sum of money for opening streets and improving his property. This Mr. Beverley Lee paid, thinking it very kind in them to take such good care of his interests, considering he had not the honour of their acquaintance. Next came the tax-gatherers, with large demands, which Mr. Beverley Lee cancelled with rather a sorry grace. Then came the holders of mortgages for their interest, which drained Mr. Beverley Lee of his last shilling, and he was obliged to have recourse to the banks for a new discount to keep up appearances.

This he readily obtained, and things went on very well with Mr. Beverley Lee, until the banks were compelled to deny him further favours. Then his difficulties began to thicken. The notes he had given for his property fell due one after the other, and were protested. In walked the auctioneer, and began to knock down his beautiful furniture, his library, his racing-stud, his country-house, his town-house, and everything that was his, real or imaginary. His lots, building and water, reverted to their original owners; and Mr. Beverley Lee, was, in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-six, obliged to "saddle" out of Wall-street as "lame a duck" as was ever hatched in that nest of disappointment and speculation.

In an elegantly finished mansion near the Battery, about a year after the events just related, a family were seated round the evening fireside. Emily Withers was reclining on an ottoman, listening to the conversation of her parents and Mr. Lawrence Payne, a young attorney of small practice, but large expectations, who professed a great regard for the Withers in general, and the young lady in particular, who had on several occasions given him the most unequivocal proofs of her utter aversion. He, however, was not easily discouraged, and continued his visits, in the hopes of one day possessing not only the heart, but what was of more consequence to him, the fortune of the lady.

Emily was a lovely, dark-eyed girl, and the reigning belle and beauty of the town. She was an only child, and the sole hope of her fond and doting parents. She was very beautiful, and throngs of admirers had sought her hand in vain. On her first entrance into society, she was a light-hearted, merry creature, full of mirth and good-humour; but of late and wherefore, none could tell, a sad depressing melancholy had taken possession of her thoughts; and, as she leaned her head upon her hand, which was buried in her luxuriant tresses, the most casual might observe that all was not at ease about her heart. She was listening, we said, to the conversation; and when Mr. Lee's name was mentioned, a crimson flush stole over the pearly texture of her face and bosom, which spoke more truly than words, that she listened with an interest she in vain endeavoured to conceal.

"I do not think," said Mr. Withers, "that Mr. Lee is the man you have represented him."

"I am sure he is not," said his wife; and the eyes of Emily kindled with emotion as her mother spoke.

"What!" said Payne, "did he not cheat all his creditors, and run away?"

"I have heard that his failure was owing to the fall of real estate," said Mr. Withers.

"And from whom did you hear that?" inquired Payne.

"From my friend Mivins, the broker, with whom you may recollect he had a duel, which—"

"Ended in smoke," said the attorney, with a smile, intended to convey a stronger meaning than his words expressed.

"Yet, in that affair, Mivins said he behaved like a man of the strictest honour."

"Honour!" said the attorney, emphatically; yet, at the same time, drawing out the word Iago-like, as "though there was some hidden monster in his thought."

"Yes, sir, honour. Mivins says that affair bound him to Lee for ever, and that he would endorse his honour with his life. He also declared that, when he heard of Lee's embarrassments, he would have assisted him to the utmost extent of his means, if he could have found him; but he had disappeared, and no one knew whether he had gone."

"Mivins, you know, my dear," said he to his wife, "though an impetuous, hasty man, has a noble, generous heart."

"He has, indeed, my dear," replied Mrs. Withers. During the last part of this conversation, Emily had, unperceived by any one, unfolded a small billet-doux, which contained a lock of dark glossy hair; and a liquid pearl shot into her eye as she recalled the image of him who had sent it, and read over the kind words of affection that accompanied the treasured relic. Looking up, she noticed that the eyes of the attorney were riveted upon her; she hastily concealed the note in her bosom, and turned upon him a glance of cold contempt and indignation.

"Do you know, Mr. Payne," inquired Mrs. Withers, "what became of Mr. Lee after his failure?"

"I know nothing more than I have told you," said Payne. "I could not keep the run of him. He gave me leg-bail for the last suit I brought against him, which I believe was all the bail he had to give. I wish I could catch him now."

"What for?" asked Withers.

"To lock him up."

"Why?"

"Because I never liked him."

"What offence has he given you?"

"None; but I always considered him a man of shallow parts—a self-conceited, inflated coxcomb—a bankrupt, who defrauded honest people out of their just demands, and who proved himself a coward, by running away from those whom he had not the courage to face."

Emily rose from her seat, her eyes flashing fire, and her lip quivering like a rose-leaf in a storm.

"Silence, sir! I wonder you do not blush to slander the innocent in their absence. I am ashamed to have remained here so long to hear him abused. 'A man of shallow parts!' If you possessed but a moiety of his mind, you might be a gentleman. 'A coward,' sir! It would be more than your peripatetic soul is worth, to breathe that in his presence. O shame upon you, to make his misfortunes your triumph! I'll not hear you, sir," continued Emily, as the crest-fallen attorney began to reply. "You have slandered the absent, and insulted those present; and I wonder my parents have listened to you so long." As she spoke these words, she quitted the apartment, leaving her father and mother in mute astonishment, and the attorney riveted to the spot.

The feelings of Payne may be imagined. He had missed the mark at which he aimed, and wounded the heart he hoped to win. He left the house shortly afterwards unken in his own estimation, and seriously meditating a jaunt to Texas.

On the following afternoon, just before the hour of five, the wharf at the foot of Courtland-street was thronged with people of all descriptions, making their way out of the city. It was near the hour for the departure of the steamboats, and consequently carts, carriages and omnibuses—men, women, and children—wheelbarrows, porters, carriers and news-boys, were crowded together promiscuously.

"Here's the Courier and Enquirer, sir."

"Here's the Star, sir; buy the good old major, sir, for a trifle."

"Three Americans for expense, sir."

"Sun, Transcript, Herald, and New Era."

"Baggage for West-Point, sir."

"That's your handbox, ma'am, which the porter smashed. I'll take care of it for you, ma'am."

"Do, Peter, that's a good lad."

"All ashore that's going."

"Haul in the plank."

"Whiz—whiz—whiz."

"Let go that line—haul in."

And away dashed the North America, like a foaming steed let loose, boldly and gallantly, out into the sparkling river.

Ding-a-ling-a-ling—"All those as has not settled their fare, step to the captain's office and do it there." Ding-a-ling.

And, by the time the passage is paid and the luggage recovered, the passengers find themselves splashing and dashing beneath the Palatides, some miles on their way to Albany.

The departure of the steamboats from the city, on a clear summer's afternoon, is a beautiful sight. They all leave at the same hour, and they shoot from the innumerable piers into the glassy stream in such numbers, that one would think half the population were slipping away, and wonder how it is they are not missed from the metropolis.

Among those on board the North America, were Mr. and Mrs. Withers and their lovely daughter, who had just commenced the fashionable tour of the season. But their presence was forgotten or unnoticed, in the circulation of a report which spread like a panic among the passengers, that a notorious individual, of whom everybody had heard, but whom nobody had seen, was on board. This person had made more noise in the city of New-York, than any one who had lived since the abdication of Peter Stuyvesant. He of the Iron-mask—the author of Junius—the Great Unknown—had not excited more curiosity in their day and generation, than the mysterious being of whom we are now writing. To that strange character had been attributed all the manifold disasters of the country: the hard times—the suspension of specie payments—the troubles of abolition, and every other evil that threatened the safety of the republic. He possessed a wonderful faculty for doing mischief, and what was more wonderful still, a sort of magical ubiquity, for he was here, there, and everywhere at the same time. At one moment he was in Wall-street, levelling the banks with staves and bludgeons; at another, he was assaulting the arsenal of the state, (which, by the way, it is said he captured and imprisoned the commissary-general, his son George, and Cornelius the carpenter.) He was a great "agitator," and his name struck terror to the hearts and souls of the Gothamites.

"Who could he be?" asked everybody; but nobody knew.

From what we have just said, the reader will at once perceive that "the man in the claret-coloured coat" was on board the steamer.

But where he was, or what he was, or who he was, remained as profound a mystery as the philosopher's stone.

The shades of evening thickened among the Highlands, and the dew-dropping clouds hung like misty veils over the hill-tops, concealing their beauty and shrouding them from the sight. The passengers retired to their cabins, and, notwithstanding the curiosity of all, the man in the claret-coloured coat was nowhere to be seen, although it was ascertained to a certainty that he was on board. The North America arrived in Albany before the break of day, and long ere any of the sleepers were stirring, that shadowy, invisible spirit had gone on shore and "vanished into thin air."

Some said he was on his way to Canada to join the patriots; and, for the peace of the good city of New-York, we not only hope the story is true, but that the arch-fiend in human shape may be shot there, and trouble our worthy fellow-citizens no more.

At Albany, Emily Withers and her parents took the cars for Saratoga, where we shall leave them to drink the Hygieian-waters and pass away the sultry months of summer.

Seated in a gloomy apartment in a remote part of the town, was a poor author—pale and emaciated, and just recovering from a protracted indisposition that had nearly brought him to the grave. He was completing a new work of fiction for the press of Lea and Blanchard, who, with a liberality usual with those enlightened bibliophiles, when they discover undoubted genius and unemployed talent, had paid for the work in advance, and thus prevented the author from starving while he wrote. A table, a few chairs, writing materials, the works of Shakespeare, Walter Scott and Washington Irving, were the principal articles in his room. The author's loose morning-gown, like himself, had seen better days; and his shirt-collar being unbuttoned and falling on his shoulders, disclosed a throat and head that might have furnished a study for the sculptor.

His pale features were occasionally lighted with a smile, and fire kindled in his thoughtful eye as the rich treasures of his mind were poured upon the paper. The work was finished. He laid aside the pen, and leaning his head upon his hand, communed with himself.

"My task is accomplished. The desire of my heart is at length fulfilled, and though times have sadly changed with me, and the blind goddess proven herself a fickle jade indeed, yet I feel that by industry and my pen, I may yet retrieve my sunken fortunes. Well, the past were pleasant days, but they have vanished, and with them all the hopes they inspired. Pain, penury, and disease have long exiled me from the world; but I shall return to it again, a wiser, and, I trust, a better man. O Emily, why does your bright image mingle with all my fondest recollections of by-gone times? You have forgotten me now; yet, how devotedly have I loved. Proud, passionate and wealthy, the world is all before you where to choose; and, though in the hours of my prosperity, hope flattered me with the belief that you would one day be mine, it would be presumption now. No, Emily, that golden dream is over—my heart is breaking at the thought that you never, never can be mine!"

Little knew Mr. Lee, (it was he who spoke), the heart of the faithful, trusting, doting woman. When her affections are once bestowed, she smiles at all the reverses of the world, and her love endures when all else perishes. (Woman's love is like the hardy ever-green of our own native groves, and looks as cheerful in the storms of winter as when the genial airs of spring-time play around its branches, and all the other trees of the forest dress themselves in holiday apparel, amid the melody of birds and the silvery sounds of running waters.

Our author's reverie was broken by a knock at the door of his apartment; he arose to let the intruder in, and the detested person of Lawrence Payne stood before him.

"So," said the attorney, "I have found you at last. Snug quarters these—quite out of the way of the bailiffs, eh, Mr. Lee? Well, this is much better than paying notes, interest, assessments and taxes. Everything quite comfortable and snug, I declare."

"To what," said Lee, recovering from his surprise, "am I indebted for this intrusion?"

"Intrusion! Well, I like that phraseology. No intrusion at all—not in the least. I came by order of a court of law, and here are two bailiffs with writs in their pockets for you: So you see you are wanted and must go."

"If you were not bereft of my notice, I would throw you out of the window for your impertinence," said Lee. "Solely on account of your insignificance, I let you escape!"

"Excessively glad to hear it," said Mr. Lawrence Payne, as, with an oblique movement, he made the best of his way down stairs, followed by the sheriffs and their prisoner.

On their arrival at the City-hall, Mr. Lee was astonished to learn that every judgment against him had been cancelled on the record, and that he was free from debt and at liberty. At this unexpected news, the attorney, unperceived by any one, skulked away from the Hall, and was soon in a place of concealment.

Mr. Lee was lost in amazement at this unlooked-for stroke of good fortune. He breathed more freely than he had done for months. It seemed as though a mountain of difficulty had been rolled from his mind; he was a new creature. But who was his benefactor? What generous spirit was it that stepped forward in his moment of greatest need and released him from bondage? Was it Mivins, the broker? It must be he. Lee knew no other individual in the world, capable of such an act. It was like him. It was noble.

Within the last year, a change had come over the destinies of New-York. Commerce once more spread her snowy pinions to the breeze. The hammer sounded cheerfully upon the anvil. The banks resumed the payment of specie. Confidence was restored. Talent, enterprise, and industry again received their merited reward, and bright hearts and smiling faces were everywhere to be seen. It seemed as though the wand of Prospero had been at work—such a change came over the whole community. The gay and fashionable had returned from their summer tour, and Emily Withers was once more in town, improved in health and radiant in beauty.

It was an autumn evening. A line of carriages stood in State-street and round the Battery, their lamps sparkling like fire-flicks among the trees, and illuminating the neighbourhood far and near. The house of Mr. Withers streamed with light, and was thronged with company. There was a wedding there. The guests had all arrived. Among them the venerable Belmont, who was the presiding genius of the scene.

When in England, whither he had gone, shortly after the duel mentioned in the early part of this narrative, he heard of Lee's misfortunes, and, taking the first packet, he hastened to relieve them. On his arrival in New-York, he cancelled all his responsibilities, for his wealth was inexhaustible, and settled upon Mr. Lee the fifty thousand dollars he had so thoughtlessly lost in his speculations, and had hitherto come to witness the happiness of his friend in his union with the blooming Emily.

"Why have you taken such an interest in that young man?" asked Mivins, the broker.

"He did me a service, and it is a debt of gratitude paid by a Jew to a Christian."

My story is done—"But what," asks the reader, "became of little Payne, the attorney?"

He did not go to Texas, but to Canada, to fight the battles of the patriots.

"And died there?"

"Yes, gallantly fighting by the side of THE MAN IN THE CLARET-COLOURED COAT."

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

FABLES FROM LA FONTAINE.

THE MAN AND HIS IMAGE.
To M. Duke de la Rochefoucauld.

A MAN, who had no rivals in the love
Which to himself he bore,
Esteemed his own dear beauty far above
What earth had seen before.
More than contented in his error,
He lived the foe of every mirror,
Officious fate, resolved our lover
From such an illness should recover,
Presented always to his eyes
The mute advisers which the ladies prize—
Mirrors in parlours, inns, and shops,
Mirrors the pocket-furniture of fops;
Mirrors in every lady's zone,
From which his face reflected shone.
What could our dear Narcissus do?
From haunts of men he now withdrew,
Resolved henceforth his precious shape
From every mirror should escape.
But in his forest-glen alone,
Apart from human trace,
A water-course
Of purest source,
While with unconscious gaze
He pierced its waveless face,
Reflected back his own.
Incensed with mingled rage and fright
He seeks to shun that odious sight;
But yet that mirror sheet, so clear and still,
He cannot leave, do what he will.

Ere this, my story's drift you plainly see;
From such mistake there is no mortal free.
That obstinate self-lover
The human soul doth cover;
The mirrors, folios are of others;
In which, as all are genuine brothers,
Each soul may see to life depicted
Itself with just such faults afflicted;
And by that charming, placid brook,
Needless to say, I mean your Martin Brook.

THE OAK AND THE REED.

The oak one day addressed the reed:
"To you ungenerous indeed
Hath nature been, my humble friend,
With weakness, eye, obliged to bend.
The smallest bird that fits in air
Is greater than you can bear;
The slightest wind that wreathes the lake
Your ever trembling head doth shake.
Meanwhile my towering form
Dares with the mountain top
The solar blaze to stop,
And wrestle with the storm.
What seems to you the blast of death,
To me is but a zephyr's breath.
Beneath my branches had you grown,
That spread far round your friendly bower,
Less suffering would your life have known,
Defended from the tempest's power.
Unhappily, you oftentimes show
In open air your slender form,
Along the marshes, wet and low,
That fringe the kingdom of the storm.
To you, declare I must,
Dame nature seems unjust."
Then modestly replied the reed:
"Your pity, sir, is kind indeed,
But wholly needless for my sake;
The wildest wind that ever blew
Is safe to me compared with you,—
I bend, indeed, but never break.
Thus far, I own, the hurricane
Has beat your sturdy bark in vain:
But wait the end." Just at the word,
The tempest's hollow voice was heard.
The north sent forth her fiercest child,
Dark, jagged, pitiless, and wild.
The oak, erect, endured the blow;
The reed bowed gracefully and low.
But gathering up its strength once more,
In greater fury than before,
The savage blast
O'erthrew, at last,
That proud, old, sky-encircled head,
Whose feet entwined the empire of the dead!

THE SWAN AND THE COCK.

The pleasures of a poultry-yard
Were by a swan and gosling shared.
The swan was kept there for his looks,
The thrifty gosling for the cooks—
The first, the garden's pride; the latter,
A greater favourite on the platter.
They swam the ditches, side by side,
And oft in sports aquatic vied,
Plunging, splashing, far and wide,
With rivalry ne'er satisfied.

One day the master cook,
Who'd got a drop too much,
Made in the yard a clatob,
And swan for gosling took,
In haste to cut his throat
And put him in the pot.
The bird's complaint resounded
In glorious melody;
Whereat the cook astounded,
His sad mistake to see,
Cried, "What! make soup of such musician!
Please God, I'll never set such dish on
No, no; I'll never cut a throat
That sings so sweet a note."

'Tis thus, whatever peril may alarm us,
Sweet words will never harm us.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

MANAGING A HUSBAND!

This is a branch of female education too much neglected; it ought to be taught with "French, Italian, and the use of the globes." To be sure, as Mrs. Glass most sensibly observes, "first catch your hare," and you must also first catch your husband. But we will suppose him caught—and therefore to be roasted, boiled, stewed, or jugged. All these methods of cooking have their matrimonial prototypes. The roasted husband is done to death by the fiery temper, the boiled husband dissolves in the warm water of conjugal tears, the stewed husband becomes ductile by the application of worry, and the jugged husband is fairly subdued by sauce and spice. Women have all a natural genius for having their own way; still the finest talents, like "the finest pianity in the world," require cultivation. We recommend beginning soon.

When Sir William L— was setting off on his wedding excursion, while the bride was subsiding from the pellicled lightness of white satin and blonde, into the delicate darkness of the lilac silk travelling dress, the lady's-maid rushed into his presence with a torrent, hot of tears, but of words. His favourite French valet had put out all the bandboxes that had been previously stored with all feminine ingenuity in the carriage. Of course, on the happiest day of his life, Sir William could not "hint a fault or hesitate dislike," and he therefore ordered the interesting exiles to be replaced. "Ver well, Sare William," said the prophetic gentleman's gentleman, "you let yourself be bandboxed now, you'll be bandboxed all your life!"

The prediction of the masculine Cassandra of the curving-irons was amply fulfilled. Poor Sir William! One of his guests, a gentleman whose wits might have belonged to a Leeds clothier, for they were always wool-gathering, confounded the bridal with one of those annual festivals when people cruelly give you joy of having made one step more to your grave—his sad guest, at his wedding, literally wished him many happy returns of the day! The polite admirer of the bandboxes foiled, however, one anniversary quite sufficient, without any returns.

Now, we do consider it somewhat hard "to drag at each remove" such a very perceptible chain; it might as well have been wreathed, or gilded, or even pinched. A friend of mine, Mrs. Francis Seymour, does the thing much better. We shall give a domestic dialogue in Curzon-street, by way of example to the rising generation.

"I have been at Doubiggin's this morning, my love," said Mrs. Seymour, while helping the soup; "he has two such lovely Sévre tables, portraits of Louis the Fourteenth's beauties; you must let me have them for the drawing-room, they are such loves."

"I really do wonder," exclaimed Mr. Seymour, in his most decided tone, "what can you want with anything more in the drawing-room. I am sure that it is as much as any one can do to get across the room as it is. I will have no more money spent on such trash."

"This fish is capital, the sauce is a—chef-d'œuvre," exclaimed the lady, hastening to change the discourse; "do let me recommend it."

Dinner proceeds, enlivened by a little series of delicate attentions on the part of the wife. One thing is advised; another, which she is well aware is her husband's aversion, playfully forbidden, with a "my dear Francis, you are so careless of yourself!—consider les horreurs de la digestion."

Dinner declines into dessert, and Mr. Seymour eats his walnuts, peeled.

"By no hand, as you may guess,
But that of Fairer Fair," alias Mrs. Seymour's very pretty fingers. Towards the middle of his second glass of port, he perceives that there are tears in his wife's soft blue eyes—which become actual sobbs as he progresses in the third glass.

"I see how it is, Laura; well, you shall have the tables."

"The tables!" cried the lady, with an air, as if school-boy said of ancient Gaul, quartered into three halves, of disdain, wounded feelings, and tenderness; "I have really lost all wish for them. It was of you, Francis that I was thinking. Good heavens! can you weigh a few paltry pounds against the pleasure of gratifying your wife? I see I have held my hold on your affections. What have I done? 'J, whose whole life has but one happiness, that of pleasing you!'"

We will not pursue the subject to its last conjugal close of tears and kisses; suffice it to say, that the next day the tables were sent home; not given—but only accepted as a favour!

Now this is a beautiful way of doing business. We seriously recommend its consideration as a study to our lady readers. Scolding does much, for, as the old riddle says, "anything," is what

"Many a man, who has a wife, Submits to for a quiet life."

But, fair half of the world, out of whose very remains the rose, as the eastern proverb has it, was formed at the creation—flattery, that honey of the heart, is the true art of sway. Instead of divide, our new state secret is, "flatter to reign."

FIVE FACTS.—A firm faith is the best divinity; a good life is the best philosophy; a clear conscience the best law; honesty is the best policy; and temperance the best physics.

ON THE ORIGIN OF SURNAMES.

THE surname of the ancient house of Berkeley was assumed in the reign of William the Conqueror, from Berkeley Castle, in Gloucestershire. By marriage with a lady of the house of Mowbray the noble family of the Berkeleys descend from Thomas of Brotherton, earl of Norfolk, son of King Edward I. When this prince (as we learn from Walsingham) was deprived, by death, of his only son, he bore his affliction with the patience of a wise man; but not long after being informed of the decease of his royal parent, Henry III. he yielded to such excessive grief, that the king of Sicily, with whom he then sojourned, could not refrain from expressing his surprise, on which King Edward replied, "God may send more sons, but the death of a father is irrecoverable."

Surnames of local origin had usually De or At prefixed to them. The name of Head was taken from Hythe, originally called Hede, in Kent; that of Gresley, from Gresley, in Derbyshire; Montgomery, from Montgomery, in Normandy; Temple, from the manor of Temple, in Leicestershire; Evelyn, from Evelyn, in Shropshire; Montcrieff, from the estate of Moncrieff, in Perthshire, N.B.; Egerton, from Egerton, near Malpas, Cheshire; Walpole, from Walpole, in Norfolk; Brougham, formerly De Brougham, from Brougham, in Westmoreland; Grimston, from Grimston, in Yorkshire; Peyton, from the ancient seat of the family, Peyton Hall, in Roxford, Suffolk; Markham, from Markham, in Nottinghamshire; Mostyn, originally Moston, from Mostyn, in Flintshire; Whitecourt, from Whitecourt, in Shropshire; Cochrane, from the Barony of Cochrane, in Renfrewshire, N.B.; Lowther, from Lowther, in Westmoreland; Swineburne, from Swineburne Castle, in Northumberland. The family of the Drinkwaters derive their singularly corrupted surname from Derwentwater, in Cumberland; the name of Clifford was assumed from Clifford Castle, in Herefordshire, and it is a curious fact that, through the De Clares, the illustrious family of the Cliffords may be traced from William Longespée, earl of Salisbury, son of King Henry II. by Fair Rosamond. This celebrated lady, designated Rosamond, which signifies the rose of the world; but whose real name is affirmed to have been Jane, was the daughter of Walter, feudal Baron of Clifford. Transported by her beauty and wit, Henry Plantagenet, when a youth, resolved to possess those charms which had excited the admiration of all, and, doubtless won by his fascinating deportment and exalted station, the hapless Rosamond fell a victim to his powerful allurements. Modern researchers testify that, after their mutual affection had continued several years, she retired to the nunnery of Godstow, near Oxford, where she passed the remainder of her days in penitence, and died a natural death, in or about 1177, and not by poison administered by Queen Eleanor. Her remains were interred in the choir of the said nunnery, and the nuns, regarding her benefactions, as well as those of her royal lover, to their house, "hung a silken pall over her tomb, and kept tapers constantly burning around it." But the austere Hugh, bishop of Lincoln, in a visitation at Godstow, indignant at the honours paid to her memory, ordered her bones to be removed to the common cemetery of the convent. The grateful nuns, however, again buried her remains in their church "under a fair, large gravestone, near which they erected a cross, with an inscription imploring rest for the soul of Rosamond."

MAXIMS AND REFLECTIONS.

A desire to say things which no one ever said, makes some people say things which no one ought to say. It is a beautiful saying that misery is sacred: Res est sacra miseria. Men speak more virtuously than they think or act. It may be said as truly of a knave as of a honest man, that his word is as good as his bond. It is observable, Pharaoh, tyrant and persecutor as he was, never compelled the Hebrews to forsake the religion of their fathers, and to adopt that of the Egyptians. Such improvements in persecution were reserved for Christians. Great abilities and a fawning temper seldom meet together; and they who deserve favours are not made to beg favours. An absolute prince never loves any but absolute scoundrels. Flatterers are mean and sordid as they are mischievous and odious. To them might be applied the Levitical law. "Every creeping thing is unclean, and shall be an abomination." By examining the tongue of the patient, physicians find out the diseases of the body, and philosophers the diseases of the mind. A man can make a man "honourable" and "right honourable," but he cannot make him "a man of honour." If there were no God we should have no father, but only a cruel stepmother called Nature. There is a pleasure in receiving favours from great men, when they are bestowed in a polite and generous manner; there is also a pleasure in passing through this world without any obligations to them; and this pleasure a man may enjoy without being envied for it. The works of Aristophanes show him to have been a great poet and a great rascal. Somebody said to a learned simpleton, "The Lord double your learning, and then you will be twice the fool you are now."

A ROWLAND FOR AN OLIVER.

One of the most pleasing cantatrices now belonging to the Parisian stage was a short time since on a provincial tour with her husband; when she found herself exposed to the disagreeable assiduity of a rich old Turcaret of one of the provincial towns of France. This person could devise no other means of making himself welcome to the lady than by writing her a very impertinent letter, and enclosing in it a note for five hundred francs. Feeling the insult very warmly, the lady put the note into her husband's hands, who, to avenge himself as a man of wit and good sense, wrote exactly a similar note to the wife of the old gentleman, a young woman like his own, enclosed in it the five hundred francs note, and sent it to her with all proper mystery and precaution. This lady, not less insulted in her affections than the cantatrice, gave the letter to her husband, who concealed his astonishment, and affected to treat the affair as one that had better be hushed up than made public about. His wife, however, who was not aware of the real circumstances of the case, was by no means disposed to take it so easily, and accordingly went off to the cantatrice to tell her of her husband's supposed infidelity. An examination ensued, and the result has been a legal demand of separation, corps et ens, made by the lady against the old gentleman.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

THE GUITAR.

Sing me that air he used to love so well:
But softly, sister—let its tones come stealing,
That echo wake not—gently weave the spell
To mournful melodies of the past appealing.
Nay, that's too lovely—sing in sadder strain,
Like the lone bird that 'neath night's planet holy (Methinks there's human passion in her pain)
Pours forth her soul in richest melancholy.
Ah! didst thou love—and hee was far away—
Thy heart's one thought, one life, one hope, one sorrow:
The voice had sweeter been, but far less gay,
For music pouces tones from love doll's borrow.

LORD BROUGHAM.—Among the most regular frequenters of the Zoological Gardens, on a Sunday, (proph quod) when the crowd is the greatest, was Lord Brougham. But lion, nor tiger, elephant nor ostrich, appeared to have any charms for him. He was always to be seen at one place, gazing intently on the motions of some amphibious animal, placed within one of those water-cages prepared for creatures who delight in that element. A gentleman was at length induced to attempt the discovery of the object of his lordship's anxieties. On his return, he observed, "It is all quite natural—Lord Brougham is watching the Great Seal."

THEATRICAL MISERIES.—A fine overture playing and a noisy audience. At the play, just as you are beginning to recover yourself, after a song of unequalled length and insipidity, to which the singer has added the deficiencies of taste, time and tune—to hear "encore!" "encore!" from every mouth—but your own! Stirring a pleasant party, to get early to the theatre to see a new comedy by a popular writer, and when the curtain draws up, learning from your next neighbour, that, on account of the indisposition of the principal performer, the managers have been under the necessity of substituting the Stranger or Nihil and Yario. N. B.—No money returned. A modern prologue to a modern play.

A WORD AND A ROW.—The Prince Mettemich steamer lately arrived from Trebizonde at Constantinople. Two cases of plague having declared themselves on board, strict orders were given that the crew and passengers should undergo a severe quarantine. Two Persians disregarded this order, jumped overboard and swam to the shore; they were arrested and conducted before the Cadi. "Were you," said that officer, "passengers on board the Mettemich steamer?" "Yes." "Did you break the quarantine?" "Yes." The Cadi made a sign, and the two heads were rolling at his feet.

KEEP YOUR COUNTENANCE.—A very good lady in Boston, had in her employment a young man from the country. On certain occasions he was instructed to inform any company who might ring at the door, that "Mrs. —" was not at home." One day John made this reply to an intimate friend of the lady, who shortly went away leaving a card and a promise to call again. As the card was handed to Mrs. —, she said, "John, what did you say to the lady?" "I told her you were not at home!" "Well, John, I hope you did not laugh." "Oh no, ma'am," said John, "I never laughs when I tell a lie."

A FRENCH LADY IN THE STREET.—When a French lady walks out, she always takes on one side her caniche by a string, and at the other sometimes her beau without a string. In either way she monopolizes the whole street, and you are continually getting between her and the puppy, very much to your inconvenience; for, if you offend the dog, the mistress is, of course, implacable, and you will very likely have to meet her gallant in the Forest of Bondy the next morning.

CHANGING THE TUNE.—"Run and get me an armful of wood," said a woman to her husband, one rainy day, "as you are wet and I am dry." The same plea was used for a dozen more errands. At last it was, "Get me a bucket of water, for you are wet and I am dry." The bucket of water was brought and thrown over her, the husband exclaiming, "Now do your share, for you are wet too."

A CONJUNAL COMPLIMENT.

My little wife her features raised
To heaven's night brow; and as she gazed,
"Oh! what more bright!" aloud she cries—
But she forgot her splendid eyes.
Scarcely had she spoke, the light of night
Sung out and thrilled the heavenly height:
"Oh, lovely music! what more choice?"
She cried—but she forgot her voice.

STANDING ARMY.—The largest standing army in the world is kept up by the Chinese; it amounts to one million two hundred thousand men. Russia has six hundred and sixty thousand men constantly under arms, and France three hundred and ten thousand. The army of the United Kingdom is upwards of ninety thousand.

TAKING TIME FOR IT.—A man at breakfast lately, sat a long time after the others were done. "You are a great while at breakfast," said his impatient friend. "You don't expect me to eat all that beefsteak in a moment, do you?" "Was the reply.

LOOK OUT FOR YOUR FUTURE REVENUE!—A German journal speaks of a young authoress who has distinguished herself in the literary world. She is called the Baroness de Ciolekakerstoece Pickalcken.

CHEAP.—A tradesman in the country tendered an account in which was the following item; and, considering the job, his charge was certainly moderate:—"To hanging wickets and myself, seven hours, five shillings and six-pence."

EPIGRAM.

"If nature never acts a part in vain,
Who," said an atheist, "can this fact explain?
Why in the glow-word does her power produce
So lavish lecture, for so little use?"
A plain, blunt-fellow, who by chance stood by,
Heard what he said, and made him this reply:
"Nature," quoth he, "explains her own design;
She meant to mortify all pride like thine,
When o'er an insect's tail she light she spread,
And left that darkness in a corse's head."

LUCIFER MATCHES.—A vendor of this article in England, has the following quotation from the prophets, printed on a sign-board over his door—"O! Lucifer, how art thou fallen," a penny a box.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We learn from a correspondent that the statement in a late number of the Mirror, in regard to the proposed location of the Athenaeum Library, was erroneous. The building about to be erected in Broadway, opposite to the Athenaeum Hotel, will belong to the "New-York Society Library." It will bear the name of this venerable institution, and be appropriated to its use. We agree with our correspondent, that it would be an excellent arrangement, if the smaller library could be merged in the larger. At present, New-York is far behind both Boston and Philadelphia, in the advantages it can offer to literary men, in the establishment of an extensive and well-selected library. We are indebted to our excellent neighbour, the editor of the Albion, for the loan of the Letters of the Queen of England, which appears on the last page of the present impression. Among whom quite as great curiosity exists about everything relating to Victoria as to her own ruins. We have now on our table a number of poems, addressed to her majesty by ladies of this country, and we are constantly receiving communications from various sources respecting her, which we should be pleased to publish, did not the plan of this periodical forbid it. No objection, however, can be made by any one, considering the good understanding existing between the two countries—which may a kind Providence long continue—of giving our readers the portrait of one who fills the most responsible station, and occupies a greater share of public attention than any woman living. We trust the length of the admirable sketch on our fourth and fifth pages, will not prevent any one from reading it. It is from the well-known pen of an old contributor, and will amply repay perusal.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 26, 1839.

America Vesputici.—This far descendant of the great adventurer, who gave his name to the western hemisphere, is at present in the United States. She has been an object of considerable attention and interest in society both in this city and at the South. Her object in visiting Washington is said to be to petition Congress for a township of land somewhere west, in consideration of her lineage, which is said to be indisputably established. A correspondent, who dates from the Capitol, sends us the following epigrams. It will be seen that their inspiration is drawn from the dark eyes of the Signora America. The writer, poor fellow, appears to be in a bad way, though, if report be true, his case is not a singular one:

TO AMERICA VESPUTICI.

I.
Blest was thy ancestor with deathless fame,
When to this western world he gave his name;
But far more blest, methinks, that man would be,
Fair scion! who might give his name to thee.

II.
From thy forefather, lady, I am styled
American! Proud am I of the title;
But I am not ungrateful. Would his child
Might claim my name, by way of a request!

III.
Thy great progenitor, fair maid, unfurled
His canvass to the breeze, and found a world;
But could this discovery unmake,
I'd lose a world for his descendant's sake.

IV.
They tell me thou dost ask a steed, or more,
From the vast herbage Vesputicus let us
Ah! ere thou wouldst extend thy sway, restore
The hearts of which thy beauty has bereft us! P. P. O.

Miss London.—We have too little reason, from the statement being universal, to entertain a doubt of the decease of this truly gifted and accomplished authoress in Africa, from the effects of the climate, where she accompanied her husband. Miss London, or rather Mrs. Maclean, has long been a deserved favourite with the admirers of literature, and the loss of her inimitable productions will, we fear, be unrepaid. For beauty and elegance of composition, pathos and exquisitely simplicity, her poetry is almost unprecedented among the lady-writers of the day. In private life, we believe Miss London to have been an affectionate, kind-hearted, and exemplary woman. We have been complained of for having inserted a paragraph, a short time since, reflecting upon the character of this lady, and we conceive it a fitting opportunity here to state, that we know nothing of the truth of the allusion therein contained, and also our regret at having unintentionally permitted its publication in "The Mirror." Our correspondent, in relating various particulars concerning public and notorious characters, indirectly alluded to a circumstance which, if true, should not have been mentioned; if untrue, should never have been insinuated. No doubt we shall shortly be favoured with this lady's memoirs, from her earliest infancy to the close of her too early existence. We leave to her biographer that task, and content ourselves with briefly alluding to her, in the only character in which we have known her, that of an authoress. For many years the works of L. E. L., have continued to refresh the lovers of literature with their unceasing beauty. Each publication, with those initials, could only be perused with renewed delight, and we conscientiously believe nothing ever came from her magick pen, but possessed a proportionate share of excellence. To mention all her productions would be useless here; to criticise one, unnecessary. In concluding our remarks we will say, with equal truth and sorrow, that no one's career ever ended, with whom we had no private friendship, which produced sincere regret. May L. E. L. live as green in the memories of all, as she will in ours. Peace be with her.

Phrenology.—Dr. Combe says, "If two persons with brains of the same size and shape, the one of sanguine, the other of nervous temperament, have business at a distance, the first will walk and do it personally, through love of corporeal as well as mental exertion, and the second will attend to it by sending a letter. The sanguine temperament will sooner write a mile than write a letter of three lines. The nervous will sooner write a letter of three pages, than walk across the street."

The tulip mania in Holland.—Everybody has heard of the tulip mania, which afflicted the inhabitants of Holland, about two centuries ago, and which raged with especial violence in the cities of Harlem, Amsterdam, Utrecht, Leyden, Rotterdam, etc. The complaint manifested itself in a general rage for rare and beautiful tulips. A recent writer says that many of the extravagancies, which are recorded in reference to this subject, were not prompted solely by the wish of possessing rare and curious tulips; the fact is, that the passion for flowers not unfrequently served as a mask for disguising the passion for gambling. For example, a speculator would engage, for seven millions of florins, to produce a tulip of a particular description at the expiration of a month, and the profit or loss which might ensue, either to seller or purchaser, depended on the fluctuations which might take place, during the given time, in the value of the particular species of tulip. This sort of floral stock-jobbing was carried to an inconceivable extent. It might naturally be imagined that people so passionately fond of flowers would have passed their time in gardens, watching and nursing their gay parterres—but no such thing; these Dutch tulip-fanciers carried on their speculations and concluded their bargains in the cabarets. It frequently happened that neither buyer nor seller ever saw the tulips which made or ruined their fortunes. The negotiations which preceded the development of the flowers embraced such a vast number of tulips, that not all the gardens in Holland could have produced them. The species most prized, and of which the greatest number of roots were sold, was that called Semper Augustus, a flower so rare, that it is alleged only two perfect specimens of it were ever known to exist; one of these was produced at Harlem and the other at Amsterdam.

Macready and the London penny-a-liners.—The present manager of Covent-Garden theatre will ever occupy a proud position in the history of the English drama. We rejoice to learn that his efforts to reform and elevate his art have been successful, and that his theatre is doing, what is professionally called, a "good business." Macready appears to be a conspicuous mark for the squibs and small witticisms of the London penny-a-liners. Any one, who knows the degree of license exercised by the craft, need not be told that nearly all the anecdotes fathered upon Macready, by those respectable and philosophical persons who gather small talk for the press, are utterly false, and in no respect characteristic of the man. Some of these jeux d'esprit are, however, well done, and no doubt call forth a smile from Macready himself. Take the following specimen:—"Don't you think my execution of Othello a capital performance?" "It is in my line, is it not?" asked Macready of Cooke. "Why, yes," replied the provoking punster; all executions may be considered capital performances; and your performance of Othello is certainly one of that class, for you execute him, in your line, as you call it, so effectively, that as soon as you lay hands upon him, he is no More!"

New-York Mercantile Library Association.—The annual report made to this excellent institution by its president, on the ninth instant, shows its affairs to be in a very flourishing condition. Its receipts, during the past year, amounted to eight thousand and seventy-two dollars and seventy-seven cents, all of which was disbursed, excepting one hundred and seventeen dollars and forty-five cents. The whole number of members, stockholders, etc., four thousand five hundred and twenty-seven. The library contains eighteen thousand three hundred and twenty-three volumes, two thousand four hundred and seventy-one of which were added during 1838.

To what base uses may we come.—It is proposed by a poet, one of the most distinguished members of the press of this city, that the ground on which stand the classic ruins of the Bowery theatre should be bought by the corporation, and converted into a standing-place for poultry-wagons, cabbage-carts, etc.

"Imperial Caesar, dead and turned to clay,
Might stop a hole to keep the winter away
Oh that the earth which bore the world in awe
Should patch a wall to expel the winter's flaw!"

Charitable Institution.—We understand that an association has been formed by the ladies of the ninth ward, called the Ninth Ward House of Industry, for the very laudable purpose of furnishing work to the industrious poor during the inclement seasons of the year, when provisions and fuel are generally dear, and work scarcely to be found. We commend this association to the good feeling of all who desire to see it successful in its benevolent purpose. We understand that the managers receive work.

Victoria and the fashion of hoops.—The Liverpool correspondent of the Star says:—"There is a prevalent idea that, at the Victoria full dress parties, hoops and trains will be revived. This has long been talked of. If this revival should take place, (and it appears probable,) they will be very different from what they were

"In our hot youth, when George the Third was king."

Instead of being unwieldy, heavy, articles of whalebone and buckram, such as our great grand aunts wore; they will be flexible, light and moderate sized hoops, and so arranged, that by touching a spring on each side, a lady may depress or raise her hoop at will. In a word, they will be manageable. It requires some practice and skill to manage the trains, but they are graceful, if properly managed.

Snuff-taking.—The fashion of snuff-taking is said to have been first introduced by a lady, no less a one than the celebrated Catherine de Medicis. We shall ever think better of the habit hereafter, though, gallantry asserts, we think it is the last one that should have been invented by a lady.

THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND.

NEW MUSIC.

SERIES OF NATIONAL MELODIES.—The musical reader will, we are sure, be gratified to learn that Mr. Horn has arranged, and, consequently, redeemed from neglect, another southern strain. He touches everything with the hand of a master, and each new melody from him is welcomed by the public as a valuable contribution to the lyrical stores of the country. If the composer proceeds with his task in the same spirit in which it has been commenced, the songs of the south and west will shortly be converted into musical gems for the drawing-room! "The National Melodies," commenced with "On the lake where droop'd the willow," was followed by the "Northern Refrain," and the third number of the series is now before us. The sweet and touching pathos of the melody to the following words, are not surpassed by anything we ever listened to. We predict for this simple little ballad a wide popularity. It is published by Davis and Horn, No. 411 Broadway.

MEETA.

I.
Where the ivy-vine is creeping
Green and strong;
In a cot sat Meeta weeping
All night long!
False the vows her lover plighted
As the changing moon;
And that fair one droop'd, a blighted
Rose of June!

II.
Heaven crush the wretch inhuman
Could betray
Faithful, fond, confiding woman,
Lured away
By the star of her affection,
By love's winning tone;
Leaving her without protection,
Lost and lone!

III.
Swift the lightnings flash above her!
Thunders roll!
In the tempest flies her lover,
Light of soul!
Cold his feelings—cold the weather—
Cold that faded form!—
Her heart and morning broke together
In the storm!

Several new and popular pieces of music have also been published by Millet, No. 375 Broadway.

LITERARY NOTICES.

James Mack, the deaf and dumb poet, has issued proposals for publishing a volume to be entitled, "The Romance of the Ring," with other tales and sketches in prose and verse. The work will contain about two hundred and fifty pages, neatly printed on good paper, and delivered to subscribers at one dollar per copy. James Mack is singularly gifted, and his writings, strange to say, have a more extended reputation among foreigners than his own countrymen. He is one of the wonders of the age and should be cherished. A subscription paper is left at this office, to receive the names of those persons who may feel disposed to encourage a native poet of acknowledged and extraordinary talent. In our admiration of genius abroad, we should not be unmindful of that at home.

"TALES, ILLUSTRATING THE PASSIONS:—Remorse, Jealousy, Revenge, Love, Despair, and Hatred," by James, author of "Richelieu," and other well-known novels, has been published by Lea and Blanchard, of Philadelphia; who have also issued "Elliott's Travels in the three great empires of Austria, Russia, and Turkey." These are both capital works, and are well worth perusal.

"SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER."—The January number of this ably-conducted journal is the first of a new volume, and is unusually rich in entertaining and well written papers. This is a good period for subscribers to send in their names.

"THE FAMILY VISITOR AND SILK CULTURIST"—Is the title of a weekly periodical published in this city by Dwight and Allan. It is embellished with innumerable wood-cuts, and is a pleasant work.

THE FINE ARTS.

COLEMAN'S WINDOW.—Coleman's window is among the curiosities of the city. Two prints, particularly interesting in design and perfect in execution, were exhibited a few days since. One was entitled "Wellington at Waterloo;" the other "Napoleon at Waterloo." The former painted by A. Cooper, and engraved by F. Bromley; the latter drawn by Steuben, and engraved by a lady of the name of Simmons. The duke is riding the well-remembered charger which carried him on that eventful day, the eighteenth of June, and is giving an order to an officer, who, with hat in hand, is attentively receiving it. There is that calmness portrayed on the features of his grace said to be so remarkable to him in all times of danger. Not a nerve seems shaken, but a firmness is depicted in his iron features which may be imagined, but scarcely described in the hero of Waterloo. Now look on this picture. The Emperor, "the great captain of the age," is mounted upon his snow-white Arabian, which appears from its frightened manner, to be sensible of the overthrow which its master is witnessing. Bonaparte, surrounded with the dead, dying and wounded, is gazing intently towards the conflict with lowered brow, and defeat written in every lineament of his countenance. Altogether, this beautiful engraving faithfully exhibits Napoleon beaten.

THE DRAMA.

Mrs. Bailey has been astonishing and delighting the audience of the Park in opera, assisted by Brough, and others temporarily engaged. In La Sonnambula, Cinderella, and La Gazza Ladra, Mrs. Bailey sang the music very sweetly, and made an impression so favourable as to produce a general desire to see her soon again.

Hamblin's recent engagements at the National, have been eminently successful. We should like to see Wallack also on these boards. We know that he is the manager of the theatre, for we have abundant evidence of that fact night after night; but where is Wallack, the actor? We miss him. Everybody misses him from the stage. We assure the manager, that if he would engage the actor for a few nights, it would be exceedingly gratifying to the public. By the way, we perceive that Mrs. Hardwick has left the theatre for a time, having been engaged by Mr. Abbott, of the Charleston and Augusta theatres. This actress, through some untoward circumstances, has not filled that situation in the theatre which her talents entitle her to. We are assured by one of the first musical authorities in the country, that she possesses vocal capabilities of the very highest order. We trust that on her return she will be placed in her proper position.

We perceive by Hamblin's advertisements, that he is in earnest about rebuilding the Bowery theatre. Great good-will seems to be manifested towards Hamblin on the part of the community and the press.

Flynn has also made contracts for the building of the "Chatham-street theatre." He is persevering, and we do not doubt will succeed in his enterprise.

What is to become of the Franklin theatre, when its new rival takes its stand by its side? But we will not anticipate matters. The Franklin is at present doing a good business, and we are not sorry to hear it on the manager's account, who seems to spare no exertions or expense to please his visitors.

Niblo, the persevering, indefatigable Niblo, is building in his garden a splendid Opera-house, which, when finished, will resemble the Italian Opera-house before it was converted into the National theatre. It fronts on Broadway, next door to his own dwelling, and when completed, will contain two thousand persons. This edifice will, we understand, be devoted to opera exclusively, while the Saloon will be appropriated to the performances of the Ravels, who are engaged for the coming season. Two distinct entertainments, on the same night, in the same garden, will be doing business on a large scale; but this is characteristic of Niblo, who is a "wholesale dealer." All good wishes attend him.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. Terms, FIVE DOLLARS per annum, payable, in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

G. P. Scott, Printer, corner of John and Gold-streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL, DEVOTED TO LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR. SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NUMBER ONE BARCLAY-STREET, NEXT TO THE CORNER OF BROADWAY. (PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.)

VOLUME SIXTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1839.

NUMBER THIRTY-TWO.

TALES OF EASTERN ROMANCE.

HADJEE MEER MEERZA; THE LAMB WITH THE LION'S HEART.

HADJEE MEER MEERZA—OR, as he was called among his brother shepherds, from his remarkable gentleness and courage, "The Lamb with the Lion's Heart!"—was a simple abedee, herding his flocks on the beautiful plain which spreads itself along under that famous mountain, Ararat; and a very merry and happy fellow he was, and known and loved, that pastoral country round, for his good-humoured gibes, his imperturbable gentleness, and his stout heart. He was not a native of the district where he fed his flocks, for he was born in the little village of Humamloo, which lies in the valley of the same name, on the boundary of Persia, where it meets the frontier of the gigantic realms of Russia. But, having been hired by old Abdool Alleh, (the wealthiest flock-holder of the country-region around Erivan,) in one of his journeys, as his chief shepherd, he quitted his home pleasurable valley, and followed his master and his sheep into the plains on the other side of the heights of Aberan, which separated him from his own beloved valley—his own humble home—and his old widowed mother, who still lived happily in her adopted Humamloo, surrounded by her children and their children—one member of her fold only being a straggler, the merry Meer Meerza. But as she heard from him, and heard that he did well, she was happy to let him live estranged from her, knowing that, when he had enriched himself, he would return, and bless the evening of her life with his affection: for she knew that her favourite son, Meerza, loved nothing so much in the world as his good mother, his rude home, and his brethren.

Having passed three summers in the plains, the shepherd longed again to see his native valley: and, having obtained from the good Abdool permission to depart, the old man, who loved him as his son, loaded him with gifts, and sent him rich away; and away he went upon his journey, rejoicing. One care only lay heavily on his head, but did not weigh upon his heart; for he knew that he would be as welcome at his home in Humamloo, if he brought nothing back but his good spirits and his shepherd's crook, as if he returned with the caravans of wealth which he could call his own. In passing from the plains of Erivan, he had to journey over the wild, rocky heights of Aberan—a desolate region which had long been the terror of robbers; the terrible Caussim Al Kadjer, who had defied the soldiers of the great Shah Abbas to his ruin, and who had mocked at the puny efforts of the peasantry to hunt him down: the country people, accordingly, gave him aid, and let him prey upon whom he listed; for they had grown to think him invulnerable by human hands, and that he bore a charmed life. All that the dwellers did on either side of rocky Aberan, was to warn the travellers of whom they had to meet, and how to meet them; if they loved their lives, to let him levy toll; and then they might pass safely. His strength and prowess had spread such a dread of him the country round, that it was believed no single man, nor any number of men, could overmatch him. Hadjee Meer went not away unwarned—but he heeded it nothing. He was told that it was in vain to arm himself, unless he could wield the weapon (with as mighty an arm) as the great hero of Persian story, Rostoom Beg himself. That weapon and that arm only could be the safeguard of him who had to contend with a robber of such tiger-like stealthiness, and, when that failed, and he had missed his spring upon his prey, of such terrible strength and unspeakable courage as Caussim Al Kadjer—"The Blood-lover," as he was called. Hadjee Meer laughed, however, when they sought to alarm him; for as he was young, strong, and had some conceit of his good courage, "If he was to be conquered," he said, "it should not be by fear, which slays so many, but by superior prowess." Nothing but being beaten, and that soundly, should convince him that he could be beaten. "And leave me to know when I have had enough of blows to satisfy me that I am beaten," said the stout-hearted shepherd. "A hundred blows, on body and brow, are enough for me: when I have them fairly counted down, I give up the bargain, unless a few more will decide it on both sides, and then it is as well to strike out till the affair is settled, and the bargain struck."

It was in a small caravanserai or house of entertainment for travellers, on the Persian frontier of the heights of Erivan, that Hadjee Meer had halted before he had made his ascent. The dealers in cattle, and traders in black lamb and sheep skins, and merchant-adventurers of Cashmere shawls, cloths and stuffs called variously cusshals, alekshas, tajefas, kuddukhs, cuhencars, peerahun shahes, (or king's shirts), carpets of Herat and Isfahan, velvets of Cashan and Tabreez, and other silken, woollen, and of good, rested here with him; for it was the day of Jomah, the Mohammedan sabbath, on which it is not lawful to trade, and if it can be avoided, to travel. Hadjee Meer was known to many of the merchants, who loved him for his pure simplicity of heart, his honest nature, and unenviable good humour; and as there are jokers in all countries, and matter for mirth—thank heaven!—all over the face of the earth, the Hadjee's daring journey alone over the hill of Aberan, carried their turn, and kept the mouths of the Mohammedans in a roar. Though forty sets of chaps and as many beards wagged at him, and grave Mussulmans rolled over on their carpets in uncontrollable laughter at poor Meer Meerza's foolish bravery, which one of the itinerant story-tellers of the country had taken for his theme, and was setting in all the lights of ludicrousness; and though a brace of sedately snore mullahs, or priests, and three fakiers, or mendicant fanatics, who sat at opposite corners of the divan, apart from all the travellers, could not smoke their kallecoons without spitting and spluttering as the jesting went on, in spite of their habitual gravity, poor Meer bore up good-humouredly, laughed as loud as the best, and now and then contributed his joke to swell the uproar to the highest. There was but one voice there which deprecated the unfameness of so much merriment being enjoyed at the sole expense of one. This was a brother shepherd, who knew that Meer Meerza's bravery was no empty boast; and when a cowardly Kermaneze, presuming upon his safety where more than forty beards seemed pitted against one, carried his mockery beyond a jest, by emptying his pipe ashes into a bowl of misas, which Meer Meerza was lapping up, the brother shepherd cried out to the insolent Kerman trader, "Beware, thou mocker, at whose beard thou throwest dirt! The shepherd-boy who has brained a lion in his fold at a blow, and hugged the breath out of a bear, is no plaything for such a scrapper-up of dirt as thou art, thou puny reed of a man—thou poor choubien! Beware, I say!" The Kermaneze no sooner heard these things, than, pulling his legs from under him, and rapidly working his heels against the ground, he shuffled off in his haunches, and took sanctuary with the Moolahs: at which proof of his discretion there was a burst of merriment, and afterwards much murmuring of contempt. From this moment the jesting turned from Hadjee Meer to the poor drinking trader: the Hadjee sat respected, finished his misas peace, and that despatched him up to his kitchen, and settled comfortably to a bowl of the lawful mao-ul-hyat, a spirit which the Faithful will drink till they are drunk, because it is not the forbidden—wine. The sun being now down, and the sabbath ended, enjoyment had its fill, till smoke, and opium, and lusty draughts, and, lastly, sleep came over all the travellers, and, one after another, they sunk into repose, even where they sat squatted on the floor.

At sunrise Meer Meerza waked punctually as a shepherd wakes, and shaking himself up, throwing his wallet on his back, and grasping a sturdy staff to steady his steps in the stony high places, and, if need were, to defend the little store of wealth with which he was travelling to bless his good old mother, he set forward on his day-long, dreary journey. The few who were awake when he departed bade him good cheer, and gave him "the blessing of the Prophet" for his protection. The good-humoured shepherd, laughing at their fears for him, then went his way, as light of heart and of foot as cheerfulness, youth, strength, and a good conscience could render him. And so, during the first five hours of his journey, he trudged merrily along, now breaking the silence of the solitude around him with snatches of shepherd's songs; and now pausing for a minute to gaze reverently upon the sun—admire the wideness of the scenery—pick up a mountain-flower—listen to the twittering of the passing birds, and watch their rapid flight.

Thus amused, some hours of the day passed unaccounted away, and it was noon ere he felt hungry and weary; for ere he started he had swallowed a score or two of dates, a fruit so strength-sustaining, that many an eastern traveller will journey on from sunrise to sunset and want no other food. Not so our traveller. He had a shepherd's appetite, which the fresh-mountain-air made tiger-keen. He looked around him, therefore, for a sheltered spot where he might rest awhile, and this he found—a nook among the dark-blue rocks which wildly spread the heights of Aberan, near which a little mountain rivulet ran brawling and wrangling with the impending stones. There, throwing himself on the ground, he opened his well-packed-wallet, and rummaged out some coarse but sweet bread, a flask of goat's milk, and a second flask, which he had stuffed with the hair of the same dog which had bitten him at the caravanserai. Having eaten heartily, and drunk up his goat's milk, and still feeling thirsty, he laid his lips to the mountain-stream, and drew up a long draught of its delicious waters. "Water is not so sweet as goat's milk, nor so strong as mao-ul-hyat," said the shepherd, wiping his mouth upon his rough, coarse kabba, or humble vest, "but it will do very well till they abound." And so saying, he turned to flask the second, and took a quaffing dram.

Cheerful and refreshed, he now resumed his way, and, in another hour, approached the spot which the robber was said most to haunt. It was then, and not till then, that he felt an undefinable dread—not fear, but some feeling next to him to it—gradually over him. "The air of these heights is cold," said Hadjee Meer, "or else the water, which I drink too freely, has chilled me, for I feel as if winter searched my poor kabba through!" and he shivered, and muttered "La-Allah-he-ill-Allah!" Poor Hadjee! the dread of danger, which makes cowards of the strong at heart, who yet, when danger comes, can meet it fairly, he got fast hold upon his fancy, and made his strength to tremble and his warm blood to turn water-cold. Suspense is ever more terrible than certainty. He halted a few moments, and looked around him; and, far as the eye could reach, no living thing—not even a wild bird—appeared, distant or near. Lonelyness itself is an inspirer of dread; and when the expectation of some danger is added, the heart may well shrink, if it do not faint. Again he set forward, singing a shepherd's song as he went; his song was, however, often interrupted by serious pauses of rumination: but these gave place, at last, to his old natural cheerfulness and stoutness of heart, and his singing was as loud and as light as ever. Thoughts of the robber, however, still haunted him, and he returned the more seriously the higher he mounted the steep path which wound over the hills. "The goat-path is precarious," murmured he, breathing laboriously, "and might put the stoutest lunge at a goat's gallop!" and he halted again, to recover his breath. He still deceived himself: it was apprehension, and not the steepness of the path, which made him pant and breathe so irregularly.

And now he had reached the rugged head of that hill which he had so often gazed upon with wonder at the home-door of his childhood, and being weary with the toilsome ascent, he flung himself on the ground, and once more unbuckling his wallet, drew forth a second dole of bread, swallowed it with ravenous hunger, and washed it down with a long draught at flask the second. Home being now in sight, and his body refreshed, his spirits mounted up as high again as they were low; and he laughed and was merry when he turned his eyes towards the beloved valley of Humamloo. His dread was gone: so, springing upon his feet, he set forward on his descent, and wantonly amused himself, as he went almost headlong down the heights, by striking with his staff at every stone and sturdy shrub which came in his way, till one half of it was shivered into splinters; and as often as he struck a more than common blow he cried, "By the beard of my father, thus would I beat Caussim Al Kadjer!"

He had now entered upon a dreary path, overhung with lofty pines, which darkened the ground with their thick masses of dusky foliage, and threw a solemn, shadowy dreariness around. Huge rounded pebbles made the path so sure, and giving way as he trod upon them, sometimes threw him down, to the bruising of many a bone. Giant-like blocks of porphyry-jetted overhead, on lay disorderly around, looking like the vast remains of some old mountain-altar of the Fire-Worshippers. It was a wild and melancholy scene, and he felt its awfulness creep over him. Again he rallied, and again plied his staff on the right hand and on the left, till, just as he was about half spent with his sport, at one blow so great a portion of it was broken off, that he had but three strong feet of it left in his hand. Half vexed at his folly in thus dismissing himself, he struck at a huge stone in humorous spite, and again cried aloud, "And thus would I beat the bones of Caussim Al Kadjer!"

A giant figure, which looked black as a sable bear, in the darkness made by the sycamores, started up instantly from behind the block of stone, and with a growl, which sounded more like that of a beast than the voice of man, cried, "Wouldst thou?"

"Even as I said," answered Meer Meerza, briskly, and not at all startled by the sudden interposition; but when he lifted his eyes, and beheld who it was that had spoken, his hand clutched convulsively the poor fragment of his staff, and he felt that now he had need of the original whole, and another weapon to boot, to stand up for him. For a moment he quailed, and in the next he felt assured; for the danger he had dreaded stood before him, and he had not to meet it—it was there; and he made up his mind, and strung up his strong sinews to meet it like the shepherd who, among shepherds, was known as "The Lion-hearted Lamb."

"I take no more of you much head as thou hast valiantly bestowed upon my stock and stone representatives," said Al Kadjer, with a surly sort of humour.

"Bismillah! Art thou to say how much? I never give less when I bestow a cudgelling," said the shepherd. "If thou wilt not have all, have none, in the name of the prophet!"

"How, then, shall we agree? I am unwilling to take so much. And thou art unwilling to give less—say we shall decide it thus: I will take as many blows as thou canst give me, and thou shalt take two of mine in return. Is't a bargain? If so, let us fall to, and do thou keep the reckoning. Come, I will begin! Score thou one!" And saying this, the robber set upon Hadjee Meer with a staff six feet in length, and of a thickness which made him wince to look at it. He parried the blow, however, which else would have laid him sprawling; and a second was coming, when he leaped aside, and exclaimed, "Caussim Al Kadjer!—for thou art he, and none other—giant as thou art, and terrible as thou art to men, had I but a weapon such as thine, I would make thee to keep the reckoning on thy bones! But look at my staff—it is a straw!"

"Ho! sayest thou so? None shall report of Al Kadjer that he took a fair antagonist at a venture! Here, take my staff," and he threw it to the shepherd; "for I have its brother; and, should these fall, deadlier weapons to wind up the quarrel!" and stooping behind a block of stone, he produced a staff in all respects like the other.

Hadjee Meerza unstrapped his wallet, deposited it behind a pine, and, being now fairly armed, he shifted his ground, and chose an open spot, where the stems of the trees were so far apart, that his staff might fly freely round his head: and, planting his foot firmly, awaited the assault. The next hit was again the robber's, and had the shepherd failed to ward it off, he would have bitten the dust. He then put in a blow; but, as his foot slipped in delivering it, it fell so feebly, that Caussim smiled in scorn at such boy's play, and said, "We are not a match, shepherd, for thou strikest wearily!"

"Sooth to say," replied Meer Meerza, "I am weary, for I have journeyed so far, and flung so much of my strength away upon stock and stone Al Kadjers, that now I have to deal with Al Kadjer himself. I am but as a child!"

"By the sacred mouth of the Prophet, that is honest!" I will not take advantage of thy weariness," cried Al Kadjer.

"Take it, if thou canst," cried the Hadjee, put on his mettle.

"Thou dost not fear me, then?" demanded Caussim.

"I fear nothing but weariness and blood," replied Meer Meerza.

Hearing this confidence, the robber gazed at his young antagonist, and having surveyed him from head to foot, and duly considered his bodily capabilities, he said, "What art thou?"

"A shepherd in Erivan."

"Art honest?"

"Yes, I am. I never yet stole a lamb from a neighbouring shepherd's fold."

"Ah, a glorious robber was spoiled when thou wert made a simple keeper of sheep!" cried Al Kadjer.

Meer Meerza laughed, and said, "Haply; but who shall murmur at his fate? Not I. I am content to be honest and right of heart."

"Thy name?"

"Meer Meerza, youngest son of old Allee Meerza, now with the dead, of the valley of Humamloo!"

"Bismillah! What, and art thou indeed a son of the double-jointed iron-master of the valley?"

"No other man's son. My mother said so, and my father believed her; for, as she ever respected the Prophet, she spake the words of truth."

"Allee Meerza, saidst thou? Do I live? He was a man! Bismillah! We have no men like him in these latter days! His hand was a smith's hammer! Sacred be the dust upon his grave!"

"Thou knowest my father, then?"

"By the Prophet, yes! Allee Meerza was indeed a man! He could handle sword, spear, or staff! Ere I took up his trade, he broke two of my bones in a caravanserai quarrel."

"I inherit his bones," said the Hadjee, with a significant laugh. "Sacred be his memory!" cried the robber. "And thou art journeying to thy home! And what may that wallet of thine contain?"

"Some twenty tomanas, sooth to say, which I am carrying as a tribute of piety to my poor mother, with half-a-dozen black lambskins, and four kid-skins, for her winter comforting."

"A pious son!" cried the robber, and he sighed heavily. The shepherd started at hearing a sigh from such a bosom! Caussim, after a struggle with his conscience, added, "By the head of my father, I reverence thee! Thou art a brave, and good, and pious son of double-jointed Allee! And to show thee how I love thee—" —and he was silent for a time as if his better nature was contending with his rapacious habits,—"give me a tenth portion of thy store, as tribute, and go thy ways."

"Not I!" cried the Hadjee. "What thou seest to have, thou must take it in despite of this strong arm, and this good staff!"

"Bravely said!" cried Caussim; "I love thee more and more! The poor wretches I have battled with hitherto were half-bent before a blow was struck on either side; but thou—come, thou shalt sup with me, and drink with me; and after that, if we must fight, we will fight fairly, like friends. The wager shall be for two tomanas. If I win, thou shalt count them down: if I lose, I will pay thee down the same. Follow me!"

"Have I looked upon the tomb of the Prophet, and polluted and blinded mine eyes since," demanded the Hadjee, "that thou thinkest to lure me into such a pitfall?"

"True, men of my calling," said the robber, "are to be doubted; but I mean thee fairly."

"Well, then, a match be it; but, look thou, no tricks when I have laid down my staff!" said Meer Meerza.

"Ah, if thou wilt doubt me, take both weapons into thine hands," and he threw his second staff to the shepherd: "And now, behold, I am unarmed!"

"Well," said the Hadjee, "for a robber, that looks honest! I will trust in thee!"

"Follow me, then," commanded Caussim, and the shepherd did, undoubting.

"He led him but a little way, when, coming to a rocky recess, he entered it, while Meer Meerza loitered at the door, and immediately he handed out abundance of fruits, a plentiful portion of recently-roasted kid, and, lastly, a couple of flasks of the unforbidden masu-ak-hyat. These he afterwards spread upon the ground, and invited the Hadjee to fall to. He did not require twice bidding, for he looked as ravenously on these dainties as if his eyes had an appetite independent of his stomach. The shepherd was about to fill his mouth, when the robber, to his astonishment, interrupted him by crying, "Give Allah and the Prophet thanks, my son, before thou eatest, for these are their mercies!"

"Why, thou presumptuous hypocrite!" cried the Hadjee: "Darest thou give thanks to Allah and his Prophet for these good things, which thou hast violently taken, haply from the poor, with blows and blood? Dost think Allah that thou art a villain—the Prophet, that thou art powerful to shed blood? I dare not be so wickedly profane. I shall thank no giver of this food but he from whom it was forced away."

Al Kadjer knit his dark brows—as the shepherd sternly kept his eyes upon him, he seemed to blush—and sullenly he sat reproved. From that moment the robber was morally conquered. The shepherd now fell to; and, after a time, Al Kadjer shook off his uneasy thoughts, and began to eat, in silence.

"Excellent kid-flesh, by the holy mouth of the Prophet! Who carest for thee?" cried the Hadjee, smacking his lips at the first mouthful, and then cramming in lump after lump, large enough to have choked a man with moderate dimensions of throat.

"Who carest for me? Those who fear me, feed me."

"Then, by the bowels of the sacred camel, it is better to be feared than loved. And this flasket—by the lips of an honest man, your robbers of men—"

"What!" cried Caussim: "wouldst thou stone my dog at mine own door?"

"Well, then, you shepherds of men have better notions of the luxuries of life than we poor dwellers of the valley, when we dream of them, and know no more of their sweet sinfulness. I am a shepherd and kithred, too; but mutons and kids are dainties too delicate for my mean mouth: my masters know what kids and mutons are, and it is my business to see that they get them in good condition and in due season; but as for me—Bismillah! who am I, that I should have a mouth?"

"Rob, then, as I do!" counselled Al Kadjer.

"Yes, become a lion, and ravage flocks and folds, to have every man's hand against me! Nay, by the Prophet, nay!" cried the simple shepherd.

"Every man's hand; so thou knowest, has been uplifted against me, and thou seest, has done me little mischief hitherto. When they have lifted their right arm, mine was always raised at the same moment, and fell the heaviest," vauntingly cried Al Kadjer.

"That was yesterday: to-day, or to-morrow, a mightier arm may be lifted up against thee, and what then?" quoth the shepherd.

"Why, I have lived to-day, and many yesterdays!" exulted the robber. "What more wilt thou have lived when thy flocks are folded by another shepherd?"

"I shall have lived well," said the shepherd, humbly.

"Tush!" cried Al Kadjer, angrily. "Good Moolik! for priest! Meer Meerza," he added, with a sneer, "thou dost not drink!"

"But I will, and that thirstily!" said the Hadjee, smiling at his sarcasm: "Here's to thy beard! The grace of the Prophet fall on it like a fragrant oil." And he bowed to his rude host, and drank. And so for some time the antagonists sat silent, chattering and chinking flasks together. The Hadjee, as merry as a bird, talked till he laughed, and laughed till he cried; but he failed not to observe that the higher his good humour mounted, the more grave and serious grew the robber. Al Kadjer, in his turn, regarded the happy face of Meer Meerza, while it brightened up with mirth, as if he had not seen such an expression of cheerfulness and inward peace for many moons. He had been accustomed to see faces agitated with fear, resentment, and abhorrence. The sight of a face looking happy and unfeigned in his presence was new to him: and the Hadjee sometimes paused in his mirth to read the troubled thoughts in his, written as plainly as the holy texts in the leaves of the sacred Koran. But these intellectual glimpses of his better nature vanished, and all was darkness in his countenance; and again he read in his brow that, notwithstanding his unusual sociality, the robber was a robber still, and meant not to forego his prize, if he might win it. He again returned to his old demand of a tenth of all he had; but the stout shepherd would not hear of it for a moment.

"Was my father a worm," cried he, "that thou thinkest to tread upon me so easily! No—a bargain is a bargain. One of us twain is to lose two tomanas—I care not which: so, as the day declines, the sooner we decide it the better."

"Well, even as thou wilt!" said Al Kadjer: "I am in a good humour this day, or thou wouldst not have thy will thus forwardly. I honour thy father, and I respect thy courage, Hadjee! Some wealthy coward shall reward my moderation to-morrow."

Thus saying, the old robber arose from the ground, and the shepherd leaped up also, as nimbly as an antelope. "Is it to be the old weapon?" asked the former. The Hadjee nodded assent. "Well," added the old man, "I'll honour thee. This has been a white day with me, for I have done no evil work in it; and I care not if I finish it in sport. Take thy ground! And now thy guard, good Hadjee!"

The shepherd lacked not his reminding: he was on his guard, as his antagonist soon discovered, to his cost; for, after some little show of feigning, he dealt him such a blow above the eyes as laid him on the ground. "Thanks to thy kid and the unforbidden, that hit is worth a toman!" cried Meer Meerza, exultingly. But when he observed, after many moments had elapsed, that Al Kadjer stirred not a limb, the conqueror became alarmed, and feared that he had killed him. At length the robber opened his eyes, and looking up at the shepherd who was bending over him with almost the tenderness of a son expressed in his good countenance, he said feebly, and kindly, too, "Hadjee, thou hast vanquished me! Never may I till now have made old Caussim Al Kadjer to bite the dust! Thou hast; but let it not be known on either hand of these hills, of which I have been the terror; for when the common herd shall hear that I am vulnerable, there will be a thousand sparrows pecking at the old eagle."

"Ah, now do I pity thee!" cried Meer Meerza. "But fear not. I promise thee, by the true lips of my mother, that none shall hear of thy discomfiture! We met as foes—shall we part as friends? Such friends as an honest shepherd should be with a—"

—but I will not bring a stone at thee now that thou art hurt! I could go without thy leave; but I will not quit thee till thou sayest, 'Go, my son!' Thou art stunned, not wounded: let me lead thee to thy safe hiding-hole, and then leave thee! For look, the sun is down; and the stars that hovered over the hut of my father when I was born, shines on it now, and bids me welcome home! Give me thy hand in kindness. Should we meet again, shall we meet as friends!"

"Ay, for a thousand moons!" exclaimed the robber; and he trembled when the earnest youth snatched his hand, and pressed it warmly; for now did he feel how inferior his prowess had been; that it had been the daring of a brutalized man—not the unflinching bravery, born of a good conscience, and a heart strong in honesty.

Awe and trembling, with glittering eyes he looked into the face of the young shepherd, and said, "Meer Meerza, my son, this is the gentle look of a lamb, but the heart of a strong lion! I am the dust at thy feet! Go thy ways! Let thy shadow bless thy mother's door! Let the light of thy countenance gladden her eyes! Let thy comeliness bring luck thy father to her heart! Let thy goodness satisfy her! Would that I had had such a father! Would that I had such a mother! Would that I had such a son!"

"No one who will keep my lamp lit when I am in the grave! Go, and leave me! The blessing of the prophet go with thee!" And he covered his face with his hands.

"The prophet be with thee!" piously ejaculated the simple youth; and he moved to depart.

"Stay, my son!" cried Al Kadjer. "Take thy two tomanas, which I give thee fairly well, and may they turn to thousands!"

"I will not touch them," said the shepherd. "I will not gather up fallen fruit which the serpent has licked over," thought he, for he would not speak it, but spared the humbled man. He would have stayed to cheer him, but thoughts of one who was more entitled to his tenderness came upon him, and once more he moved to depart; but ere he went away, he looked compassionately on the miserable man, still struggling in his soul with sin, repentance, pride, and shame.

"The darkness thickens," said the shepherd. "Lead me thy staff, to feel out my path among these ruinous rocks and stumbling-blocks of stone."

"Take it, my son, and leave me!" And the old man rose, and, embracing him, turned heavily away. The Hadjee looked after him, and saw that he had reached his hiding-place: then snatching up his wallet, he bounded downwards, leaping the craggy places like a kid at play; and soon he disappeared in the thick-coming darkness, which rapidly rolled up the heights like a black fog, while night and silence brooded over his beloved native valley beyond.

"I have been a thriving ruffian, and the terror of my fellow-men—would that I were that simple shepherd!" groaned Al Kadjer, as he slunk into the corner of his lonely lair on the desolate hills. Seven days thereafter Hadjee Meer Meerza returned by the same way, and sought to meet his robber-friend; but he was nowhere to be seen. He sought him everywhere, and sought in vain. Guided by fidelity he broken staff on the ground where he had left it, he wound his way among the shivered rocks, and threaded through the tall ferns, rude hawthorns, and lofty eucalyptus, till he at length discovered the haunt of the old robber, and trembling lest he should find him dead, glanced hurriedly into the dark cavern, like a sepulchre with the entrance removed. He was not there! He was turning away from the spot when a table-rock, with marks on it of recent inscription, met his eyes. He hastily read the lines, which ran thus:—"Ashamed of his outlaw's life, Caussim Al Kadjer forsakes it for ever; and in some distant region of this land will, with the blessing of the Holy Prophet, expiate, by days and nights of contrition, his long career of crime and cruelty. Pray for the peace of his spirit, all good Moslems! Pray for him, Hadjee Meer Meerza, the Lamb with the Lion's Heart!"

"There is but one God! Blessed be the name of his prophet!" cried Hadjee Meer Meerza, as he descended the solitary heights of Aheran, and looked with tearful eyes upon the pleasant plains of Erivan.

GAITIES AND GRAVITIES.

STANZAS BY LAVINIA.

'Tis in vain that I braid my hair,
Or twist its dark curls into flowers,
For none whisper me I'm fair,
And tell of my bright eyes' powers.
I sing, and though sweet is my lay,
Its sweetness is thrilling to none;
Life's spring is fast wearing away,
And I am unsought and unwon.

I know that my eyes are bright,
I see that my cheek is fair,
My tresses are dark as night,
And my brow is unshaded by care.
I have witnessed the first flowers bloom
At the coming of nineteen springs,
And never was thought of gloom
In my young heart's imaginings.

The summer is hastening on,
Its roses are fading fast,
While I am unwound and unwon—
And youth, like the rose, will not last.
Young love, lead me one of thy darts,
Ere my beauty, like summer, has flown;
I will not wooed too many hearts,
And but one will I keep as my own.

REPLY TO LAVINIA.

Not in vain have you braided your hair,
Or twined in its curls a sweet flower;
Though I said not, dear maid, you were fair,
Yet my spirit still own'd the soft power.
When I've heard your melodious voice,
Prudence bade me the sweet peril shun,
Nor dream that a maiden so choice,
If I wooed her, would ever be won.

May your spirits be ever as light,
And your brow remain ever as fair,
And your mind, so reverently bright,
Be never overclouded with care.
May flowers in thy path ever spring,
Blooming fresh, till life's journey be done,
And the village bells very soon ring,
To say you are wooed—and are won!

The leaves which are now falling fast
Tell us summer is hastening on—
Youth's bloom, like the rose, cannot last:
Then say, if I woo, you'll be won!
Oh! words can but coldly impart
The feelings I wish to make known—
Dear Lavinia! you've long had my heart,
In pity, then, give me your own.

A FORTUNATE ATTORNEY.

There are always a considerable number of attorneys and barristers in the Queen's Bench Prison. I need scarcely say that in the majority of cases the attorneys were without practice, and the barristers briefless, before their entrance. Some of the former, however, manage to raise a tolerable business within the walls of the prison. Strange as it may appear, it does sometimes happen that persons have to date their prosperity in life to their incarceration in the Queen's Bench. One remarkable instance consists with my personal knowledge. The party was a barrister, but had never in his life had a single brief in his bag. I am not sure, indeed, having no use for it, whether he had a bag at all. He was sent to vegetate for ten or twelve months in the Bench. While there, he contracted an intimacy with one of the prisoners of some station in society, and of considerable wealth, though, through some illegal proceedings, temporarily deprived of it. The case was laid before the briefless barrister, and having abundant time on his hand, he made himself completely master of it in all its bearings. On his liberation he undertook to bring it before the proper tribunal, making his remuneration entirely dependent on his success. He did succeed: the party was liberated, and he amply rewarded for his trouble. But the remuneration he received was but a very subordinate portion of the benefit he derived from the case. Possessed of very respectable talents, and knowing the case so thoroughly, he made so creditable a professional appearance in court, that briefs from that time, poured in on him in copious abundance. 'Twas the tide of his affairs which Shakespeare speaks: he wisely took it at the flood, and led it on to fame and fortune.

THE NEWSPAPER PRESS.

In the state of the world at which we are now arrived, with the mighty printing-press in perpetual operation everywhere, like another power of nature, it is not to be apprehended that any important movement in human affairs can happen, at least in the civilized parts of the earth, without an account of it being immediately drawn up, and so multiplied and dispersed, that it cannot fail to go down to posterity. Without any regular machinery established and kept at work for that purpose, the transmission of a knowledge of everything worth noting that takes place to all future generations is now secured much more effectually than it ever was in those times when public functionaries used to be employed, in many countries, to chronicle occurrences as they arose, expressly for the information of after-ages. Such were the pontifical annalists of ancient Rome, and the keepers of the monastic registers in the middle ages among ourselves, and in the other countries of Christendom. How meagre and valueless are the best of the records that have come down to us compiled by authority, compared with our newspapers, which do not even contemplate as at all coming within their design, the preservation and handing down to other times of the intelligence collected in them, but limit themselves to the single object of its mere promulgation and immediate diffusion.

THE COUNTESS AND THE DIAMONDS.

The art of appropriating to one's self the goods of others, has made immense progress of late years. Robbery is now committed in so polite a manner, and with so much attention to forms, that a tradesman, a stranger, or a traveller, has need of extreme prudence, and a profound knowledge of the Police Gazette, to enable him to discover, under their various aspects, the dangers which constantly threaten him. The following anecdote will show to what a pitch of perfection the science of robbery has arrived.

M. Esqui—, one of the most celebrated physicians in Paris in cases of mental disease, was visited one morning by a lady about forty years old, but still good-looking. The carriage of the countess of—drove rapidly into the doctor's court-yard. The countess was instantly admitted, and with tears, and apparently in despair, exclaimed, "You see, sir, a woman in the deepest affliction. I have an only son, who is very dear to me as well as to my husband." Here she wept so abundantly, that her tears seemed likely to rival those which the classical Ariadne shed over the tomb of Theseus. "Yes, sir," she continued: "and for some time we have been under dreadful apprehensions. He is just at the age when the passions begin to display themselves. Though we indulge him in every way, allow him money and unlimited liberty, he has several times already shown signs of insanity. His monomania makes us the more uneasy, from his constantly talking (in the midst of other incoherent discourses) of jewels and diamonds which he has sold, or given away. We imagine that he has fallen desperately in love with some woman, and that he may have contracted some heavy debts to gratify her wishes. This, however, is only conjecture: his father and I have bewildered ourselves in endeavouring to discover the reason of this folly."

"Well, madam, bring your son to me."

"To-morrow, sir, at twelve o'clock."

The next day the countess got out of her carriage at the shop of one of the most celebrated jewellers; and after having bargained a long time for a set of jewels worth two thousand pounds, and made many difficulties, she at last decided upon purchasing it. She draws her purse out of her bag, and finds only bank-notes for four hundred pounds, which she displays; then putting them carelessly back into the purse, "Let some one go home with me," she said, "and my husband will pay for me; for I have not the whole sum about me."

The jeweller gave orders to one of his young men, who darted from behind the counter, proud of the honour of accompanying a countess in her carriage.

They arrive at the house of M. Esqui—. The lady runs upstairs, and whispers to the doctor, "Here is my son: I will leave you." Then turning back, she says to the young man, "My husband is in his cabinet: go in; he will pay you." The young man enters; the countess runs down stairs; the carriage drives quietly into the street; and, when there, the horses set off at full speed.

"Well, young man," said the physician, "you know the state of the case. Come, how do you feel? Tell me what is passing in your mind."

"What is passing in my mind? Nothing, sir. But here is the bill for the diamonds."

"So—we are come to it already? Good," said the doctor, gently putting back the bill. "I know—I know."

"If you know the amount, sir, the only thing necessary is to pay me."

"There, there! be calm.—Your diamonds? Where did you buy them? what has become of them? Speak; don't be afraid. Come."

"I only want you to pay me two thousand pounds."

"Ah, ah! and why, pray?"

"Why?" exclaimed the young man, who began to grow angry.

"Yes: why am I to pay you?"

"Because the countess has this moment bought them at our shop."

"Good; there you are again. Who is the countess?"

"Your lady." And he continued to present the admirable bill.

"But, my good young man, you must know that I have the happiness to be a physician and a w-downer!"

At these words the jeweller put himself in a passion; and the doctor, calling in his people, ordered them to hold him by the arms and legs. The young man became furious, and roared out "Thieves! robbers! murderers! But at the end of a quarter of an hour he became calm, regained everything rationally, and then a sudden light broke in upon the doctor.

Every endeavor to discover the authors of this very singular and clever robbery proved fruitless—equipeage, countess, and servants, had all disappeared!

GENERAL LOVER.

There dwells in the city of Bath a very respectable lady, the widow of a dignitary of the church. She is a universal favourite with all the young people who have the pleasure of her intimacy; and no wonder that it is so—the goodness of her heart, the equanimity of her temper, her gay, cheerful disposition, and the grace, ease, and dignity of her manners, although belonging to the old school, render her society more acceptable and agreeable than that of many females having greater advantages in possessing youth and beauty, but destitute of the charms of the mind and good breeding, which distinguishes the conversation of Mrs. W. The old lady is, however, a little deaf, and upon a consequence of this infirmity hinges our story.

A gallant lieutenant-colonel in the service of her most gracious majesty, was equally celebrated for his devotion to the fair sex and for his bravery in the field. The fascination of his manners and the beauty of his person rendered him a dangerous enemy to the peace of many a fair bosom, but no one ever heard that Colonel A—ever made a serious proposal. In the words of Miss Edgeworth, he was a male jilt or masculine coquette; but he always so managed matters that, whatever pangs he inflicted, he always escaped the expressed indignation of the ladies, and the significant remonstrances of fathers and brothers. Such was Colonel A—when he paid a visit to the renowned city of Bath.

Of course such a distinguished personage was received with open arms into the best society of such a gay place as the city of King Blarney, but, by some accident, he had not had the honour of an introduction to the worthy widow who was mentioned. The pliant colonel commenced in Bath that system of general flirtation he had so successfully practised elsewhere. In vain the ladies sighed, the colonel was not to be had—and he continued his gay career, as reckless of the mortification and misery he caused as if he had been really an unprincipled man instead of being only unthinking and vain. Now our worthy widow gave a ball, to which, of course, all the déte of Bath were invited. To this ball did Colonel A—accompany a friend, though not himself invited, it being understood that the widow would receive the friends of her friends without the regular formality of invitations. The colonel looked forward to the pleasure of flirting with half the pretty girls in Bath. Poor man! he little knew what was hanging over his devoted head. As soon as he entered the reception-room a general whisper attested the notoriety or fame of the new-come, and unfortunately two words caught the ear of the widow—"general lover." The colonel and his friend made their way to the lady of the mansion, who was surrounded by a crowd of friends; the gallant officer was introduced, but, the widow being deaf, his name did not reach the tympanum of her ear. Judge, if you can, of the colonel's horror when he was addressed as General Lover! The widow belonged to that old school of politeness which considered individual introduction necessary, and "General Lover, Mr. Harcourt—Mr. Harcourt, General Lover—General Lover, Miss Hardcastle—Miss Hardcastle, General Lover," sounded through the room in the widow's clearest and loudest voice. There was no possibility of mistaking the name; the lady's deafness had become infinitely worse since morning: no explanation could stop her rapid introduction of General Lover to her numerous friends. No merely human muscles could stand thus—a general roar of laughter pervaded the rooms, and the poor colonel looked away from the widow, and retired from the room in an agony of mortification. From that day Colonel A—ceased his flirtations, but he was too fine a fellow to be allowed to remain a bachelor, and his wife blesses the day when she made a benediction of General Lover.

SKETCHES FROM THE GERMAN.

THE BLIND GIRL.

The blind Agnes was sitting by a clear brook. I can never forget that evening; the brook glittered along the winding valley, and the stars and the moon played in the pearly waters at the feet of the blind girl, and either bank was fringed with a thicket, the bowery home of the nightingale. As I came nearer—how was it, Hermione!

"You heard that a friend was reading to her by moonlight, out of Thomson's Seasons."

"And sweetly she read, but soft and low. At my voice—physiognomy to the blind—the dark one knew me, and pressed her friend to me, who immediately lifted up her long veil. I had seen her once before: you must know where, reverend sir!"

"In a convent at—, which the emperor afterwards suppressed. The recommendation of an abbot, to whom I had introduced a priest, who could read more rapidly than any other priest living, opened my path to the refectory, where, out of all the nuns, who were generally too fat, only one pleased me; and she was neither the one nor the other, for she was a novice—this very friend of the blind girl. I shall never forget that gentle, pale, serene face; with a wooden trencher on which were only lentils, set before it for mortification sake."

"So strange are we men; I should rather much more willingly see a lovely creature suffer, sigh, and weep bitter tears from fruitless love of me, for two whole days, than endure that she should have to eat a miserable piece of ashen bread, or wear a garment of humiliation, or a grille of hair-cloth, or do penance by a walk of three miles on my account."

"Do you relate the rest, Hermione, you had it from me."

"You told me, farther, that the good Agnes was more cheerful than the nun, and willingly alluded to her misfortune which you could not have expected."

"Yes, for women speak, and we men are silent, about griefs; we always turn over the leaves of our lives, to get at the pleasantest engravings and the last chapter; but, go on."

"The good girl hung a black gauze over her dead eyes, out of consideration for others. She always looked at you when you spoke, but it was only the voice she sought. You asked her what the British scene-painter of nature, (this was your expression), or, indeed, what a fine evening could be to her. She said she enjoyed a cheerful day as much as any one—that the air was purer and fresher—the song and call of the birds clearer—and the gurgling and rustling of the brook and leaves more pleasant; and, when all this entered her watchful soul, she rejoiced to its inmost depths, without knowing wherefore."

"Who then can help being, as I am, ashamed and repentant at the murmurings in which we often pass a few cloudy days, when he thinks of the contented spirit which is blessed through all its wholly brightenings! But blindness, though a polar winter without day, in this resembles the night, that softens and stills; the blind is a child, whom its mother, Nature, has fashioned darkling for the deepest tranquillity. Like a man in a balloon, high above the clouds, the hermit blind knows only voices and sounds; but the bewildering, giddy shows of life, the low, the hateful and hating forms, full of scars and wounds, are hidden under the thick cloud which envelops him."—Jean Paul.

LOVE OF COUNTRY.

Wherever, O man, God's first sun beamed upon thee—where the stars of heaven first shone above thee—where his lightnings first declared his omnipotence, and his storm-wind shook thy soul with pious awe—there are thy affections—there is thy country.

Where the first human eye bent lovingly over thy cradle—where thy mother first bore thee joyfully on her bosom—where thy father engraved the words of wisdom on thy heart—there are thy affections—there is thy country.

And though it be among bare rocks and desert islands, and though poverty and care dwell there with thee, thou mayest love that land for ever; for thou art there, and thou canst not forget it, but it must abide in thee inmost heart.

And freedom is no empty dream—no barren imagination—but in her dwells thy courage, and thy pride, and the certainty that thou art of high and heavenly race.

There is freedom where thou canst live in the customs, and fashions, and laws, of thy fathers; where that which rejoiced their hearts rejoiced thine; where no foreign oppressor can command thee, no foreign ruler drive thee according to his will, as cattle are driven at the will of their drivers.

This thy country—thy free country—is a treasure which contains within itself indestructible love and faith; the noblest good, (excepting religion; in which dwells a still higher freedom,) which a virtuous man can possess, or can covet.—Arnold.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

BOOKS.—FROM JOHN MILTON.

"Books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a progeny of life in them to be as active as that soul whose progeny they are: nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorously productive, as those fabulous dragons' teeth; and being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men. And yet on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book; who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were in the eye. Many a man lives a-burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. It is true, no age can restore a life, whereof perhaps there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse. We should be wary therefore what persecution we raise against the living labours of public men, how we spill that consecrated life of man, preserved and stored up in books; since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom; and if it extend to the whole impression, a kind of massacre, whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at the ethereal and fifth essence, the breath of reason itself; slays an immortality rather than a life."

THE SAME.—FROM THOMAS CARLYLE.

"Visible and tangible products of the past, again, I reckon up to the extent of three: cities, with their cabinets and arsenals; then tilled fields, to either or to both of which divisions roads to their bridges may belong; and thirdly—books. In which third truly, the last invented, lies a worth far surpassing that of the two others. Vindicta indeed is the virtue of a true book. Not like a dead city of stones, yearly crumbling, yearly needing repair, more like a tilled field, but then a spiritual field: like a spiritual tree, let me rather say, it stands from year to year, and from age to age, (we have books that already number some hundred-and-fifty human ages,) and yearly comes its new produce of leaves, (commentaries, deductions, philosophical, political essays; or were it only sermons, pamphlets, journalistic essays,) every one of which is talismanic and thaumaturgic, for it can persecute man. O thou who art able to write a book, which once in the two centuries or oftener there is a man gifted to do, envy not him whom they name city-builder, and inexpressibly pity him whom they name conqueror or city-burner! Not too art a conqueror and victor; but of the true sort, namely, over the devil; thou too hast built what will outlast all marble and metal, and be a wonder-bringing city of the mind, a temple, and sanctuary, and prophetic mound, whereto all kindreds of the earth will pilgrim. Fool! thy journeyest thou wearisomely, in thy antiquarian fæavour, to gaze on the stone pyramids of Gæza, or the clay ones of Sacchara! These stand there, as I can tell thee, idle and inert, looking over the desert, foolishly enough, for the last three thousand years: but canst thou not open thy Hebrew Bible, then, or even Luther's version thereof?"

THE SAME.—FROM GÖTTE'S FAUSTUS, DR. AMSTER'S VERSION.

"To us, my friend, the times that are gone by
Are a mysterious book, sealed with seven seals;
That which you call the spirit of ages past
Is but, in truth, the spirit of some few authors
In which those ages are behest reflected.
With what distortion heaven unguine knows.
Oh! often, what a welcome thing it is
This study of thine, at the first glance we fly it.
A mass of things confusedly heaped together;
A lumber-room of dusty documents,
Furnished with all approved court-precedents,
And old traditional maxims! History!
Facts dramatized say rather—action—plot—
Sentiment, everything the writer's own.
As it best fits the web-work of his story.
With here and there a solitary fact
Of consequence, by those grave chroniclers,
Pointed with many a moral apothegm,
And wise old saws, learned at the puppet-shows."

BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

Every reader of the Bible must have observed the frequent recurrence of the number forty in the text, in cases where no material reason appears for preferring that number to another. Thus, at the flood, the rain fell forty days, and when the waters abated, Noah opened the window of the ark after forty days. Moses was forty days in the Mount; forty days without eating or drinking. Elijah travelled forty days from Beersheba to Mount Hor. Jonah prophesied that Nineveh should be destroyed in forty days. Our Saviour was forty days in the wilderness, and appeared on earth forty days after the resurrection. The Israelites lived forty years in the wilderness. Ezekiel prophesied that Egypt should be desolated for forty years, etc. Now, it is a curious fact that the modern Arabs, Persians, and Turks employ the word forty to express an indefinite number, in a manner analogous to the use of the term dozen or a score with us in familiar conversation. Chardin describes Erivan as standing between two rivers, one of which has an Armenian name, signifying forty springs. A rivulet in the Iroquois, which has been the subject of much controversy, bears the Turkish name of Kirko Jos, or forty springs, though it has only sixteen or eighteen. Instances of this kind are innumerable. The Hebrew, it is well known, is a sister dialect of the Arabic, and from frequency of intercourse the Jews and Arabs must have had many idioms and forms of speech in common. Is it not probable, that the term alluded to may sometimes have the same value in the Hebrew Scriptures as among the modern Turks, Arabs, and Persians? Much light has been thrown on the text of the Bible in a thousand instances from the examination of oriental customs and idioms, and great additions, in fact, have been made from this source to the evidence we possess of the genuineness of the holy volume.

MUSIC.

A German schoolmaster encouraged his scholars to learn music, by saying—"Learn to sing, my dear boys, and then, if you go to heaven, the angels will admit you into their choir."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

MUSICK.

THERE is a spell in musick's strain,
Of power to still the sense of pain;
When passion's storms invade the breast,
To lull each troubled thought to rest;
And raise the soul from joyless strife
Above the busy cares of life:
No human heart is closed to thee,
Oh, "sphere-descended harmony!"

When blooming sweets young shepherds bring,
To deck the shrine of new-born spring—
When verdure laughs in every grove,
And smiling May allures to love—
The feather'd tribes, on flowery spray,
Then trill the liquid tuneful lay,
That sings of love, from fetters free,
In nature's strain of harmony.

The zephyr mild that woos the rose,
The brook that murmurs as it flows;
The catarrh, the tempest loud,
The thunder bursting from the cloud,
Are musick—from the hand divine
That made the stars to sing and shine;
And from creation's concert we Derive the laws of harmony!

L. L. T.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF REAL LIFE.

MUSICK AND LOVE.

"There was a youth, who, as with toil and travel,
Had grown quite weak and gray before his time;
Nor any could the restless grief unravel,
Which burned within him, withering up his prime
And gazing him like seeds from land to land."—Shelley.

SHADE OF ORPHEN! 'Shade of Apollo! Oh, all ye musical shades, bend on your crotchets and listen! Shake your fiddle-bows, ye living Paganinis, and draw one strain, "affettuoso," for the mournful fate of a humble votary.

On the borders of the Connecticut river, winding like a chain of silver, through hill and valley, there stood many years since, closely embowered in a grove of maples, the long, low, wooden dwelling of Nehemiah Abimelech Smith. Nehemiah was the owner of a large well-cultivated farm, stocked with countless herds of sheep and oxen, cows, pigs and poultry—a thrifty, prudent, cheese and butter wife—of two rosy-cheeked, industrious daughters, and of Nehemiah Abimelech Smith, Jr. Alas, this Junior was born with an ear! In his infancy, he quavered more than any child of his age—his voice might be heard, "prestissimo," to the very boundary of the three hundred acres, de-capo-ing, again and again, airs from Squallini. With lullabies and shakings, did his mother strive to hush his notes, and his sisters would toss him and bounce him, till he was blue as an indigo-bag, but to no purpose—the little hero could never be made to understand when to "rest." At school, he was distinguished for his peculiar nasal notes, and for the zeal with which he chanted, rather than said his catechism, and other rudiments, as Cophagus has it. Not a day passed, but he was summoned to face the terrible frown of schoolmaster Birchwig, to render an account for diverse whistlings and tuning up of jews-haps, even during those hours when "deans" were taught "to shoot;" and often was poor Abimelech made to compose his own notes, to the lines marked by a "cat-o-nine-tails," of all cats the most touchingly musical. As he grew older, matters became still worse; he went "round the house a walking hand-organ, winding himself up continually—never suffering himself to run-down—if his mother placed him at the churn, the butter never came, for he always sang "Old-hundred," keeping time with the dasher—a process rather too slow for effect—and if his father sent him into the field to plant corn or sow fye, it was all done to musick. There were minim dots, crotchets and quavers; here a long rest, and there a whole line of demi-semi-quavers. When the tools of the day were ended, he would steal from the house, and lie to a quiet little nook on the banks of the river, where, seating himself beneath the whispering-branches of a large sycamore, he would discourse most eloquent musick upon the jew-harp, or throwing himself upon the soft grass, listen with delightful ear to the sweet warble of the robin, and the soothing ripple of the river, as it rolled gently on its way—here, wrapped in "Pen-seroso," would he remain, until the stars had, one by one, burst forth in brightness and beauty.

One day, one memorable day, Abimelech purchased a crackedfife—how thrilled his heart with joyful cadence, as he held in his hand the precious bargain: he turned it over and over again, applied it to his mouth, and blew one long-drawn note—he was delighted!
"They always quarrelled with my jews-harp," he soliloquized, "and with my singing and my whistling, but I am certain they must like this!"—and on he went squealing with great gusto all the way, like a pig in the last agonies. But, alas, how are we doomed to disappointment in this world! One week, one little week of bliss, did Abimelech enjoy his "shrill and piercing fife." The next 'twas gone, no one knew where—every closet was ransacked, every drawer was emptied—his mother and sisters, as sting with well-figured zeal in the long and arduous search, but all in vain. Poor Abimelech notwithstanding their unworldly kindness, he could not help suspiciously suspecting, they knew more about it than they chose to tell.

A short time after, Abimelech exchanged a young and tender calf for a fife, and retiring into the recesses of the forest, would blow, and puff, and whiff, until his eyes almost started from their sockets.
The rocks and trees, to be sure, kept their places in the firm earth; but the whip-poor-wills and the owls peeped forth to listen, and more than once did he hear his notes re-echoed by some young aspiring screech-owl. Soon, however, the fife was found a more disjointed, broken mass. How it came so, none could tell—no one knew how it happened. Oh! the arts of woman-kind! A fiddle was the next musical essay of the persevering Abimelech: it is needless to tell of the exquisite sawing, twiddle dum-ing and dee-ing, performed by his muscular arm, of which every nerve was as a separate fiddlebow. In this manner, for some months, was time scraped away—when, one day, Madam Romaine, who delights to scatter her news where she knows it will do the most mischief, came hurrying to the farm, whispering in Abimelech's ear, that the squire's daughter had just returned from a fashionable city boarding-school, and not only could warble more sweetly than his favourite robin, but could also draw the most wonderful, thrilling, heavenly sounds, from something hitherto unknown in the quiet little village of S—, namely, a piano. How did the heart of Abimelech bound and caper at this intelligence! So great was his desire and impatience to hear this all-wonderful something, which was to surpass all his finest strains upon fife, flute or fiddle, that scarcely could he wait for the shades of evening to darken the valley, ere seizing his hat, with long and rapid strides he drew near to the little village, which lay "nestled" at the foot of Sugar-loaf Mountain, about a mile from the scene of his daily labours. Entering the village, he glided stealthily up the long avenue which led to the dwelling of Mr. or Squire Montagu, and placing himself in the dark shadow of an elm, whose luxuriant branches drooped gracefully over one end of the house, he there awaited motionless, almost breathless for the "evidence of things."
Hour after hour, did poor Abimelech stand gazing with wistful eyes, and expanded ears, upon the window from which he expected the sounds to issue. At length, the figure of a young girl approached the window—the rays of the moon fell full upon a bright, happy face—leaving from the easement, she began singing a lively little air, and, at the same time, plucking the leaves from the very elm which protected our hero. Oh! what a situation for Nehemiah Abimelech Smith, Jr.! Half an hour, (which to Abimelech seemed an eternity in purgatory,) was spent by the maiden in gazing upon the moon, warbling snatches of songs, and twisting her dark ringlets around her little fingers—at length she turned from the window, tripped across the road, and approached the piano—opening it, the long row of polished ivory gleamed upon her astonished vision—she sat down and ran her fingers lightly over the keys—Abimelech almost shouted with delight—and then commenced a beautiful overture. It would have been difficult even for a more practiced ear to have listened unmoved—what, then, must have been the effect upon our uncultivated ears-dropper! The unconscious girl next accompanied the instrument with the tones of her rich voice. This was too much for Abimelech—entirely forgetting the delicacy of his situation, he approached, step by step, nearer to the window: as some poor bird is drawn, little by little, into the very mouth of its fascinating destroyer—even so, was poor Abimelech drawn, head and shoulders, into the window. The moon-beams danced about him, as if enjoying the mischief they were about to disclose, and gleamed coldly but steadily down upon his round-topped, broad-brimmed, white-felt hat. The song ended—the maiden turned to the window;
there was a start of surprise, and then a scream so loud and shrill as might awake the dead—it did awake Abimelech—fetching a scream, or rather shout of terror, he fled down the avenue, across the fields, nor stopped till panting and exhausted he reached the farm—

"Swift on the left, swift on the right—
Sweeps every scene assunder!
Heads, necks, noses, flung, how swift their flight!
And how the jridges thunder!"

That night Abimelech was convicted of having seen a ghost!

From this event if evening a "change came over the spirit of his dream." Cupid ensconced himself in the virgin heart of Abimelech, and there the little rascal sat, perched upon a pile of ancient ballads, delighted with the mischief he was doing—feeding on musick—and every now and then beating up such a rub-a-dub, as wellnigh drove poor Abimelech distracted. Musick is said to be the food of love, and here were garnered up stores—not, to be sure, the dainty fare of a modern amateur, but the good substantial dishes our forefathers loved—nor were they got up in the style of a Catalina or a Mal-bran—but who does not sometimes prefer a plain, country dish to Delmonico's best! The business of the farm was now almost entirely neglected—the sheep died from starvation, the cattle from over-feeding. No wonder the old folks thought Abimelech bewitched!
Even his fiddle was suffered to lay mute, except occasionally, when he would strive to catch a note of the strains which he so entranced him; but, as surely as he did so, the image of Florante appeared at his elbow, and Cupid would jump astride the fiddle-bow.

Now, Abimelech was one of the most bashful, shame-faced youths yet on record—he was never known to look at a pretty girl, much less speak to one—it is true he belonged to the village singing school, but was he ever known to ask a maiden for her company home! In those days there was no organ in that primitive little village—for the good people all perfectly agreed with the worthy Deacon Longface, who observed, after a visit to the city of Hartford, that it was sinful even to enter a meeting-house, where the sacred services of the Sabbath were so profaned as to have a golden organ!

Florante Montagu was one morning busy in her little garden, among her roses and violets, when she was told some one in the house wished to see her—throwing off her little gingham sun-bonnet, and tossing back her ringlets, she entered the parlour. In the centre of the room stood Abimelech! He was clad in a suit of snuff-coloured home-spun, fresh from the loom, which hung around him as though his flesh had been lately carried off by a doctor; while, by dint of scrubbing to remove the farm-yard tan, he had brought his face to resemble in appearance, one of those shining red globes, seen in an apothecary's window. His hands were dressed in gloves, not colourless, and tightly embraced the identical broad-brimmed, white felt-hat. Florante, to her knowledge, had never seen him before—she bowed, with difficulty restraining a smile at the grotesque appearance of the stranger, and requested him to be seated. But he moved not—thrice he opened his mouth and strove to speak; but the words remained fixed in his throat, and the only sounds he uttered were like those of a frog with the hooping-cough. At length, however, after ten minutes of the greatest agony on the part of Abimelech from extreme fright, and of much self-command on the part of Flo-rante, to keep her little mouth in order, he succeeded in making known the object of his visit, which was to hear "Miss Montagu play a tune on the piano." With the sweetest grace and most obliging manner, Florante immediately seated herself, and selecting one of her favourite pieces, played it with much taste and skill.

Again and again she touched the keys—march, waltz, and song followed each other in rapid succession. Alas! little she was aware of the cruel snarl she was adding to the "tangled web" of Abimelech's life! As shaking her raven locks from her sunny brow, and turning her large black eyes upon him, she would ask at the conclusion of every piece, if he liked it! Liked it! To describe the feelings of our hero, (for here he has now certainly proved himself), is impossible—the attempt would be vain. Let the imagination mount her wildest Pegasus, and paint all that is terrible, all that is beautiful, all that is most distressing, all that is most pleasing, all that is tragic, all that is comic, and some faint idea may perhaps be conceived of what was passing in the breast of Abimelech.

All scenes, whether of grief or joy, must have an end, and so had this. Abimelech returned to the farm; but, if, heretofore he had taken no pleasure therein, how was it now! From morn till night did he wander back and forth on the banks of the river, or hiding himself in some thick grove, tell to the rocks and woods his complaints. But a woful change, by degrees, took place in the appearance of Abimelech—his frame shrank to a mere Edsonian anatomy; his cheeks which once with piony did vie, were now pale as any turnip; and his eyes grew dim as farthing rush-lights, seen through the mists of a foggy evening. One day he strolled from his accustomed haunts, and took the path leading to the village—it was late in autumn, the withered leaves whirled around his path, the wind blew in mournful gusts through the naked branches of the trees; now and then the note of a solitary bird was heard, and the squirrel ran hurriedly across the path, busily closing his winter's board. In the most suspicious frame of mind Abimelech reached the village, and turned mechanically up the avenue, he stood before the dwelling which contained the idols of his thoughts. The street-door was open; unconsciously he entered. The parlour-door was also open, and fronting the entrance stood the piano, displaying those keys, those magical keys, with which Florante had doubly-locked the chains which bound him. Long and wistfully did Abimelech gaze—again, as if by fascination he was led, step by step, nearer and nearer to the instrument—he is close to it—incontinently one great hand is laid upon the keys; the touch thrills his very soul—anon the other follows, and finally dropping upon the crimson velvet seat, did Abimelech rattle and thrum the delicate ivory. The family were out, with the exception of the servants, who hearing the piano touched with more than usual violence, entered the room; but Abimelech saw them not, heeded them not, and to all their laughing and tittering he was perfectly unconscious. At length, a small white hand is laid upon his shoulder, a pair of laughing eyes peep up in his face, and the sweet voice of Florante exclaims, "Well done, Mr. Abimelech."
Heavens what a start was there! With a look of agony, a groan of despair, did he spring from the seat, upsetting it in the violence of his emotion, rushed wildly to the door, prostrating one or two laughing hand-maidens, and fled the house. Alas, no more was seen of Nehemiah Abimelech Smith, Jr!

It was some years after this, and Florante Montagu became a bride. Travelling not long after through the western part of the state of New-York, Mr. and Mrs. Grey stopped at the little village of Avon. They soon perceived preparations were making for some rural festivity. Cart-loads of evergreens, and wagon-loads of lads and lasses, were ever and anon driving to the inn, while the heavy tramping overhead, and mingled shouts of laughter, all betokened a scene of coming pleasure. By and by the landlord entered the nicely sanded parlour, and after some awkward apologies, stated a ball was to be held that evening, when he hoped his guests would honour by their attendance. Simply arranging a few wild-flowers in her hair, Florante entered the ball-room leaning on the arm of her husband. Her hand was soon requested by a village beau, while Mr. Grey prepared to lead off a rosy-cheeked, blue-eyed lassie. The hall was prettily decorated with evergreens and flowers, while at awful intervals were arranged tallow-candles, flickering and flaring in playful gambols upon the walls. At the top of the room was a small bower formed of evergreens, bearing in the centre a raised platform, on which with uplifted bow, waiting the summons to "strike up," stood the most useful ally of Terpsichore—namely, the fiddler. Suddenly his eye became fixed upon the figure of Flo-rante, as she approached to head the long country dance. She turned her face toward him—her eyes met—the hapless musician gave one groan—dropped his fiddle, and fell in a swoon from the platform—buried beneath the pines and laurels, which a moment since had clustered so proudly above his head. It was Abimelech! C. B. N.

ORIGINAL CRITICISM.

THE POETRY OF CHARLES SPRAGUE.

CARLYLE in his Essay on German literature, gives a clear sketch of the principles of German criticism. "It is not," says he, "a question concerning the qualities of diction, the coherence of metaphors, the fitness of sentiments, the general logical truth, in a work of art, as it was some half century ago, among most critics; neither is it a question mainly of a psychological sort, to be answered by discovering, and delineating the peculiar nature of the poet from his poetry, as is usual with the best of our own critics at present; but it is, not indeed exclusively, but inclusively of these two other questions, properly and ultimately, a question on the essence and peculiar life of the poetry itself." The first of these questions, as we see it answered, for instance, in the criticisms of Johnson and Kames, relates, strictly speaking, to the garment of poetry; the second, indeed, to its body and material existence, a much higher point; but only the last to its soul and spiritual existence, by which alone, can the body in its movements and phases be informed with significance and rational life.

This is true criticism. It gives the author his just deserts. It considers, rather the ideas, than the words in which they are clothed; it examines, more the correctness of opinion, the originality and brilliancy of thought, the beauty of sentiment, than the coherence of metaphor, or even the sequence of logic. Such a critic must possess the "mens diviner," not merely a knowledge of the rules of Kames and Blair—he must have a kindred feeling with the poet—he must be a poet, and not a cold calculating measurer and inspector of words and sentences.

The poet, too, who can bear such criticism, is a good poet; his works will remain a "legacy" for posterity, and mankind will look upon him as doing honour to his kind, as possessing in a higher and purer degree the nobler attributes of their own nature.

Far from professing to be ourselves such a critic, we have made these remarks, because we believe them to be just, and because we shall endeavour to examine in this way, the poetry of one of our most gifted poets, who, whether he be criticised in either one, or all of the manners spoken of above, is far from being found wanting.

Charles Sprague has written but little, yet this little entitles him to a high standing among American poets. Occupied with the incessant cares of an active business, he has found but little time to devote to the muse, yet his productions, like those of the "sweet banker-poet" of England, have always been read with delight and profit. The "Curiosity," the first, and almost the only one of his poems of any great length, was delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Cambridge in 1839. It is his best poem, and upon it his fame chiefly rests. A brief analysis of the method is necessary to a correct appreciation of its merits. He begins with the power of "Curiosity" over the archangels,

"When first this fair world rounded to their view."

Next, its effects in Eden before our first parents—then upon the child when

"—It assails him in his top's strange hum;
Breathes in his whistle, echoes in his drum."

Then, with quiet humour, often mingled with true sarcasm, he shows it to us in the world which, "like Paul's Athenians," is "seeking something new"—in the stage—in the press—

"By with the wonders of each passing day,
Births, deaths, and weddings, forgeries and wrecks,
Harangues and hail storms, brawls and broken necks."

In the literature of the day—in man's desire to read "eternity's dark record"—in all his actions from "the cradle to the grave," by "restless curiosity inspired."

"The insatiable spirit will not be controlled,
We would make certain all, and abet hold."

Such is a brief outline of his method; but the picture is filled up with graphic descriptions of "Curiosity's" effect upon all classes of society—with beautiful thoughts and ideas—with original and brilliant conceptions, rendering the poem one harmonious whole, we had almost said, without "spot or blemish." Indeed, in care and polish, and in the general coloring, he strongly reminds us of the "correct Goldsmith." Thus much for the "body" and "garments"—we come now to the "soul"—to the essence and life of the poem.

If, as has been said, "Poetry must dwell in Reality, and become manifest to men, in the forms among which they live and move," Sprague is in the highest sense of the word, a poet. He sees with keenness and clearness the actions of men in every-day life—disseminates the beautiful and the good from the deformed and the vile—describes with accuracy and force, the effects of man's nature and passions upon his outward life—shows to our gaze with all the beauty and fancy of the poet, joined with the accuracy of the "callous workman," the aspects of life; and like nature herself the picture is at once beautiful and true. We have no pictures of life, as it does not exist—of affections and passions, as they do not influence man—no hopes and fears too great for mortals—no joys and sorrows which humanity never experiences. All is real, and yet beautiful; all is true, yet often strange. The man who can, from nature as she is, from man as he is, "leave something so written to after times as they will not willingly let die," is the great poet—the only true poet. Witness the creations of Shakespeare, how different from the artificial "rule and compass" manufacturers of the "Grays and Glovers" of a little later time. The former is real, natural, true; the latter unreal, artificial, false. The one wrote as he thought, and his thoughts were poetry; the other wrote as they composed, and their compositions were but clipped and rhymed verse.

We give a few illustrations of what we have said of Sprague as a poet of "Reality and Nature."

"'Tis Curiosity—who hath not felt
Its spirit, and before its altar kneel!
In the pensive infant, see its power expand,
When first the coral fills its little hand,
Throned in his mother's lap, it dries each tear,
As her sweet legend falls from his ear;
* * * * *

Nor yet alone to toys and tales confined,
It sits dark brooding o'er his embryo mind;
Takes him between your knees, peruse his face
While all you know, or think you know, you trace:
Tells him who spoke creation into birth,
Arched the broad heavens, and spread the rolling earth,
Who formed a pathway for the obedient sun,
And cadd the seasons in their circle run,
Who filled the air, the forest, and the flood;
And gave man all, for comfort, or for food;
Tells him they sprang at God's creating nod—
He stops you short with,—'Father, who made God?'"

Take the following:

"Behold the sick man in his easy chair;
Barred from the busy crowd and bracing air,
How every pleasing thing proves his power
To whine away the long, dull, lazy hour.
As down the pane the rascal rain-drops chase,
Curious, he'll watch to see which wins the race;
And let two dogs beneath his window fight,
He'll shut his Bible to enjoy the sight.
So with each newswoman's rolling tale the day,
Till some kind neighbour, stumbling in his way,
Draws up his chair, the sufferer to amuse,
And makes him happy while he tells—'The News.'"

It is the exactness of the pictures of real life, embellished with all the beauty and force of "song" which makes the poet; it is only the gifted poet who can find poetry in them—difficile est proprie communi dicere.

But it is not on light and humorous themes alone, that Sprague excels; he is master of the tender and the pathetic. The happiness of domestic life, a mother's love, and a father's affection—the memory of the loved dead, the anticipations of youth, the joy of manhood, and the calm hope of age, and "what'er the soul admires and loves!" are "clothed" with a poet's pen "in language" the most chastened and eloquent, and in "numbers" the most harmonious. How exquisitely he follows out a poetical thought and perceives its beauty, may be seen in the following lines:

"A tender creed they hold, who dare believe
The dead return, with them to joy or grieve.
How sweet, while lingering slow on shore or hill,
When all the pleasant sounds of earth are still,
When the round moon rolls through the unsifted skies,
And stars look down, as they were angels' eyes,
How sweet to dream out loud in the night wide sigh,
And hear their voices in the night wide sigh."

Our limits forbid our noticing, critically, the ode delivered at Boston on the anniversary of the two hundred year of the settlement of that city. Its merits as a poem are not equal to those of the "Curiosity," yet it is poetry of a high order. Of the many pieces he has written for the newspaper press, we can only say, they deserve a more lasting form. We hope the author will soon publish an edition of his poetry, (after having enlarged the amount,) and we are sure it will add new renown to American poetry abroad, and will prove an acceptable gift to his countrymen.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

DOINGS IN PARIS.

Extraordinary trial. Theatricals—Mademoiselle Rachel.

PARIS, DECEMBER, 1838.—A trial which took place here this week, excited more than ordinary interest. It was for murder, and under singular circumstances. A young engraver, named Perrin, became passionately fond of a young girl whose parents were well-off in the world; he demanded her hand in marriage, and as the girl loved him the parents consented, provided he had a certain sum of money saved; he boldly asserted that he had, and agreed to produce it on a given day. This day was fixed for the end of June, and the marriage was to be solemnized on the twenty-sixth of July. The unfortunate young man, all this time, did not possess a sou. At the beginning of June, he heard of a bank-bill of one thousand francs having been found in the lodging of an elderly woman, of the name of Raoulx. She got back the bill, and he conjectured that she kept it by her at her new lodging. As he was in the utmost need, he determined to make the money his own, and he accordingly entered her lodging one day that her mother had come to visit her; he attacked her with a long knife, ignorant that her mother was in the next room, and stabbed her in various places. The cries of the daughter brought in the mother, and he was obliged to assassinate her also. He at once rushed out, scarcely knowing what he did, and getting on the rail of the staircase, was in the act of slipping down with the speed of light, when a lodger in the house, who had heard the outcry, perceived him, and gave the alarm; he was seized and conducted to prison. The number of females present at the trial was immense, and they evinced the greatest sympathy for the offender. He was condemned to death, and little doubt exists of the sentence being carried into effect.

There appeared some time back, in the Court Gazette, an account of an Italian critic, Doctor Borsini, who, after having scourged with the most unsparring severity the actors of the San Carlo, at last came out himself as a bass singer with extraordinary success. He published a notice of his intemperance some time previously, and invited all his enemies to come and judge him. Well, this bold singer is at present here in Paris; he is about to occupy his time in writing libretti for the Italian Opera. A young Englishwoman, Mdlle. Anna Thillon, who has resided many years in France, has appeared at the theatre of the Renaissance with great success, both as a singer and an actress. The piece in which she made her debut is named Lady Mairiel, and turns on the love of Bernard, a jeweller, for a lady of rank. He assumes an officer's dress, and introduces himself to the lady, and in course of time becomes the object of her affections. A Vicomte d'Esblanc is a rival. He is but an indifferent character, and not very scrupulous as to the means he employs to gain a desired object. A casket of jewels is stolen, and the poor jeweller is suspected by all but his mistress, to be the criminal. She cannot hold out, however, against universal acclaim, and most unwillingly she is forced to give up her lover. A lucky chance proves that the Vicomte is the depredator. She consents to unite her lot with the humble jeweller, who then announces himself to be a man of rank and fortune, who had assumed the rank of a tradesman to avoid the conscription. So much the better for the lady, to have a wealthy and well-born husband. She says so herself, in an exceedingly pretty song, and so the piece concludes. The music of this trifling is by Pulati, and is lively and graceful. Full success attended the lady's first attempt and the new production. I scarcely ever saw an actress better received. She is exceedingly pretty, which may account for part of the favour she experienced; but she really has talent, and will prove an acquisition to the stage.

The Porte St. Martin has brought out a tragedy by M. Paul Poucher, the brother-in-law of Victor Hugo. The plot is founded on the old romantic tale of the death of Don Sebastian of Portugal, while fighting against the Moors, in 1758. He commanded an army of one hundred thousand men, but was most signally routed. His age was only twenty-five, and his character was so chivalrous and noble, that the Portuguese almost idolized him. They could not believe that he had been killed, and they expected that one day or other he would make his appearance. In the piece this story is worked up, and Don Sebastian is brought forward after the battle has been fought. His love for a girl of humble birth, and the intrigues of several claimants for the throne, form the chief part of the ground-work of the piece. Don Sebastian is at last killed, in a disturbance originating in one of the intrigues. This piece deserves praise for some of the scenes, which are powerfully written; but, on the whole, it will not keep its place on the stage.

"Mademoiselle Clairon" is the name of a vaudeville produced this week at the Gymnase. It turns on the well-known story of the ghost which appeared every night to this actress at midnight, and sent forth a long and lamentable cry of woe. The actress had driven to despair a young man who loved her, and after his death he visited her thus. That this clever woman believed firmly that she heard this cry every night, is beyond a doubt. To her dying hour she remained in the same belief. Of this story the vaudeville is made: the young man, however, is not dead. He appears alive in a blue domino at a ball, and the actress shows herself of a more plying disposition than she was at first inclined to exhibit.

Madame Folyons (formerly Léontine Fay) and her husband have entered into an engagement at the Gymnase for five years. She is to receive two thousand five hundred francs a month, (for twenty-five representations,) which is equal to about one hundred pounds sterling. Her husband is to get sixty pounds a month for the same time. This is a great sum to receive for such a period from one theatre. They are to be allowed three months recess each year.

Mademoiselle Rachel is still in the ascendant: she went to the Italian opera the other night, and the crowd which gathered around her box was so great, that in going out she could scarcely make her way to the vehicle which was to carry her home. She looks better on the stage than off; in fact, when I saw her on the boards as Andromache, I thought her decidedly handsome; she looks much younger in private than when performing. It is said that much amusement was excited at the Tuilleries, by her answer of "Thank you, monsieur and madam," to the king and queen, when they complimented her on her acting. Perhaps she conceived that such language was allowable in her, who had just treated so cavalierly on the stage the Emperor Augustus. When the question arose of making her a present, the queen inquired whether it would be more advisable to send money or a gift. On the information she received she sent her one thousand francs and a manuscript. Rachel gave the bank bill to her mother: "This is for you, and this for me," she said, locking up the letter in her desk.

HISTORICAL REMINISCENCES.

SECRET MEMOIR OF THE HOUSE OF AUSTRIA.

"Truth is stranger than fiction!" The realities of life are far more romantic than the most wild efforts of the wildest imagination and of the most luxuriant fancy; and the pictures presented to us by the hand of history are as marvellous as the illusions of a dream! The following extraordinary recital, the principal details of which were furnished us by the kindness of a lady of distinction residing on the continent, is only one more proof, if proof be wanting, of the truth of the oft-repeated phrase.

It was in the year of our salvation 1594, that Martin Grumenus, a celebrated physician and professor of judicial astrology, attached to the court of the weak and unhappy Rudolph II. emperor of Germany, and head of the illustrious house of Hapsburgh, was sitting in his apartments in the imperial palace in the famous city of Prague. Martin was at his studies, that is, reading a manuscript of judicial astrology composed by the learned Tycho Brahe, who, notwithstanding his great acquirements in the real science of astronomy, condescended to act as chief astrologer to the emperor, who, though a weak and impolitic prince, was sincerely attached to the pursuits of literature and science, or what was considered such; and no doubt both Tycho Brahe and Grumenus obtained the favour of their imperial master more by their pretended astrological knowledge than by their attainments in really useful knowledge. Gruménus was at his studies; but it must not be forgotten that, among these, was a serious study as to the comparative merits of Hungarian and Spanish wines; flacons of each sort stood before him, from which he frequently replenished a tall and elegantly-shaped glass. His meditations, such as they were, received a sudden interruption by the entrance of a servant, who informed him that a stranger requested an interview with the learned physician to the imperial court. Martin had no objection to replenish his purse by occasionally curing the ailments of persons of inferior consequence to the imperial household, and he commanded the servant to usher the stranger to his apartment.

During his absence he removed the evidence of his attachment to the pleasures of Bacchus, and seated himself in an attitude of strict abstraction from external things, and fixed attention to the manuscript of Tracya Breve.

The visitor was introduced, and was left alone with Gruménus, who beckoned him to be seated with an air of gracious dignity, which the physician considered to be exceedingly becoming in a favoured servant of the court in his communication with an unknown, but perhaps wealthy patient. But the supposed patient seemed to think otherwise, for he received the dignified salutations of his host by unceremoniously bursting into a fit of boisterous laughter. Martin, nettled at this contemptuous reception of his civility, requested, in rather abrupt terms, his visitor's name and business, and likewise to know what might have caused such an extraordinary ebullition of mirth.

"What! is my disguise so complete that the penetrating eyes of him who can scan the courses of the planets, and the stars, and the comets; the wise and the learned physician, astronomer, and astrologer, Martin Gruménus, cannot discover his old pupil and friend, Matthias of Hapsburg, brother to his patron, and if the stars predict aright! oh, Martin, the future emperor!"

Martin was a man of sense; he laid aside his assumed air of dignity, and welcomed his illustrious visitor with respectful deference, but without cringing humility. He knew the prince's danger, he joked the door of the ante-chamber, saw there was no danger from eavesdroppers, placed food and wine before his guest, who appeared weary and travel-soiled, and waited with patience the communications of his illustrious visitor.

In the meantime we will revert a little back in the history of the period.

Maximilian, the second emperor of Germany, king of Bohemia and Hungary, and archduke of Austria, died in the year of grace 1551, leaving three sons—Rudolph, who immediately succeeded him, Ernest and Matthias. Rudolph, from the time of his accession to the imperial dignity and to his hereditary dominions, discovered his total unfitness to govern; he possessed no decision of character—alternately obstinately tyrannical and weakly submissive, he contrived to bring what was then the first European power into a state of almost ludicrous degradation. He was bigoted and intolerant, and yet his miserably-conducted persecutions generally ended in his being compelled to make the most extensive submissions to his protestant subjects. His conduct to his brothers was equally absurd and cruel—he forbade them to marry, and refused to allow them even the common means of subsistence. Such was Rudolph II. Of Ernest, his second brother, historians are nearly silent, but some particulars respecting this prince have lately been discovered in the archives of the Vatican, and from this source our present information is drawn. Matthias, the third brother, alternately filled so prominent a place in the history of Europe, that his character and conduct have been largely and accurately described by the historians of the period; it is not, therefore, necessary that we should do more than allude to them here. He was restless and ambitious, and of no mean attainments; not very scrupulous, as the extraordinary events of his life prove; but, perhaps, his conduct may be extenuated by a consideration of the state of degradation to which his illustrious house and their dominions were reduced, and of the persons tyranny to which he was subjected. That he thought himself justified in the course he pursued, his celebrated proclamation at Casztell, May tenth, 1605, (twelve years after the interview we now describe,) sufficiently proves.

It was not till after his illustrious guest had done ample justice to the viands which his provident hospitality had set before him that Gruménus ventured to open the conversation. The prince informed Martin that, hearing of the dangerous illness of his brother Ernest, he determined at all risks to visit Prague, in order to consult with his friends as to the course he should pursue in case the death of Ernest should place him in the position of heir presumptive to the power of the house of Hapsburg. Among these friends he assured the physician he considered himself as one of the most trustworthy, and that he hoped to profit by the wisdom of his counsels. "I am aware, my dear Martin," said he, "that you can have no sincere attachment to the tyrant Rudolph; you may serve him professionally, considering him as a wealthy and powerful client and patient, who requires your services, and who can requite them, if he be generous enough, liberally; and this may serve your present purpose; but as a friend, a man of sense like you cannot consider him. I trust that I may now depend upon you for assistance, and, if I have ever power (and I know you think yourself that I shall ultimately succeed to the empire, as well as to the hereditary dominions of our house), the services of Martin Gruménus shall not be forgotten nor unrewarded." And first tell me, what is the real state of health of poor Ernest?"

Martin answered, that Prince Ernest's health was in that state that recovery was impossible; that immediate dissolution was not likely, but that he could hardly linger another year. He assured the prince of his steady attachment to his interests, and that he might rely both on his fidelity and on his wish to give him the best advice; but he was rather guarded in his manner, and the prince saw that there was some secret feeling in the mind of Gruménus which he was reluctant to avow.

Matthias continued:—"By the death of Ernest I become heir presumptive to the crown of Bohemia and Hungary, and I am determined, if possible, to wrest the latter from the grasp of Rudolph.

The Magnates are as much opposed to his tyranny as I am, and I don't see any obstacle to the attainment of my object. I have no remorse on the account of relationship; his conduct to me has been so unbrotherly that I should be justified by all the world—and the country itself would certainly be benefited by my instant, instead of deferred, success. There is a cloud on thy brow, Martin, which assures me that thou seest some difficulty. I conjure thee not to keep me in suspense. What is thy objection?"

The embarrassment of Gruménus became more apparent; his answers to Matthias were vague and unmeaning—very different from the usual force and precision he was wont to exhibit in his discourse. But the physician was sincerely attached to the prince who so manfully battled against the tyranny and cruelty of the emperor; he could not long resist his importunities; he confessed that there was an obstacle which he feared would be fatal to the prince's hopes—in short that Ernest, was lawfully, but secretly married to a noble lady, a Bohemian, and that she was eniente. The prince was overwhelmed with despair. Martin gave him such condoleance as the case would admit, but it was long before he could recover his usual comparative composure. At last he said, "Martin, if the expected birth should prove a male, not only my hopes would be extinguished, but the welfare of the whole of the dependencies of our house would be endangered. The confusion already prevailing throughout the empire would be enhanced. I see nothing but utter ruin to us all. Martin, what is to be done?"

It was long after midnight when Matthias of Hapsburg left the apartments of Gruménus. What took place during the remainder of their conference it is needless to relate. We shall give the result; but, in order to prevent the continual breaking of the thread of this memoir, we shall give a slight historical sketch of the events which succeeded, and which are matters of history. Ernest of Hapsburg died in the year 1556. The ambitious Matthias succeeded in wresting from the weak hands of Rudolph II., successively, the kingdoms of Hungary and Bavaria; and in the year 1612, the miserable emperor was compelled to abdicate the imperial throne, and shortly after died—to the last hankering after the authority he had so ingloriously lost, and for which he was so totally unfit. Matthias then succeeded in obtaining the imperial crown, and died in 1619, when the dominions of the house of Hapsburg were inherited by Ferdinand II., his cousin. The dominions of the house of Hapsburg, then descended in a right line to Joseph I., who was succeeded by his brother, Charles VI. The famous Pragmatic Sanction confirmed the succession to his daughter, the celebrated Maria Theresa, beyond whom it is not necessary for our purpose to trace the genealogy of the Styrian branch of this illustrious house.

We must now carry our readers to Rome, in the present year. During the preparations for the celebration of the ceremony of the coronation of the emperor of Austria as king of the Lombards, an Italian gentleman publicly stated in various salons at Rome that, if legitimate succession were alone to be regarded, he had a better right to the possession of the dominions of the house of Hapsburg than its present branch. He claimed to be descended in a right line from Ernest II., son of Maximilian II., mentioned in the commencement of this memoir; and not only so, but that he was also connected with the Styrian branch of the house by an intermarriage of one of his ancestors with a daughter of Ferdinand, the elder brother of Leopold I., but who never reigned, as he died during the lifetime of his father, Ferdinand III., and, as was supposed, without issue.

In support of this extraordinary claim Signor F—, produced an immense mass of documentary evidence, and referred to other of the same nature in the archives of the Vatican, as in the college of the Society of Jesus. From this evidence it would appear that Martin Gruménus, whom we have so often mentioned, assisted at the birth of a son to Ernest, the brother of Matthias, shortly after the interview described: that Martin succeeded in persuading the parents that the child was still-born; that it was afterward committed by him to the care of a Jesuit, who caused the boy to be properly educated; and that at proper age, he entered the army in the service of Ferdinand III. That the youth was instructed to keep his origin a secret—that he did so, the event has proved: it seems that he acquired fame and wealth during his career in arms, and ultimately settled in Italy. His descendants have taken great care in preserving evidence of their illustrious origin—hoping, perhaps, that by some revolution of fortune they might succeed to their hereditary honours; of this, however, we confess we do not see the probability. Independently of other considerations, the Pragmatic Sanction would be considered an effectual bar to the succession of any other than the descendants of Maria Theresa. Signor F— is in the prime of life, good-looking, but not otherwise distinguished than by his illustrious descent.

THE NIGHT WITH THE RIGHT.

May every year but draw more near
The time when strife shall cease,
And truth and love all hearts shall move
To live in joy and peace.
Now sorrow reigns, and earth complains,
For folly still her power maintains;
But the day shall yet appear
When the might with the right and the truth shall be;
And come what there may, stand in the way,
That day the world shall see.
Let good men ne'er of truth despair,
Though humble efforts fail;
We'll give not o'er, until once more
The righteous cause prevail.
In vain and long, enduring wrong,
The weak may strive against the strong,
But the day shall yet appear,
When the might with the right and the truth shall be;
And come what there may, stand in the way,
That day the world shall see.
Though interest pleads that noble deeds
The world will not regard,
To noble minds, whom duty binds,
No sacrifice is hard.
The brave and true may seem but few,
But how keener be their things in view;
And the day shall yet appear,
When the might with the right and the truth shall be;
And come what there may, stand in the way,
That day the world shall see.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

FESTIVALS AT VENICE.—On one of the days of the recent festivals at Venice, the Emperor of Austria proceeded to lay the first stone of the breakwater at the port of Malamocco. On this occasion the fishermen of Chioggia had prepared a fete, which afforded much gratification to the court. All the females of Chioggia in uniform, that is, in white dresses and red aprons, and handkerchiefs of the same colour on their heads, got into their barks, and advanced with their flotilla to the number of two thousand to meet the emperor's squadron, consisting of five steamers. After a sham fight, executed at the point of the island, by eight corvettes, the court returned to Venice, but under less favourable circumstances than on its arrival, the sea being rather rough, a wind having sprung up. Every individual on board, not excepting the emperor, was sea-sick. The illuminations of the Piazza of St. Mark, the Piazzetta, the Doge's Palace, and the church of St. Marc, on which forty thousand francs and the labour of three months had been expended, afforded ample compensation for the failure of some fireworks of the night before. Those monuments were all covered with illuminated glasses. On the fourteenth instant, there was a grand breakfast in the council chamber of the Ducal Palace on the occasion of the reception of the newly-appointed knights of the iron crown. All the members of the order arrived in flowing mantles and long toques. The members of the court took their seats in a gallery on the right of the table reserved for the emperor and the viceroys. As soon as their majesties took their places, the patriarch of Venice, in grand costume, repeated the Benedictus. The breakfast might have been called architectural as well as all the monuments of Venice figured in it. Thus streaks of the lion of St. Marc were offered to the guests; the wall of the campanile; the eyes of the crocodile of St. Theodore; the balustrades of the Bridge of Sighs; and other specimens of Venetian cookery, "which, in my opinion," says a correspondent of the press, who gave us these details, "were not worth a good steak at the Café de Paris." The emperor and the viceroys ate nothing. At half-past twelve o'clock the emperor rose, the patriarch repeated grace, and the cortege filed off.

THE SONIFERON.—This is a powerful hearing apparatus for the deaf, of a very curious construction. It is intended to stand upon the table at which the deaf person is sitting, and receives the voices of persons in the room, carrying the sound to the ear in such a highly magnified state that the effects upon an experimenter who is not deaf, are not very agreeable. A sound too feeble or too distant to be heard by the finest ear, becomes immediately perceptible by passing through the instrument; indeed, if the experiment be essayed at the time when universal stillness seems to prevail, the ear is soon made sensible of the fallacy of that impression by being invaded with a host of sounds as surprising as unexpected. But, notwithstanding these effects may be overpowering to a healthy ear, they are desirable to the deaf, whose faculty of hearing is become too torpid to be aroused by the ordinary stimulus. Dr. Scott, who a year or two since introduced the acoustical apparatus called ear cornets, is the inventor of the Soniferon.

FLORENCE.—This delightful city appears almost by a general assent to have become the head rendezvous of the English nobility and gentry travelling this autumn in Italy. There was never known so many British families of rank and fortune at one time resident here, as at the present moment, of which the enclosed list will afford you some idea. Schneider's Hotel, the Hotel d'York, Featherston's, Il Pellicano, Madame Homberg's on the Lung'Arno, etc., are all full, yet private lodgings are not much dearer than ordinary. A single gentleman may obtain two very genteel rooms in a good part of the town for ten scudi, (or about two pounds and five shillings,) a month. The weather has been fine and genial, and extremely favourable for invalids.

DECREASE OF THE BALTIK.—It has been observed that the waters of the Baltik are undergoing a gradual decrease, which seems to arise from some elevation of the surface of the bottom and coasts of the sea. Ancient marks are traced upon the rocks, which indicate the former level of the waters, and these are now considerably above the surface of the sea. The Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg has called to this subject the attention of Prince Menzeloff, Minister of Marine, and instructions have accordingly been given to Captain Lieutenant Reinecke, who is charged with a survey of the coast of Finland, to observe with accuracy the present elevation of the existing mark above the level of the sea, and to make new marks in rocks at known heights to serve for future observation.

THE SLEEPING BEAUTY.

Sofly tread! Cythere keeps
Vigil o'er her while she sleeps;
Voices from Elysium lull
The slumber of the beautiful!
See! The dimpled pillow glows
With her odorous breath of rose;
Like the orient May, doth break
The love-light from her cheek!
Wake her not! enchanted dreams,
A charn upon the sleeper shed!
Stir not the garland of sweet dreams,
Which sleep hath bound upon her head!

FEMALE EDUCATION IN EGYPT.—Mohammed Ali, the enterprising Pacha of Egypt, seems determined to prosecute his plans for the amelioration of society in his dominions. It appears by the late London papers, that in March last, he applied to Miss Halliday, an English lady, residing at Cairo, as a missionary teacher, to take under her charge a hundred females, connected with the royal family, consisting chiefly of the daughters, nieces, and other near relatives of the Pasha. She writes, that her school contains one hundred and fourteen pupils, and that it was steadily increasing.

A PRESENT FOR THE QUEEN.—The pagoda intended as a present for her Majesty Queen Victoria, from the Emperor of the Celestial Empire, is now on its way to England. The present has been entrusted to two mandarins of high rank, who on their arrival in England will be presented to her majesty, by Captain Piddington, of Howqua mixture notoriety.

THE "PURE OBITUARY."—A writer in a Boston paper, uses an obituary notice as a peg to hang a puff on, not of the deceased, but of the tavern where he died.

ILL-MANNERS.—Pride, ill-nature and want of sense, are the three great sources of ill-manners; without some one of these defects, no man will behave himself ill for want of experience.

LITERARY NOTICES.

BOOK TABLE.

"Hannah, a Sacred Drama."—This work, from the press of James Monroe and Co., of Boston, is issued in a style of characteristic elegance; and we are glad to find that the contents are not unworthy of their handsome exterior. The author has here thrown into a dramatic form the scriptural story of "Hannah, the mother of Samuel the prophet and judge of Israel," and has successfully exemplified the truth of the remark, that the early books of the Old Testament not only contain much matter of historical value, but they act upon the reader with a peculiar dramatic effect. The poem before us is derived from the first and second chapters of the first book of Samuel; and the five acts of the drama succeed one another in the order of the scriptural narrative. The author has exhibited much ingenuity in the management of his subject. His style is pure and lofty, and his versification, with one or two lapses, is chastened and correct. One of the exceptions we allude to may be found in the last line of the eleventh page. But the beauties of this fine poem so outnumber the defects, that we have no eye for the latter. Here is a beautiful idea.

"Behold, my heart has strangely hush'd its throes,
My senses all are calm, as the deep lake,
When the low summer wind has ceased to stir,
And the dry leaf floats on its top unwet."

The following extract cannot fail to justify our commendation with the reader:

Ekanah.—Why thus despond?
Is there no joy of friendship unfulfilled?
No humble duty left? no tranquil hope?
Am not I better to thee than ten sons?
Shall one distress rob time of all its bloom,
And leave thee desolate?
Hannah.—Not desolate.
Yet strop from Libanus its ancient trees,
And its tall peaks, and their majestic
Would shine across the plain, naked and serene,
E'en if the lovely vine should clasp its sides,
And the small wild-flower blossom round its crags.
So every human life has its chief grace,
Whom it is solitary life.
Whatever else remain. 'Tis thus with me.
I am alone in nature. The light bird
Nurses her progeny, safe, and hears their cry,
Full of maternal thankfulness, when first
Within the foliage of the branching woods,
They try their notes:—and the red lioness,
That takes delight in blood, suckles her whelps,
And fondles them, as with a mother's pride;
—Philitina's infants play about her knees:—
And Moloch counts his victims from the breast:—
While I am still denied the common boon,
None trusts, in innocence, my yearning love,
(None calls me "Mother," smiling in my arms.
My husband, on Mount Eparim, thou hast seen,
When the great eagle, who has built her nest
Beneath the highest cliff, has been away
Eastward to Jordan, and returns fatigued,
And falters in her flight so long sustained,
How she has dropped her food, at the loud shout
Of idle shepherds, for the fresh hawk's prey,
And then has perched upon the blasted fir,
Over against her cry, where she sits,
And hears her hungry young, disconsolate,
But cannot help them. So I feel bereft,
And well-nigh hopeless.

Ekanah.—Yet the same eagle
Taries not long upon her resting place,
But quick revived, leaps off, and spreads her wings,
And pierces upward, through the buoyant air,
With narrowing circles, still she soars high,
As if to meditate some new resolve;
And then, strong-nerved, she seeks again the place
Where Jordan mingles with Asphalites,
And traverses the stretching space again,
And wanders there above the winding stream,
Until she bears another booty home:
And, after all, perchance, at the ninth hour,
Her young may scream unfed. But she toils on;
For now she speeds her westward course afar,
By fertile Ajalon, and its dark brook,
That empties in the briny main of waves;
Beyond the outer coast she onward flies,
So that the setting sun may light her search
Upon the face of the Great Central Sea.
And when the twilight's past, and the white moon
Sheds her pale rays upon the loftiest hill,
We've heard the wakeful eaglets of the rock
Rejoicing roughly for their late repast.
Lean thou on God, who feeds the savage brood;
He may reward thee, Hannah, for thy faith:
—Thou art of Abraham.

"Anniversary Poem, delivered before the Boston Benevolent Literary Association, by James T. Fields."—The author has succeeded admirably in his difficult task, and has here given evidence of powers, which, if assiduously cultivated, would no doubt attain for him an enviable rank among contemporary bards. Mr. Fields is already known to the readers of the Mirror, as the author of some beautiful lyrics.

"Governor Everett's Address before the Boston Mercantile Association."—Like all the productions of the distinguished author, this address is remarkable for its appropriateness to the occasion, as well as for its grace of style, and soundness and originality of thought. It is also illumined by occasional bursts of eloquence, which it will be difficult to parallel in point of beauty and power.

Mr. Leggett, one of the most able writers of this country, has announced his intention of resuming the publication of the Platidealer.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

A correspondent informs us that the article in a late number, entitled "The Philosopher's Scalps," has been published in another work. We are sorry for it. It is good enough to have appeared originally in the Mirror.—"P. P. C." need be under no concern. His secret shall be safe with us. We are sorry of our correspondents remarks subjected him to any annoyance.—We have received from a lady correspondent, an article reflecting with some severity upon the indiscreet introduction of foreigners into our fashionable society. Our correspondent says:—"An imperial and a moustache—a faculty of humming the airs of the last Italian Opera—the manners of a waltz-de-chambre, and the accomplishments of a dancing-master, seem to be all sufficient to entitle a foreign adventurer to figure in our 'best society.' The presumption of these whiskered Lotharios passes for genteel nonchalance—their ignorance of our history and national character passes for high breeding and European elegance. We wish—but our correspondent here begins to grow scandalous. 'Can such things be?'—We must decline the favour of 'C. C.,' 'Waverley,' 'R. O. H.,' 'Veritas,' and 'D. D. D.' together with the 'Pasha's Wedding,' 'A Hushing Party,' 'Slinging,' 'Long,' 'Marion,' 'The Avenger,' 'Fables of Fashion,' and 'My first and last party.' The communications from our esteemed friends, John Neal and Professor Longfellow were received too late for this number, but will appear soon.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1839.

Prospects of New-York.—The prospects of a thriving season in every department of business and enterprise, were, we rejoice to learn, never more auspicious than at the present. Our warehouses are fuller than they have been for years, and the demand for goods keeps pace with the supply. Money is once more abundant, and every scheme of well-directed industry and adventure may easily command the "signets of war" and the means of accomplishment. Cheerful faces are as plenty as blackberries in Wall-street, and our merchants look confidently forward to a busy and bustling season. Our debt to Europe is paid off, and this fact alone affords a most remarkable proof of the elasticity of our commercial character and the wonderful resources of the country. Every branch of human occupation naturally feels the reviving influence, which beginning with our commerce, extends itself through all the various channels of enterprise. Literature and the fine arts must undoubtedly share in the genial return of prosperity, and the many new literary projects on foot, are an evidence of the encouraging anticipations of the future. One word for ourselves. The Mirror has not only "held its own" during the late times of peril and depression, but for the last few weeks its subscription list has increased to an extent unprecedented in its past history. We have only to say to our competitors in the race, "Go ahead—there is room enough for all."

Bachelors' ball.—St. Valentine's day will as usual be celebrated by a grand ball at Niblo's saloon, to be given by the old bachelors' club—the recreants! They are making preparations for a more elegant and sumptuous entertainment than ever. All married and marrying men indulge a natural spite toward the incorrigible musty old single gentlemen, who founded this most reprehensible association, whose members snap their fingers at matrimonial blessings, and make their fault their pastime. The recent official bulletins of this veteran corps show, we regret to learn, a lamentable increase of their numbers, and some plan should be speedily devised to reduce their ranks, otherwise they may be augmented to such an appalling extent, as to threaten the well-being and safety of the republic. This we leave to the ladies, whom we advise to be present on the occasion, arrayed in all their panoply of charms; and if the younger members of the fraternity can brave unscathed the battery of the rosiest smiles and sparkling eyes of our fair townswomen, their hearts must be "proof and bulwark against sense." But such a result cannot be anticipated. The ladies cannot fail to come off the conquerors, and bear away the laurels, which of right belong to them. That this has always been the case heretofore, witness the deplorable thinning of the ranks of the bachelors—the villains! after the skirmishes and engagements of every St. Valentine's day. Niblo is exerting himself to give all the eclat practicable to the fête, and is relied upon to provide an efficient auxiliary; though we half suspect he is no better than a spy in the enemy's camp, and that all his arrangements—his splendid chandeliers, his costly vases, his magnificent decorations, and his melting music, are only so many "appliances and means to boot," in behalf of the ladies and of the good cause. He can have little sympathy in common with the Beau Shatterers of the Bachelors' Club, for Niblo is a married man, and experience has taught him the priceless value of a good wife. But we are growing personal, and lay aside the pen, with the hope that those who "jest at scars" may live to "feel a wound"—and what occasion more appropriate for the infliction than the eve of St. Valentine!

Romance in the nineteenth century.—A recent letter from Thessalonica gives the details of quite a romantic adventure, which affords rich material either to the playwright or the novelist. Mustafa Pacha, one of the ablest public officers of Turkey, has recently delivered Macedonia from a formidable band of brigands, who have infested the country for upwards of four years. The means he adopted are creditable to his talents for stratagem, and his knowledge of human nature. They are too singular not to be mentioned. Having learned that a young Albanian girl, bearing the name of Theodora Maria Samik, residing at Mielnik, a town on the frontiers of Greece, had secret communications with the robbers, Mustafa had her watched and questioned, but he failed in obtaining any disclosures. He then engaged one of his lieutenants, named Ismail, a young man of remarkable personal beauty, to go and endeavour to gain her affections. This officer succeeded to such a degree that she became warmly attached to him, and informed him that her real name was Eudoxia Theresa Gherundazi, and that she was the niece of the chief of the brigade, Michael Gregorio Gherundazi, whose troop amounted to between fourteen and fifty hundred men. She painted in glowing terms the charms of their errant and adventurous life, and urged Ismail to join them. He pretended to yield to her supplications, and then learned further from her, that her uncle would hold a general muster of his band on October twenty-eighth, in the forest of Phelofidos. All this Ismail communicated to Mustafa, but, in order to avert suspicion, went with his fair one to the rendezvous. The wily Mustafa collected his troops, surrounded the assembled freebooters, and, as they refused to surrender, attacked them with all his forces. The greatest number of the brigands fell on the spot, preferring death on the field to a capture and an ignominious execution. A few escaped—for the moment, but they were afterwards taken, and are awaiting their sentence in the citadel of Thessalonica. Among the dead were found the chief, Gherundazi, whose head was cloven by a stroke from a sabre, and the young lieutenant, Ismail, whose breast had been penetrated by a musket ball. Mustafa cut off the heads of all the killed, and then paraded them in triumph through the town. The wretched Eudoxia, on discovering the treachery and subsequent death of her lover, fell into a state of complete abandonment, and lost her reason. Mustafa ordered her to be taken to his own palace, and afforded her every attention which could ameliorate the condition of her lot.

The late Charles Gilfert.—The quondam manager of the Bowery theatre was a peculiar fellow, and one of the most fascinating men of his day. At Albany he met with a Mr. Lemair, a Frenchman, of whom he borrowed money until he nearly ruined him. Lemair was one day in a towering rage at the cause of his misfortunes, and used to tell the following character-stuck story of his friend:—"Monsieur Charles Gilfert, he come to Albany. He have ruin me in my business—mes affaires. He borrow de l'argent from me to large amount. He go to New-York, and promise to send him, right away, ver quick. But, voyez-vous, when I write to him, he return me von réponse inconvenante, von impudent answer, and say, I may go to the devil for look for him. I leave Albany instantly, determined to have the grand personal satisfaction for the affront he put upon me. I walk straight away from de bateau à vapeur, de steamboat. I go to my boarding-house. I procure von large stick, and rush out of de pension to meet him. By-and-by, bientôt, I see him von large way off, very remotely. I immediately button up my coat with strong determination, and hold my stick fierce in my hand, to break his neck several times. Ven he come near, my indignation rise. He put out his hand I reject him. He smile, and look over his spectacles at me. I say, you von scoundrel, copain infame. He smile de more, and make us grand effort, a great trial, to pacify my grande indignation, and before he leave me, he borrow twenty dollars from me once more, by gar! A ver pleasant man was Monsieur Charles Gilfert; ver nice man to borrow l'argent, ma foi."

Female jockeyship.—Victoria is said to be one of the most accomplished "lady equestrians" of the day. A letter from Odessa says that her example has excited a passion for horsemanship in the ladies of Lesser Russia to an extraordinary degree. The writer affirms that there is not a lady in the whole province, with any pretensions to fashion, who, in imitation of her majesty, has not at least one saddle horse, and that some keep as many as six. He adds, "At the Cherson races of the seventh, all the horses that ran not only belonged to ladies, but were ridden by their owners, dressed in fashions, and wearing caps à la Reine Victoria. The number of horses entered was no less than eighty, most of them native breeds, which were brought to the course attended by numerous grooms in liveries, gaily decked with gold and silver lace. The first grand prize, a silver cup, valued at one thousand five hundred roubles, (about six thousand francs,) was won by Fedora, a bright bay mare, belonging to the beautiful Countess Naritschin, and ridden by herself; and the second prize, a pair of silver candlesticks, worth five hundred roubles, (about two thousand francs,) by Boujan, an entire black horse, ridden by Madame Natchajev, a native of Castellaccio, in Naples. What would the gentlemen of the Union course say to this female jockeyship! Shade of Hannah More! What ate we coming to!"

The season.—Thus far the winter in New-York has been an unusually gay one. Advantage is taken of every little fall of snow to "get up" sleigh-rides over the island; and in the evening, balls, musical parties, theatres, soirées and conversations have afforded attractions innumerable to those in search of relaxation or entertainment. On fine days, which have been neither few nor far between during the season, the side-walks of Broadway have presented a rare display of the beauty, fashion, and elegance of the city. Never did New-York appear to more advantage in the eyes of strangers, and never were the gigantic outlines of our metropolis "filling up" at a rate so prodigious, or advancing in the career of wealth and civilization with strides so rapid.

Strangers.—The hotel is already begin to be filled with strangers from all quarters of the country, and in a few weeks their numbers will doubtless be much increased. There is a prospect, too, early in the summer, of an unusual influx of visitors from the other side of the Atlantic, who will take advantage of the facility of intercourse presented in the establishment of a steam communication with Liverpool and Bristol.

Not bad.—The Cincinnati Sun thinks that the year 1839 will cut a greater figure in the world than any of its predecessors.

Straw.—Recent experiments have proved, that straw, saturated with a solution of chalk or potash, becomes incombustible.

THE SWISS HUNTER.

A BALLAD—SUNG BY MR. BRAHAM—MUSICK ARRANGED BY I. MOSCHELES.

ANDANTINO QUASI ALLEGRETTO.

Bright-ly speed the hours O'er the hun-ter's way! Free-dom blithe-ly pours There her dear-est lay! While the glad ec-hoes vy-ing all their wild reign, Sa-lute him re-ply-ing, A-gain and a-gain. Through Alps on Alps ascend-ing, He with wakeful horn, Sport with labour blend-ing, Hails the upward morn, While the glad, &c. Sweetly to reward him, Then, at day's soft wane, Oh, what strains accord him, Welcome home again! While the sad, &c.

NEW MUSIC.

THE NORTHERN REFRAIN—NO. II. OF THE NATIONAL MELODIES.

On Mrs. Horn's arrival in this country, she, like most foreigners, was delighted with the originality and touching simplicity of the morning carol of the New-York sweeps. This she committed to memory, when it occurred to her that a new melody might be so arranged as to terminate each verse with that curious musical gem. To her husband she committed the task, and the result is a production of exquisite delicacy and sweetness. A friend furnished the words, which were written in strict accordance with the lady's wishes; and the composer and writer have done their utmost to embody her thought. This little bygon is sung by Mrs. Horn in a manner peculiarly her own. On one occasion it elicited a triple encore, and produced a sensation seldom witnessed in a concert-room. The song has since become fashionable, and the carol that we had been accustomed to disregard when sung from the chimney-tops by the poor sweeps, is now warbled to admiring listeners, by fair and gentle ladies in the drawing-room! None but a man of genius like Horn could have wrought this change, or have so managed his subject as not to have rendered it nonsensical, considering that there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous. Horn is generally successful in whatever he undertakes; and in the present instance he has produced a musical novelty that cannot fail to be universally popular, at least among the good inhabitants of Gotham, whose fancy he has certainly hit. The "Northern Refrain" forms the second number of a series of "National Melodies," now in the course of publication; and is appropriately dedicated to the St. Nicholas Society, who should vote the composer a gold medal for the compliment he has paid the members of that worthy association of Knickerbockers. We would insert the words in the Mirror, but think they should never be separated from the music for which they were expressly written, and without which their effect would be in a great measure lost upon the reader. The song is published by Davis and Horn, No. 411 Broadway; and may also be had at any of the other music-stores.

THE FINE ARTS.

SULLY'S "VICTORIA."

A friend writes us that he is happy to state that Sully's difficulty with the St. George's Society, of Philadelphia, in relation to his portrait of the queen, has been "amicably" settled. He has painted a duplicate picture of her majesty, which he is to send to New-York for exhibition, the proceeds to go to the artist. The original is to remain in Philadelphia, and to be exhibited there for the benefit of the St. George's Society! This is shabby business on the part of the society, whose loyalty in the affair does not appear to be of the most disinterested character, if we may judge from the spirit of speculation manifested in their dealings with Sully. Their admiration of her majesty and of the fine arts, appears to be made subordinate altogether to the mercenary object of "turning a penny" to their advantage. We are surprised that Sully could have consented to an arrangement, by which he was deprived of the profits of his exhibition, and still more are we surprised that a respectable society of Englishmen should have boggled upon the question whether an artist and a man of genius, should be entitled to the trivial benefit to be derived from the production of his pencil. The compliment of giving him, one of the greatest of living artists, a commission to paint the queen, has been robbed of all its grace by the sordid conduct of the society, while it must be anything but flattering to Victoria, to learn that it was not an impulse of loyalty, which induced her liege subjects, in Philadelphia, to beg her gracious permission to sit to Sully, but a motive of speculation, a huckstering desire of gain.

THE DRAMA.

The present season at the Park theatre, we regret to learn, will be a losing one. This is principally owing to causes over which Mr. Simpson had no control, among which the failure of Vestris is the most conspicuous. Everything, however, promises well for the coming season. Rumour speaks of the engagement of much talent and novelty from the other side of the water, among whom we have heard Miss Romer and Charles Keen named. Before their arrival our old favourites, Miss Tree, Miss Clifton, Caradori Allen, and Augusta, will return to us; and they will doubtless meet with a cordial welcome from the public.

We have several communications concurring in the advice we gave last week to Wallack. His audience really wish to see him once more in front of his own foot-lights. It has been said that Wallack the actor, has not recently been so successful as Wallack the manager. This may be in part true. The last time he played at the National, his audiences were thin. But the cause was obvious. He appeared in nothing new. Everybody had seen him, time and again, in Macbeth, Rolla, Dick Dashiell, and the rest of his parts. If he had taken the same pains for himself that he has for others in producing novelties, he would have found his attractions as a star as great as formerly. The truth is, Wallack is a better actor now than he ever was, but he must give us something that we have not seen over and over again. We understand that the part of Claude Melnott, in the Lady of Lyons, was written by Bulwer expressly for him. Why has he not played it? It would of itself, cast as he can cast it, and got up as he can get it up, fill his theatre. We have an original historical play before us, and a capital affair it is, full of fine writing and stirring incident. And we undertake to say, that if Wallack would study the principal part, and produce the piece, it would be a hit, and he would find himself repaid for his trouble. There is no deficiency of new pieces, but they must be studied. We know that Wallack studies to please, but if he will only please to study, we promise him a brilliant career, for his talents, as an actor, are of a peculiar description, and of the very highest order. We do not intend this as a puff, but rather as rap over the knuckles, as we feel vexed that one, who is doing so much for the public, does so little for himself. If he does not produce the Lady of Lyons soon, we shall think him blind to his own interests.

There is every prospect now, that the Bowery theatre will be rebuilt. Hamblin's subscription papers are nearly filled, and a report will be made to open the establishment in May. Flynn is also proceeding with spirit in the construction of the new Chatham theatre. He left a plan of it a few days since with us, and if it is finished in the manner contemplated, it will be a neat and handsome edifice. Niblo's Opera-house is "progressing," as all who pass up Broadway can testify, from the "clink of hammers closing rivets up," which gives busy note of preparation. This will undoubtedly be one of the great attractions of the summer season.

ON DITS.

A clever wag of this city has a farce in preparation, called "The Defaulters." It is said that the ponderous Pierson will sustain the character of the Collector, and Povey that of the District Attorney.

What has become of Major Noah's new play! When is it to be produced? We have read it, and feel sure of its success. Who is to have it, Celeste or Augusta?

By late London papers before us, we perceive that Rice has found out a new way to please John Bull. The popularity of "Jim Crow" seems to be eclipsed by the "new fancy song" of "Such a gittin up stairs."

The works of Mrs. Osgood, an American poetess, residing in London, have been published, and met with a large sale in that metropolis. The critics speak highly of the productions of this lady.

Captain Marryat's new work, embracing his travels in this country, may shortly be expected from the press of Messrs. Lea and Blanchard.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. Terms, five cents per annum, payable in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

G. P. Scott, Printer, corner of John and Gold-streets

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL, DEVOTED TO LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR.) SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NUMBER ONE BARCLAY-STREET, NEXT TO THE CORNER OF BROADWAY. (PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.)

VOLUME SIXTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1839.

NUMBER THIRTY-THREE.

ORIGINAL TALES.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

BY JOHN NEAL.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

The White Hills—and the Notch.

We were on our way through the white hills of New-Hampshire. It was toward sunset, in the month of July, after one of the hottest days of the hottest summer I ever knew. We were six inside, without reckoning bonnets, children, or bandboxes; covered with dust, out of humour with ourselves, the driver, the stage, the horses, the weather, and every thing else; and after a dead pull of eight mortal hours upon the stretch, part of the time through a loose gray sand, like powdered oatmeal, six inches deep, and the rest up hill, were just entering the Notch—a vast, cool, shadowy gorge of the mountains, where it was evident enough a smart shower must have fallen within two or three hours at furthest, so thoroughly washed was the broad smooth high way, so noisy the birds, and so perfectly transparent the overarching trees—peradventure, while we were watching the sky, and listening to the reverberations of distant thunder, or sweltering and sulking in the vast hollow, where the Wyleys had perished so miserably but a short time before, wondering at the miraculous escape of the cottage they fled from, as they saw through the darkness of midnight the foundations of the great deep broken up! the mountains tumbling from their thrones and rushing together! yea, the bright thunder itself, and the very skies, falling in ponderous fragments about their path!

Mount Washington was right before us now, "in golden panoply complete;" the scattered patches of snow that were left, burning like molten rubies in every hollow the sun could reach, the rocky helmet above, and the pomp of clouds below, luminous with fiery purple—a sort of inward glory—a great upheaving, self-illumination and self-sustaining power. The stage stopped of itself. The shaft-horses leaned back with all their strength, and the high-spirited leaders, coming round with a lurch at the foot of the hill we were just beginning to go up, and planting their hoofs on a little patch of damp turf they found there, stood looking at us with an expression that was not to be trifled with. I wish you could have seen their eyes!—their heaving manes—their dilated nostrils—and their out-stretched necks! The appeal was irresistible—there was nothing more to be said. The door flew open at once; and out we bundled!—six of the happiest human creatures you ever met with, of our age, and three of the noisiest, I promise you, after we had once felt the fresh grass with our feet, and breathed for a few moments the richly-scented wind, that came up, sounding and sweeping through the gorge, as from the innermost depths of the wilderness; flavoured not only with the wild blossoming trees that flourish there, the pond-lilies and the sweet ferns, but like the perfumed shelter of the east, hallowed as it were, by the delicious coolness and purity of mountain-snow. The smaller children shouted for joy; and the "children of a larger growth" would have shouted with them, had they been better acquainted, or not altogether so well brought up. A long, though not sleep hill, was before us, and a most beautiful sky. So, beseeching the driver to take his own time, and give the horses a good breathing before he followed, we set off in good earnest for a tramp through the Notch; some taking one side of the road and some the other, two or three loitering, as if they had the whole afternoon before them, and others labouring straight-forward, without looking to the right or left, as if with a settled determination to be there first, and have the job off their hands; the two younger children racing about, higher and thither, and peeping with solemn bright eyes into the undergrowth, and whispering together, as if they were haunted; and the eldest, a brave little romp—and not so very little neither, she'd have you to know—with large laughing eyes, plentiful hair, a generous mouth, and the whitest teeth, if not the reddest lips, I had seen for a twelvemonth—just beginning to hide both shoulders with great care, to tremble and blush, without knowing why, to look and listen, with murmuring lips and drooping eyelids, and to feel at the approach of twilight, as if she were undergoing a spiritual transformation—just flowering upon the outer verge of hopeful and mysterious womanhood—overflowing with childish joy, and starting off by herself, as though in search of wild flowers or butterflies, and refusing the arm of a fashionably-dressed young fellow, with a very handsome face and most unexceptionable tie; just out of college, and ready to go a bird-nesting anywhere but in the woods, or after shells, any where but along the sea-shore, to oblige a pretty girl; one of those young gentlemen, so abundant every where just now, who are not ashamed to go fingering their way in straw-coloured gloves, through the great northern wilderness, or a tip-toe among the everlasting thunders of Niagara.

There was a wonderful freshness and heartiness in the air; a sort of healthy music all about us, and within us: above and below, and whithersoever we turned, there was a look of new and rejoicing life—a broad and generous wholeness—a vast and beautiful repose, worthy of man's exalted nature. The sky was of the clearest blue—earth of the deepest green. We could hear the rattling and ringing of many waters among the old upturned roots, and huge dislocated masses of rock, on both sides of our way, like subterranean laughter; and though we could see nothing of the cheerful waters themselves, they were so far below us—and our pathway just here was like a narrow bridge flung over the abyss, at a single cast; there were occasional flashes of upward sunshine to be found, loitering and playing for a moment underneath the topmost branches of the more lofty and aged trees, lighting up the bark, or interweaving their threads of filmy gold with the rich pendant moss, that hung like tattered banners over the trembling undergrowth, till warp and woof were all a-fire with the confused and gorgeous blazony, and we were reminded at every step of Leigh Hunt's "patches of sunshine." We stopped; and, before we knew it, our voices had all died away in a whisper—not one of us had the heart, for a long while, to speak above his breath. Even the little children were mute with awe. There was the huge mountain right before us, burning with unquenchable fire, and bearing up the very sky, as it seemed; for the white clouds were tumbling and rolling a thousand feet below the top; and here, on every side of us, were the last of the aboriginal pines—trees that were found flourishing here ages and ages ago—the pyramids of the North American forest; not a few of them "barkless and branchless," and like those of the Alps, "wrecks of a single winter!"—their overladen strength having bowed and broken at last, under the accumulated snows of a "single winter," with the noise of a midnight avalanche; though the main shaft, which had once upheld a canopy like a cloud, continued where it grew, unchanged and untroubled, steadfast and motionless, and perishing only as the mountains perish, by imperceptible and slow decay. There were a multitude of other trees too, and all sorts of New-England shrubbery—the silver birch, the flowering dog-wood, the mountain-laurel, and the mountain-ash, the wild-blossoming cherry, the savage hemlock, and the smooth bright beech, with here and there a thrifty bass—both a week or two before in full feather, and swarming with wild honey-bees; and all turning away from the dusty thoroughfare, with a beautiful instinct, and stretching out their arms, with whatever there might be of greenness left, or life or health, toward the deep of the wilderness, and all stooping reverentially over the dim gulf below, with an evident yearning for the companionship of the cheerful waters there.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES FROM THE GERMAN.

Fix following sketch from the German of Hoffmann, is a fair specimen of his humorous vein. It is a picture of his own sufferings at the Aesthetic Café of Berlin, where all literary lions, and others, were fed with convenient food, "from tea and bread and butter up to oysters and Rhine wine," (von The eund Butterbrod, bis hinauf zu Austern und Rheinwein). The sketch is supposed to have been written with a pencil upon the blank leaves of a music-book, after the company, tired with the never-ending variations for the pianoforte by Sebastian Bach, had left the musician alone.

MUSICAL SUFFERINGS OF JOHN KREISLER.*

BY PROFESSOR LONGFELLOW.

They have all gone! I might have known it by the whispering, shuffling, coughing, buzzing behind all the notes of the gamut. It was a true swarm of bees, leaving the old hive. Gottlieb has lighted fresh candles for me, and placed a bottle of Burgundy on the pianoforte. I can play no more, I am perfectly exhausted. My glorious old friend here on the music-stand is to blame for that. Again he has borne me away through the air, as Mephistopheles did Faust, and so high, that I took not the slightest notice of the little men under me, though I dare say they made noise enough. A rascally, worthless, wasted evening! But now I am well and merry! However, while I was playing, I took out my pencil, and on page sixty-three, under the last system, noted down a couple of good flourishes in cipher with my right hand, while the left was struggling away in the torrent of sweet sounds. Upon the blank page at the end I go on writing. I leave all ciphers and sweet tones, and with true delight, like a sick man restored to health, who can never stop relating what he has suffered, I note down here circumstantially the dire agonies of this evening's tea-party. And not for myself alone, but likewise for all those who from time to time may amuse and edify themselves with my copy of John Sebastian Bach's Variations for the Pianoforte, published by Nageli in Zürich, and who find my marks at the end of the thirtieth variation, and lead on by the great latin Verte, (I will write it down the moment I get through this doleful statement of grievances), turn over the leaf and read.

*The Capellmeister.—Leader of an orchestra.

They will at once see the connexion. They know that the Geheimerath Rödelein's house is a charming house to visit in, and that he has two daughters, of whom the whole fashionable world proclaims with enthusiasm that they dance like goddesses, speak French like angels, and play and sing and draw like the Muses. The Geheimerath Rödelein is a rich man. At his quarterly dinners he brings on the most beautiful wines and richest dishes. All is established on a footing of the greatest elegance; and whoever at his tea-parties does not amuse himself heavenly, has no tan, no esprit, and particularly no taste for the fine arts. It is with an eye to these, that with the tea, punch, wine, ice-creams, etc., a little music is always served up, which, like the other refreshments, is very quietly swallowed by the fashionable world.

The arrangements are as follows:—After every guest has had time enough to drink as many cups of tea as he may wish, and punch and ices have been handed round twice, the servants wheel out the card-tables for the elder and more solid part of the company, who had rather play cards than any musical instrument; and to tell the truth, this kind of playing does not make such a useless noise as others, and you hear only the clink of money.

This is a hint for the younger part of the company to pounce upon the Misses Rödelein. A great tumult ensues; in the midst of which you can distinguish these words—

"Schönes Fräulein! do not refuse us the gratification of your heavenly talent! Oh, sing something! that's a good dear!—impossible—had cold—the last ball! have not practised anything—oh, do, do, we beg of you," etc.

Meanwhile Gottlieb has opened the pianoforte, and placed the well-known music-book on the stand; and from the card-table cries the respectable mamma—

"Chances done, mes enfans!"

That is the cue of my part. I place myself at the pianoforte, and the Rödeleins are led up to the instrument in triumph.

And now another difficulty arises. Neither wishes to sing first.

"You know, dear Nanette, how dreadful hoarse I am."

"Why, my dear Marie, I am as hoarse as you are."

"I sing so badly!"

"O, my dear child; do begin!"

My suggestion, (I always make the same) that they should both begin together with a duet, is loudly applauded—the music-book is thumbed over, and the leaf, carefully folded down, is at length found, and away we go with Dolce dell' anima, etc.

To tell the truth, the talent of the Misses Rödelein is not the smallest. I have been an instructor here only five years, and little short of two years in the Rödelein family. In this short time, Fräulein Nanette has made such progress, that a tune, which she has heard at the theatre only ten times, and has played on the pianoforte, at farthest, ten times more, she will sing right off, so that you know in a moment, what it is. Traulein Marie catches it at the eighth time; and if she is sometimes a quarter of a note lower than the pianoforte, after all it is very tolerable, considering her pretty little doll-face, and very passable rosy-lips.

After the duet, a universal chorus of applause! And now arrietas and duettinos succeed each other, and right merrily I hammer away at the thousand-times-repeated accompaniment. During the singing, the Finanzrätlin Eberstein, by coughing and humming, has given to understand that she also sings. Fräulein Nanette says:—

"But, my dear Finanzrätlin, now you must let us hear your exquisite voice."

A new tumult arises. She has a bad cold in her head—she does not know anything by heart! Gottlieb brings straightway two armfuls of music-books; and the leaves are turned over again and again. First she thinks she will sing Der Hölle Rache, etc., then Hebe, sich, etc., then Ach, Ich liebe, etc. In this embarrassment, I propose, Ein Veilchen auf der Wiese, etc. But she is for the hero-rock style: she wants to make a display, and finally selects the aria in Constantia.

O scream, squeak, mian, gurgle, groan, agonize, quiver, quaver, just as much as you please, madam—I have my foot on the fortissimo pedal, and thunder myself deaf! O Satan, Satan! which of thy goblins damned has got into this throat, pinching, and kicking and cuffing the tones about so! Four strings have snapped already and one hammer is lamed for life. My ears ring again—my head hums—my nerves tremble! Have all the harsh notes from the cracked trumpet of a strolling-player been imprisoned in this little throat! (But this excites me—I must drink a glass of Burgundy.)

The applause was unbounded; and some one observed that the Finanzrätlin and Mozart had put me quite in a blaze. I smiled with down-cast eyes, very stupidly. I could but acknowledge. And now all talents, which hitherto had bloomed unseen, were in motion, wildly alternating and fro. They were bent upon a concert of music; tutti, finales, choruses must be performed. The Canonici Kratzer sang, you know, a heavenly bass, as was observed by the gentleman yonder, with the head of Titus Andronicus, who modestly remarked also, that he himself was properly only a second-rate tenor; but, though he said it, who should not say it, was nevertheless member of several academies of music. Forthwith preparations are made for the first chorus in the opera of Titus. It went off gloriously. The Canonici, standing alone behind me, thundered out the bass over my head, as if he were singing with bass-drums and trumpet obligato in a cathedral. He struck the notes gloriously; but in his hurry he got the tempo just about twice too slow. However, he was true to himself at least in this, that through the whole piece he dragged along just half a beat behind the rest. The others showed a most decided penchant for the ancient Greek music, which, as is well known, having nothing to do with harmony, ran on in unison or monotone. They all sang treble, with slight variations, caused by accidental rising and falling of the voice, say some quarter of a note.

This somewhat noisy affair produced an universal tragical state of feeling, namely a kind of terror, even at the card-tables, which for the moment could no longer, as before, chime in, melodramatically, by weaving into the music sundry exclamations; as, for instance:

"Oh! I loved—eight and forty—was so happy—I pass—then I knew not—whist—pangs of love—follow suit, etc."—It has a very pretty effect. (I fill my glass.)

That was the highest point of the musical exhibition this evening. Now it is all over, thought I to myself. I shut the book, and got up from the pianoforte. But the baron, my ancient tenor, came up to me, and said:

"My dear Herr Capellmeister, they say you play the most exquisite voluntaries! Now do play us one: only a short one, I entreat you!"

I answered very dryly, that to-day my fantasies had all gone a wool-gathering; and while we are talking about it, a devil, in the shape of a dandy, with two waistcoats, had smelt out Bach's variations, which were lying under my hat in the next room. He thinks they are merely little variations, such as Nel cor mio non piu sento, or, Ah, vous dirai-je, maman, etc., and insists upon it, that I shall play them. I try to excuse myself, but they all attack me. So then, listen, and burst with ennui, think I to myself—and begin to work away.

When I had got to variation number three, several ladies departed, followed by the gentleman with the Titus-Andronicus head. The Rodeleins, as their teacher was playing, stood it out, though not without difficulty, to number twelve. Number fifteen made the man with two waistcoats take to his heels. Out of most excessive politeness, the baron stood till number thirty, and drank up all the punch, which Gottlieb placed on the pianoforte for me.

I should have brought all to a happy conclusion, but, alas! this number thirty—the theme—tore me irresistibly away. Suddenly the quarto leaves spread out to a gigantic folio, on which a thousand imitations and developments of the theme stood written, and I could not choose, but play them. The notes became alive, and glimmered and hopped all round about me—an electric fire streamed through the tips of my fingers into the keys—the spirit, from which it gushed forth, spread his broad wings over my soul, the whole room was filled with a thick mist, in which the candles burned dim—and through which peered forth now a nose, and anon a pair of eyes, and then suddenly vanished away again. And thus it came to pass, that I was left alone with my Sebastian Bach, by Gottlieb attended, as by a familiar spirit. (Your good health, sir.)

Is an honest musician to be tormented with music, as I have been to-day, and am so often tormented? Verily, no art is so damnable abused, as this same glorious, holy Musica, who, in her delicate being, is so easily desecrated. Have you real talent—real feeling for art? Then study music—do something worthy of the art—and dedicate your whole soul to the beloved saint. If without this you have a fancy for quavers and demi-semi-quavers, practise for yourself and by yourself, and torment not therewith the Capellmeister Kneiser and others.

Well, now I might go home, and put the finishing touch to my sonata for the pianoforte: but it is not yet eleven o'clock, and wihah, a beautiful summer night. I will lay any wager, that at my next-door neighbour's, (the Oberbergermeister), the young ladies are sitting at the window, screaming down into the street for the twentieth time, with harsh, sharp, piercing voices. Wenn mir dein Auge strahlet!—but only the first stanza, over and over again. Obliquely across the way, some one is murdering the flute, and has, wihah, lungs like Raneau's nephew, and in notes of "linked sweetness long drawn out," his neighbour is making acoustical experiments on the French horn. The numerous dogs of the neighbourhood are growing uneasy, and my landlord's cat, inspired by that sweet dew, is making love by my window (for, of course, my musico-poetick laboratory, is an attack, by certain tender confessions—upward through the whole chromatic scale, soft complaining, to the neighbour's pass, with whom he has been in love since March last! Till this is all fairly over, I think I will sit quietly here. Besides, there is still blank paper and Burgundy left, of which I forthwith take a sip.

There is, as I have heard, an ancient law, forbidding those who followed any noisy handicraft from living near literary men. Should not then musical composers, poor, and hard beset, and who, moreover, are forced to coin their inspiration into gold, to spin out the thread of life wihah, be allowed to apply this law to themselves, and banish out of the neighbourhood all ballad-singers and bachelors! What would a painter say, while transferring to his canvass, a form of ideal beauty, if you should hold up before him all manner of wild faces and ugly masks! He might shut his eyes, and in this way, at least, quiesce follow out the images of fancy. Cotton, in one's ears, is of no use: one still hears the dreadful massacre. And then the idea—the bare idea, "Now they are going to sing—now the horn strikes up!"—is enough to send one's sublimest conceptions to the very devil!"*

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

A CHAPTER ON DANCING.

SOME few years back we met, in Piccadilly, a young student of the Royal Academy of Painting, who, on our inquiring his progress in "the" art (as artists somewhat presumptuously denominate their profession), informed us that "he got on pretty well in everything but grace," and that he was then on his way to the National Gallery to copy the Piping Faun, in order to learn a little of it. We never think of this interview but with a smile. Surely grace, as well as grace, be called the natural symmetry of the mind, is no more a thing to be arrived at vi et armis than it is to be obtained by high connexions or government patronage. As well might a deformed man, by contemplating the Apollo Belvidere, imagine that his hump would gradually subside, his knocked knees after a time be straight, and his various bodily anomalies at last, in the end, that mutual harmony of aspect of the proportions of the celebrated statue. Now, we believe, it is because of the prevalence of this singular idea that grace is a sort of thing which is to be acquired just as army honours sometimes are, "by purchase," that the English, as a nation, are the very worst dancers in Europe.

The power to play on a musical instrument with expression is not so much the consequence of practice as the cause of the desire to overcome the mechanical portion of the study. The power of imitation in the pupil may doubtless enable him to play, after a fashion, something in the same way as he plays who has the power of expression; but imitation of genius is a poor substitute for it, or else John Reeve might have charmed us quite as much on Othello as Keen did himself. It is in vain, therefore, for any one to attempt to learn to dance (unless to dance means only to go through certain mechanical evolutions) unless he possesses that symmetry of mind, that exquisite perception of the morally as well as physically beautiful, which the dancing-master, however great in inculcating anti-angular elbows and circular portions of limb, cannot give him, and which he can only possess naturally. The dancer nascitur, non fit, just as the poet and the painter are, and just as hoisers and lamp-lighters are not.

This paper was suggested by the perusal of a pamphlet, called "An Essay on the Art of Dancing, viewed in connection with Physical Education." In this pamphlet the author talks about "acquiring grace" much in the same way as our young friend the student of painting did. Dancing, with him, (the author) is made out to be nothing else but a piece of sublime mechanics, with which the heart has nothing whatever to do, and with which it is necessary that the head should very little trouble itself. Now, we contend that the art of dancing, regarded merely in this manner, is a ludicrous, absurd, and superfluous affair altogether. It is true that, even practised however mechanically, it contributes to the healthfulness of the body; but surely a run over the fields, in spring or autumn, where the restrictions of the master are not influencing the youthful mind, is much more likely to do the child good, and more likely to benefit even the grown-up person, than a mechanical, unenjoying moving of the limbs in a heated ball-room, or at all events, à la mode. Battledore and shuttlecock might as well be substituted into a science, simply because every one knows that it is a healthful pastime; and it would not be at all absurd, if mechanical dancing were permitted to be styled a science, that to each of our colleges, and to academies of minor pretensions, should be attached a regius professor of running about as fast as possible, and a teacher of the science of getting up early in the morning. Dancing is always a good thing, seeing that it consists of bodily motion; but it does not begin to be a science or an art until it first partakes of the influence of poetry—till it is affected by the heart and the intellect. How widely different the dancing of a third-rate Italian professor and the dancing of Mr. Gilbert, of Drury-lane, who is one of the best English male dancers living. With the latter, everything is body. His face, when he is dancing vigorously, has no more an expression of intellectual excitement in it than when he is dancing the least fervent pas seul on record. His attitudes are mechanically elegant, but they indicate nothing, except, perhaps, pliability of ham-string and undoubted strength of body. His jumps are truly tremendous; he vaults from wing to wing like a ternaceous eagle; and he can stand on one toe and pirouette with the facility of a pair of compasses; but there is no mind necessary to the accomplishing of all these things—no more than is necessary to the devouring an inordinate quantity of rum-pot. Some one said of some one's imitation of a drunken man on horseback, that the imitator was "beautiful drunk except on the legs!" so, also, may it be mentioned of Mr. Gilbert's dancing, that he dances with everything but his mind, which he has no doubt left in the company of his common-life habits in his dressing-room. Not so, however, with the Italian dancer. He is the poetry of motion, quite as much so as the other's is the most inflated prose. Dancing before an audience, with him, does not appear to be so much a matter of bodily endeavour as a fervent work of love—an indulgence in a favorite luxury. If engaged in a pas de deux with the beloved of his soul, mark how he treats with contempt the received positions of his art. Does he think of vowing eternal constancy while standing on one leg and pointing the toe of the other scientifically towards the heavens! Does he think of mistaking a French dancing-master's embrace for the fervent pressure to his bosom of his bosom's rightest star? Does he think of evincing his dejection or anger by jerking himself from her with a sort of appoggiatura of his knees, and whimsically fall into a settled despair by terminating his bodily excursions with the fifth position! Does he think of heaving his bosom and raising his eyes in trance while the playing of the orchestra, never looking his entrailles till the end of a bar, is questioning forgiveness until the violin has come home to its key-note! Not he! Graceful dancing with him has become not an object, but a means of obtaining his object—the possession of the lady he is making love to. His dancing is the visible discovery of his heart's feelings—its fervour, its hopefulness, its intense and sincere affection, and its humility. These are the things which in the Italian's dancing strike us, which we understand, and which excite our sympathy; but in the Englishman's the only things which strike us are his body's power and our utter inability to know what he means by any one of his wondrous endeavours, except that he is determined to astonish us by their immensity.

No dancing, when it is something beyond what is merely mechanical, is a true and a worthy sister of painting, poetry, and music; but, when it descends to the level of mere meaningless motion, it is no more entitled to be called an art than the trundling of a hoop.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

ANOTHER TAMER OF RHUTES.—The Marseilles print, Le Semaphore, publishes the following miraculous piece of news from Tuscany, which attracts the attention of most of our Parisian contemporaries.—"We are here all in astonishment, since the arrival from Columbia of the American vessel at Bustard. It has brought Senor Martin Oataya, his son Pameo, and a racer of a new description, which Senor Martin has succeeded in taming with wonderful dexterity. This racer is a color of the Coruilliers, of enormous size, the two extremities of his extended wings is thirty-two feet. He has been rendered so gentle and tractable, that Martin Oataya's son uses him as a horse, gets upon his back, and to the astonishment of all, flies with him to an immense height. Young Pameo manages him as easily as a horse by means of a little stick with a steel point. His first ascension took place yesterday at noon. He rose from the Palace of Arnes, and at a certain elevation young Pameo stood up and saluted the Legation people by waving his handkerchief. He next got astride his steed, and they disappeared in a trice. The bird and boy reached Florence in twelve minutes, and were back in the evening. The child was the bearer of certificates from the Florence authorities. Every body hastens to see the condor, the price of admission being two francs.

LONG CONTINUED COLD.—We are no advocate for having people go too warmly clad. And yet much mischief often results to the human constitution from being subjected to long continued cold. Of this the following statements, most unquestionably true, may serve as an illustration.—A physician of this city, getting lost one night, remained so long in the intensely cold air, that he was nearly frozen when he found his way to a fire, and from that day to this, though many years have elapsed, he has required nearly double the amount of clothing necessary to keep him warm before.—A worthy gentleman in Providence assures us, that being necessitated to ride several days and nights in succession, in the United States mail stage, he became so excessively chilled, that he has ever since not only required more clothing than formerly, but is peculiarly susceptible to the influence of cold in every degree.—Our own experience has been somewhat similar to that which has been described. Compelled some two years since, to ride for a whole night—and an exceedingly cold one—in the mail stage, and to suffer extreme cold the day following, we suffered the punishment appropriate, the next summer, in severe and protracted general debility, and in an increased susceptibility to take cold, from which we have as yet hardly recovered.

AFFECTED TITLES.—A most barbarous taste for titles has, from time to time, exhibited itself among authors. Some works have been called, "Matches lighted by the Divine Fire," and one "The Gun of Penitence," a collection of passages from the fathers is called "The shop of the Spiritual Apothecary." We have "The Bank of Faith," and "Six-penny-worth of Divine Spirit." One of these works bears the following elaborate title: "Some fine Baskets baked in the oven of Charity, carefully preserved for the Chickens of the Church, the Sparrows of the Spirit, and the sweet Swallows of Salvation." Sometimes their quaintness have some humour. One Sir Humphrey Lind, a zealous puritan, published a work which a Jesuit answered by another, entitled "A Pair of Spectacles for Sir Humphrey Lind's Spectacles." Some of these obscure titles have an entertaining absurdity; as "The three Daughters of Job," which is a treatise on the three virtues of patience, fortitude, and pain. "The Innocent Love, or the Holy Knight," is a description of the ardours of a saint for the Virgin. "The sound of the Trumpet," is a work on the day of judgment, and "A Fan to drive away Piles," is a theological treatise on Purgatory.

LAKE AVERNUS. This lake was separated from the sea by an earthquake. It is situated in a valley, and appears to be the crater of an extinguished volcano. The epithet Avernus is a Greek word, signifying without birds; these lakes, indeed, were formerly so surrounded by forests, that the sulphureous exhalations destroyed all birds that approached them. In these dreary forests lived the Cimmerians, a barbarous people who exercised the profession of fortune telling. These mysterious worshippers lived in deep grottoes, which were impenetrable to the rays of the sun. Whether these people really existed or not, the belief of such a circumstance contributed, in no small degree, to the horror of these places. It is said these extraordinary men were destroyed by a king of Pozzuoli, to whom they had predicted an event which unfortunately never took place. Octavius Augustus afterwards cut down all the forests, and this lake of Pluto's kingdom now retains nothing of its former condition but the mere name.

ANECDOTE OF THE GIRAFFE.—The New-Orleans Sun relates a humorous story of a very well-to-do, good-looking person, who was curious to see the Giraffe, and who stepped up to the "man wot" receives the money, with—"Is the Giraffe to be seen here?" "Yes, sir." "I want to see him." "Very well, sir." "It is fifty cents, isn't it?" "One dollar, sir. Fifty cents for servants." "Well, I'm a servant." "You a servant!" "Yes, sir." "The d—!" "Whose?" "Yours, sir—your humble servant." "Walk-in, and take a seat. The joke is worth the price of admission."

HONESTY IN RAGS.—A beggar asking Doctor Snollett for alms, he gave him, through mistake, a guinea. The poor fellow, on perceiving it, hobbled after him to return it; on which Snollett returned it to him, with another guinea, as a reward for his honesty, exclaiming, at the same time, "What a lodging honesty has taken up with!"

* Paintsstocke. T. I. p. 37. et seq.

A LESSON FOR COQUETTES.

"We have a visitor to-day," said Lord Pallister to his niece, the lovely Elizabeth Pallister, who was on a visit for a week to her rich uncle.

"Who is it," said the lady, "a lady or gentleman?"

"A gentleman—Mr. Jones."

"And who is Mr. Jones—is it Bumper Squire Jones, or the renowned Tom?"

But we will save his lordship the trouble of describing who Mr. Jones was. He was simply Mr. Jones, of Piercefield, in the county of Suffolk. Now this description is very short, but it is quite sufficient to describe Mr. Jones. It is evident he was not of very ancient gentility—had he been so, he would have been Mr. Jones of Piercefield Hall, or Piercefield Manor; he was not a retired merchant, or he would have been Mr. Jones of Piercefield House; neither could he be a retired shopkeeper, or his house would have been dignified with the euphonious name of Rose Villa, or Bellevue Cottage, or Piercefield Lodge. But Mr. Jones's house was a very good house, it stood on a lawn only one hundred yards from the road-side, and the entrance-gate was suspended between massive stone piers, surmounted with round balls. It is, therefore, evident that its owner was a man of a small independent fortune, and that he was a gentleman by two or three descents. Now, Mr. Jones was a bachelor, his age twenty-five, his education such as he could obtain at a celebrated endowed school in the neighbourhood; he was eminently handsome, but could not pretend to great abilities; but he was good-natured and well-dispositioned, and a special favourite of Lord Pallister.

Now, Miss Pallister, besides being a wit, was a little bit of a coquette—just sufficient of evil to be disposed to prevent her being an angel, but she was a very charming lady. She therefore debated with herself as to the course she should pursue towards Mr. Jones, whether she should abash the poor squire by her satire, astonish him by her wit, or fascinate him by her condescension, and finally determined to be ruled by circumstances. Accordingly, after having been introduced to her uncle, Miss Pallister occupied the five minutes which usually intervene between the completion of the toilet and the serving of dinner in surveying the fortress she meant to attack. "Not at all distinguished in his appearance," was her first thought, "but the man is decidedly handsome," her second.

People may talk of their appreciation of intellectual gifts, but there are few who are indifferent to personal beauty; and when Mr. Jones led the lady to the dining-room, he was favoured with the sweetest of smiles, and during dinner, and until she retired to the drawing-room, she had directed the full battery of her charms and graces against the heart of Mr. Jones. She was witty without ill-nature, and vivacious without being rude; but when she was alone she confessed to herself that she had not been so successful as she had hoped to be. Jones had listened to her conversation, but he had not expressed, and did not seem to feel, any great admiration of either her wit or her beauty; but his polite replies and accommodating affirmatives were given with a degree of good-humoured nonchalance that convinced Miss Pallister, to her great mortification, that she had failed in her attack on the heart. "A mere country squire to be thus invulnerable to charms which have driven half the fashionable world mad," thought she, "it is wonderful!" and Miss Pallister was not vain in so thinking—it was a fact. "The man is not a fool either, and the fellow is handsome." She coloured, though alone, as this idea a second time occurred. She, the star, or rather the sun of fashion, was not suitably losing her own heart without obtaining another in exchange. Pshaw! it was ridiculous, but this did not prevent her, when the party re-assembled, from renewing her attack, and she again failed; for Jones, from the effects of good wine and Miss Pallister's encouragement, had become rather talkative, and to her surprise he talked remarkably well; for, though not brilliant, he had good sense, had read a great deal and had a good memory. The evening soon passed away, and the lady, on reviewing the events of the day, was mortified to confess that, not only had she made no impression on Mr. Jones, but she began to suspect that her own heart was not invulnerable; she recollected that she had listened with pleasure to Jones's discussion on the Polish king, and she had never listened for two minutes together to anybody—it was ominous.

The intercourse between the parties became daily of a more particular description, and Miss Pallister was delighted to find that she had subdued the stubborn heart of Jones. How she would tease him when he had once been brought to confession. But to bring about this confession was more difficult than the lady expected. If she gave him encouragement in the presence of her uncle, Jones would follow her lead briskly enough; but alone he was grave, frigid, and polite—but, alas! not loving. Now this was exactly the contrary of what Miss Pallister wished: she had no objection to coquette, but she had a great aversion to being found out. She knew that her uncle would not allow her to make a fool of any man, and if Jones were to make a declaration in consequence of any public coquetry, she must either at once accept him or incur that nobleman's serious displeasure; and she was always uneasy if any difference took place with that relative, to whom she was sincerely attached.

But all things come to a close; so did Miss Pallister's visit to her uncle—and Mr. Jones had neither made a declaration nor seen inclined to do so; and left alone in her carriage as it bore her to London, her reflections were none of the most pleasant. She felt that, in playing the game of coquetry, she had not only failed in her object, but had lost her game of coquetry, and that she had been deceived, that perhaps Jones, disgusted with her conduct, might direct his attention elsewhere—and she burst into tears at the thought.

Now, Lord Pallister had seen the game his niece was playing, and was pretty well aware of the state of her heart, and it rejoiced him that her affections had fallen where they had; but he laughed heartily at the thought, that a mere country squire like Jones should so completely unarmour a practiced coquette like his niece. "Jones likes the girl," said his lordship to himself, "and he shall have her, but let her suffer a little;" and suffer she did. Letters from his sister-in-law described his niece as not well, pale, out of spirits. "So," said his lordship, "she is in love at last, is she. I must give her another chance, I suppose."

Lord Pallister's next letter mentioned incipient symptoms of gout, and his affectionate niece soon arrived to nurse him, but he was shocked to perceive that she looked horribly ill. "Poor thing," thought he, "I must be merciful," but in the course of the day he gave her a hint respecting her country beau, Mr. Jones—and Miss Pallister, in a passion of tears, threw herself at her uncle's feet, and confessed at once her love, and brought him not to allude again to her wicked and foolish conduct.

"It was wicked," said she, "because I intended to injure the happiness of a worthy man, and I suffer now justly."

Lord Pallister thought to himself, "Thou art a good and honest girl after all, and thou shalt be Mrs. Jones yet."

Lords have great power no doubt, but how his lordship contrived, a few weeks after, to detect Mr. Jones in the act of imprinting a kiss upon the lips of the fair Elizabeth, we cannot tell; neither have we heard that either his lordship or his niece expressed any violent indignation at the audacity of Mr. Jones. Nay, it has been insinuated that the said kiss was given with the full approbation, not only of Lord Pallister, but also with that of his niece—but this seems incredible.

FEMALE HEROISM.

Instances of heroism in women have occasionally occurred in modern times somewhat resembling that of the ancient Amazons. But there were eras and countries in which their warlike spirit appeared with particular lustre: such were the displays it made in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries in Hungary, and in the islands of the Archipelago and Mediterranean, when they were invaded by the Turks. Among the striking instances of Amazonian conduct in modern ladies, may be mentioned that of Jane of Bellevue, widow of M. de Clisson, who was beheaded in the year 1648, on a suspicion of carrying on a correspondence with England and the Count de Montfort. The lady, filled with grief for the death of her husband, and exasperated at the ill treatment which she considered him to have received, sent off her son, secretly, to London, and, when her apprehensions were removed with respect to him, she sold her jewels, fitted out three ships, and put to sea, to revenge the death of her husband upon all the French whom she should meet. This now corsair made several descents upon Normandy, where she stormed many of the castles; and the inhabitants were spectators, more than once, while their villages were in a blaze, of one of the finest women in Europe, with a sword in one hand and a torch in the other, urging the carnage, and eyeing with pleasure all the ravages of war. Dr. Fétu has given it as his opinion, that there is a great difficulty in governing the women, even at present, though they are unarmed and unpractised in war; it cannot, therefore, be considered a subject of regret, that the race of the Amazons has ceased to exist.

EXCERPTS—BY JEAN PAUL.

Wealth bears heaven on talent than poverty; under gold mountains and thrones, who knows how many a spiritual giant may be crushed down and buried! When among the flames of youth, and above all of hotter powers as well, the oil of riches is also poured in—little will remain of the Phoenix but his ashes; and only a Goethe has force to keep, even at the sun of good fortune, his phoenix wings unsinged. The poor historical professor, in that place, would not, for much money, have had much money in his youth. Fate manages poets, as men do singing birds; you overhang the cage of the singer and make it dark, till at length he has caught the tunes you play to him, and can sing them nightly.

Philosophy is properly home-sickness; the wish to be everywhere at once.

Man is the higher sense of our planet; the star which connects it with the upper world; the eye which it turns toward heaven.

Nature is an Eolian harp, a musical instrument; whose tones again are keys to higher strings in us.

Every beloved object is the centre of a paradise.

It depends only on the weakness of our organs and of our self-excitement, that we do not see ourselves in a fairy world. All fabulous tales, are merely dreams of that home-world, which is everywhere and no where. The higher powers in us, which one day as genies, shall fulfil our will, are, for the present, muses, which refresh us on our toilsome course with sweet remembrances.

The spirit of poetry is the morning light, which makes the statue of Memnon sound.

Only in villages, not in towns, where properly there is more night than day-labour, have the evening chimneys a meaning and beauty, and are the swan-song of the day: the evening bell is, as it were, the muffle of the over-loved heart, and, like a ranza des vaches of the plains, calls men from their running and toiling, into the land of silence and dreams.

Most men judge so badly; why wouldst thou be praised by a child? No one would respect thee in a beggar's coat: what is a respect that is paid to woollen cloth, not to thee.

Surmise is the gossamer that malice blows on fair reputations; the corroding dew that destroys the choice blossom. Surmise is the squint of suspicion, and suspicion is established before it is confirmed.

FAITH AND WORKS.

A person who had peculiar opinions touching the "full assurance of faith," having occasion to cross a ferry, availed himself of the opportunity to interrogate the boatman as to the grounds of his belief, assuring him that if he had faith he was certain of a blessed immortality. The man of our said he had always entertained a different notion of the subject, and begged to give an illustration of his opinion. "Let us suppose," said the ferryman, "that one of these oars is called faith and the other works; and try their several merits." Accordingly, throwing down one bar in the boat, he proceeded to pull the other with all his strength, upon which the boat turned round and made no way. "Now," said he, "you perceive faith won't do, let us try if works can."—Seizing the other oar, and giving it the same trial, the same consequences ensued. "Works," said he, "you see don't do either; let us try them together." The result was successful; the boat shot through the waves, and soon reached the wharfed for seven. "This," said the honest ferryman, "is the way by which I hope to be wafted over the troubled waters of this world, to the peaceful shore of immortality."

ADVICE TO THE LADIES.

A pretty hand and a pretty foot always go together—when we speak of the one we always think of the other. For this reason, stepping on a woman's foot is equivalent to a slap on her face, and equally proper, but sometimes more convenient, as it can be done under the table. Be careful, however, never to attempt it at a crowded table for fear of making a mistake. We once saw a lady very much confused, who was trying to give a signal to a gentleman opposite, and instead of his, she trod and pressed on the corn-covered toes of an old bachelor. He bore it as long as he could, and then very quietly remarked, "Madam, when you wish to step on a gentleman's toes, be particular and give the foot that belongs to him"—for the last five minutes you have been jamming my corns most unmercifully."

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

BOYHOOD.

How oft amid the sordid strife

Of worldly wisdom have I turned

To memory's scenes of early life,

And o'er my joyous boyhood mourned:

How oft have wish'd, mid care and pain,

To be that buoyant boy again.

To sleep beneath the slanting roof

And hear the pattering rain-drops fall,

Or listen to the lively roof

Of vagrants round my airy hall;

Yet rise at morn with wonted gle,

To wade the brook or climb the tree:

To join the sturdy reapers' train,

What time the lark her matin sings—

When mounting with impassion'd strum,

She bathes in light her glistening wings,

And poised in air is scarcely seen,

So high amid the dazzling sheen.

'Twas mine to trap beside the stream,

Or angle 'neath the alder's shade,

To tend the plough, or drive the team,

Or seek the herd in distant glade,

Where oft from clustering thickets shrill

Rang out the notes of whippoorwill.

Those trembling notes, so lone, so wild,

Were music to my boyish ear;

Thought backward flies and as a child

'E'en now methinks the sounds I hear,

While fancy speaks before my eye

The dewy glade and moonlit sky.

The "lowing herd," now wending slow

Along the wood their homeward way;

The winding streams dark glassy flow;

The lilted vale, the woodlands gay,

Sull float in visions, bland and bright,

As on that balmy summer's night.

When standing on the distant hill,

With boy-horn-fancies wand'ring free,

I saw no specter'd form of ill

Rise in the bright faun's fire;

But all, instead, was joyous, clear,

Buoyant with hope, uncatch'd with fear.

Oh, these were boyhood's cloudless hours,

And swift on wings unswail'd flew;

But pride soon dream'd of loftier bowers,

And wealth her golden lutes threw

O'er tempting scenes, as false as fair,

And bade my spirit seek her there.

And I have sought her—nor in vain.

I might have plied her treasures high,

But that I scorned her sordid reign,

And turned me from her soulless eye.

I could not delve her dirty mine,

And would not worship at her shrine.

I would not stoop to flatter power

For any vile or selfish end;

I would not change with every hour

My faith, my feelings, or my friend;

And least of all, would I entrust

My hopes to the accursed dust.

The God that rear'd the woodland heights,

And spread the flowery valleys wide,

Had wak'd within my mind delights

That spur the lures of human pride;

And stern forbade, in accents known,

To worship again beneath his throne.

TRUTH.

Adhere rigidly and undeviatingly to truth; but while you express what is true, express it in a pleasing manner. Truth is the picture, the manner is the frame that displays it to advantage. If a man blends his angry passions with his search after truth, become superior by suppressing yours, and attend only to the justice and force of his reasoning. Truth, conveyed in austere and acrimonious language, seldom has a salutary effect, since we reject the truth, because we are prejudiced against the mode of communication. The neutralist he won before the intellect can be informed. A man may betray the cause of truth by his unreasonable zeal, as he destroys its salutary effect by the acrimony of his manner. Whoever would be a successful instructor must first become a mild and affectionate friend. He who gives way to angry invective, furnishes a strong presumption that his cause is bad, since truth is best supported by dispassionate argument. The love of truth, refusing to associate itself with the selfish and dissonant passions, is gentle, dignified, and persuasive. The understanding may not be long able to withstand demonstrative evidence; but the heart which is guarded by prejudice and passion, is generally proof against the argumentative reasoning; for no person will perceive truth when he feels unwelcome to it. Many of our speculative opinions, even those which are the result of laborious research, and the least liable to disputation, resemble rantes in the cabinet of the curious, which may be interesting to the possessor, and to a few congenial minds, but which are of no use to the world. Many of our speculative opinions cease to engage attention, not because we are agreed about their truth or fallacy, but because we are tired of the controversy. They sink into neglect, and, in a future age, their fallacy or absurdity is acknowledged, when they retain a hold no longer on the prejudices and passions of mankind.

The master of superciliousness is the people; and, in all superciliousness, wise men follow fools.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

STANZAS.

Younge Edmund, fired by glory's charms,
Rush'd fearless to the battle-field;
And fame and conquest crown'd his arms,
And long he proved his country's shield.
But glory's light—that from afar
Could all his youthful hopes employ—
He found, when near a fleeting star,
Dissolving like the dream of joy!

To council-seat and courtly sway,
His herald was his martial fame;
His monarch's smile illum'd his way,
And rank and honours greet his name.
But soon he scorn'd ambition's wiles,
Found title but an empty toy—
Caprice can change a monarch's smile,
And courts are not the home of joy.
From cares of state, and ceaseless strife,
Resolved for ever to remove—
The gem that crowns our social life
He found at length in woman's love:
His hours, amid the rural shade,
The muses and the arts employ—
And past pursuits from memory fade,
In scenes of calm domestic joy.

L. L. T.

ORIGINAL RETROSPECTIVE REVIEWS.

FAIRFAX'S TASSO.

Now have I sat, when piped the pensive wind,
To hear his harp by British Fairfax strung;
Prevailing post, whose undobbling mind
Believed the magic wonders that he sung!—Collins.

We fear that there are but few, in this country at least, who have sat, like Collins, to listen to the sweet harpings of "British Fairfax." This is owing, in part, no doubt, to the scarceness of the book, and partly to the slighting way in which some would-be critics have thought proper to speak of it. Some single pages have been so often quoted that they have become familiar; such as those beautiful lines—

"About her shoulders hung her golden locks,
Like sunny beams on alabaster rocks."

An image as exquisite as it is exquisitely expressed. We think Fairfax deserves to be better known than this. His translation of the great epic of Italy, as it is the first, is by far the best in our language. We may go farther, and safely call it one of the finest versions ever made into any language: If it had been more generally read, we may be certain that Tasso would have been better understood, and better liked in our country than he is now. One must be well acquainted with the language to read him to advantage in the original; better than falls to the lot of most Italian-reading young ladies and gentlemen. There are a thousand characteristic idiomatic beauties of thought and expression, too minute, many of them, we might almost say for criticism, which go far to make up the merit of an author in his native tongue. To seize all these delicate touches, to distinguish in a tongue not our own, what is easy, and what is constrained, which is the happy, and which is the awkward innovation, is no easy matter. Before we can do so, we must think ourselves into the nationality of the poet, to use an expressive Germanism more deeply than is practicable for most men. Important is it therefore, to the great bulk of readers, that their mother-tongue should own good translations of the great poets of other lands, in which may be shadowed forth even if in a glass darkly, their peculiar features of beauty.

Hooles's translation of Tasso, which is the one generally read, is utterly contemptible. He had about as much sense of the beauty of the task he was engaged upon, as a law scrivener has of the soundness of the argument he copies. He was troubled with no consuming fire of genius—no stinging poetick asthma. He goes through the whole of the Jerusalem Delivered, in the same strain of hopeless mediocrity, and translates canto after canto, into a wretched jingle, which is at once affected and dull, fine and poor. One huge Dead Sea of dullness is spread over the whole twenty books. There is a self-conceit about him wital, which is amusing from its very intensity. He takes it on himself to pronounce Fairfax's sweet verses, "not only unpleasant but irksome, in such a degree as to surmount curiosity." He prides himself especially on his versification, and modestly thinks his own barrel-organ metre must be preferred to the musical strains of his predecessor, "by all but the very few who have acquired a taste for the phrases and cadences of those times, when our verse, if not our language, was in its rudiments." Excellent crick! Those times, when "our verse and language were in their infancy." He was the days of Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, Spenser and Sir Philip Sidney. A herculean childhood! This alone is enough to show the man's sheer ignorance and vanity; but in order that he may not only be proved an arrant knave, but go hard to be thought so, we shall put some specimens of his translation, side by side, with Fairfax, and let our readers then judge, who has the advantage in versification. As to the other merits of a translator, there is no comparison possible between them. Hooles is a poet of adjectives. If he mentions the sea, it is either the "vast" or the "boundless main," and the sky is always the "serene" or else the "troubled heaven." The second rhyme can always be foretold when you know the first, with the precision of a calculating engine. Yet this heavy mass of lumber and nothingness, half lead and half froth, is our standard English Tasso. It is printed in pretty little volumes, and bound in gilt morocco, for presents to young ladies of a poetical turn. Hooles's Tasso! It is worse than Pope's Homer or Sternhold's Psalms.

There is another translation by Wiffen, which first appeared some twenty years ago, that is smoothly versified, and betrays considerable poetick feeling. Its great fault is want of force and fire. It is as much above Hooles as it is below Fairfax. Like Caxton's wigs in the Antiquary, Hooles is the positive, Wiffen the comparative, and Fairfax the superlative. Hooles grinds monotonous murder on a hand-organ, Wiffen discourses melodiously on the flute, a gentleman-like instrument, but feeble wital; while Fairfax seizes Tasso's own harp before its music has quite died away, and gives in the very echo of his own majestic melody.

Of Fairfax's life but little is known. He was born in the sixteenth century, of a family which had distinguished itself in the bloody wars of the low countries, then, as now, the fighting ground of Europe. He appears to have possessed an estate large enough to free him from the necessity of courting a patron, or writing for bread. All we know of his quiet life, is, that it was devoted to study and poetry; that he was learned and devout. He wrote a "Treatise on Demonology," which is believed to exist only in manuscript, in which, it is said, he treats of the superlatives of his time, with the faith of a firm believer. This will give a point to the lines of Collins, with which we have headed our article—

—Whose undobbling mind
Believed the magic wonders that he sung."

He also wrote some eclogues, which deserve the praise of learned and classic, better than they do that of "witty," which is bestowed on them by a contemporary. These have nothing in them worthy of being drawn from the oblivion into which they have fallen. His translation of Tasso, is his great work. This was first published in 1600, thirty-two years before its author's death. Its merits, generally speaking, are faithfulness, freshness, and beauty of language; its chief, almost its only defect, frequent violations of orthography, for the sake of metre. This, however, was so common in those early days, as hardly to be thought a fault, and is indeed justified by Donne. His work, is also injured at times, by his indulgence in antithesis and point, the besetting sin of the age. Its antique turn of phrase is, in our own eyes, at least, a beauty and no blemish. It is so faithful to the original, that it has even been said, there is not a line in Tasso without a corresponding line in Fairfax. This is no small praise, when we consider how closely the several parts of the Jerusalem Delivered are united together. Rousseau used to assert, that there was not a stanza nor even a line in Tasso which could be taken out, without injuring the unity and connexion of the poem.

To show the mastery way in which Fairfax handles his subject, let us take the opening of the poem, a grand and a worthy one surely—"A happy prologue to the swelling act" of one of the finest of modern epics. The grandeur and stately march of this opening has been highly praised by continental critics, and justly. Let us go on Crescendo, and begin with Wiffen, for Hooles is not worth quoting.

I sing the pious arms and chief, who freed
The sepulchre of Christ from thrall profane;
Much did he toil in thought, and much in deed;
Much in the glorious enterprise sustain;
And hell in vain opposed him; and in vain
Afric and Asia to the rescue poured
Their mingled tribes: heaven recompensed his pain,
And from the fruitless sallies of the sword,
True to the red-cross flag his wandering friends restored.
O thou, the muse, that not with fading palms
Circlest thy brows on Pindus, but among
The angels warbling their celestial psalms
Hast for thy coronal a golden throng
Of everlasting stars! make thou my song
Lucid and pure; breathe thou the flame divine
Into my bosom; and forgive the wrong,
If with grave truth I fight fiction I combine,
And sometimes grace my page with other flowers than thine!

This is pretty, and closely enough rendered, but it has not the life and spirit of Fairfax.

I sing the warre made in the holy land,
And the great chiefe that Christ's great tomb did free.
Much wrought he with his wit, much with his hand,
Much in that brave atchevement suffer'd bee:
In vain doth hell that man of God withstand,
In vain the world's great price armed he,
For heaven him favour'd, and he brought againe
Under one standard all his scatter'd traine.
O heavenly muse, that not with fading bayes
Deckest thy brow by the Heliconian spring,
But sittest crown'd with starres immortal raises,
In heaven, where legions of bright angels sing,
Inspire life in my wit, my thoughts no cease,
My verse enoble, and forgive the thing,
If fiction's light I mix with truth divine,
And fill these lines with other truths than thine.

Our reader will at once be reminded of the opening of Paradise Lost. It is needless to say that the English writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were diligent students of the great models furnished them by the masters of Italian poetry. France had not yet risen to the rank of the arbitress in arts and arms, in dress, manners, and language. The place in fashionable literature, which is now supplied by the "smooth-tongued French," belonged then to the "Italian musicale;" and we cannot help thinking that the great authors of that stirring time, when the sons of the Romans were men, afforded better food for study, and better examples for imitation, than the artificial strictness and feeble regularity of French taste. We might easily show, did time admit, that Milton was a diligent reader, not only of Tasso but of Fairfax's Tasso. He is known to have noticed with commendation those fine lines in Fairfax, describing Gabriel's descent on earth,

"On Lebanon at first his foot he set,
And shook his wings, with roarie May-dewes wet."

We may easily trace in this the source of Milton's,

"—Like Main's son he stood,
And shook his wings, that heav'nly fragrance fill'd
The circuit wide."

To go back to Fairfax's book. A second edition of his translation was published in 1624, and a third in 1687. This last was edited by Sir Roger L'Estrange, who, in his preface, awards our author high praise "for the turn of the verse, the apt and harmonious distribution of the words, and the strength of thought." He adds, that he was induced to publish the book "at the request of some ingenious persons." These are said to have been no other than Waller and Dryden, both of whom declared that they owed their first ideas of verse and melody to Fairfax. It does no small credit to the taste of that forerunner of anti-tobacco societies, King James I., that he admired Fairfax, and desired to have the book reprinted. Charles I., too, is said to have beguiled the time with it while in prison awaiting his trial. In Queen Anne's time, when French taste gave the law in all things, Fairfax was neglected and all but forgotten, and his book was not reprinted till 1817. It was then got up in beautiful style; unfortunately the greater part of the edition was destroyed by fire, and it is now a guinea book in London. The old editions are also very scarce.

One of the most highly-praised passages in Tasso, is the flight of Erminia, her meeting with the shepherd, and his praise of a lowly life, in the beginning of canto seven. It is delightful from the air of stillness and repose thrown around it, which contrasts charmingly with the sound of broil and battle in the preceding cantos. Hooles's version is wretchedly tame and flat.

She sleeps, till joyful at the day's return,
The feather'd choir salute the break of morn,
Till rising zephyrs whisper through the bowers,
Sport with the ruffled stream and painted flowers;
Then opens her languid eyes, and views around
The shepherd's cot, and the sylvan ground:
When 'twixt the river and the wood, she hears
A sound, that calls again her sighs and tears.
But soon her plaints are stopp'd by vocal strains,
Mixed with the rural pipes of village swains:
She rose, and saw, beneath the shady grove,
An aged sire that o'er baskets wove;
His flocks around him graz'd the meads along—
Three boys beside him tun'd their rustick song.

No vain ambitious thoughts my soul molest,
No avarice harbours in my quiet breast,
From limpid streams my draught is well supply'd;
I fear no poison in the wholesome tide.
My little garden and my flock afford
Salubrious viands for my homely board.
How little, justly weight'd, our life requires!
For simple nature owns but few desires.
Lo! there my sons (no menial slaves I keep.)
The faithful guardians of their father's sheep.
Thus in the groves I pass my hours away,
And see the goats and stags around me play:
The fishes through the crystal waters glide,
And birds with wings the yielding air divide.
There was a time (when early youth inspires
The mind of erring men with vain desires)
I roved in lowly vales my flock to feed,
And from my native soil and country fled.
At Memphis once I lived, and highly graced
Among the monarch's household train was placed:
And though the gardens claim'd my carcs alone,
To me the wicked arts of courts were known.

"Vocal strains" and "rural pipes of village swains!" "tun'd their rustick song." Hooles, like M. Jourdain, is talking prose without knowing it. Wiffen's version is better, and not without a certain air of poetry and prettiness.

She slept, till in her dreaming ear the bowers
Whispered, the gay birds warbled of the dawn;
The river roared; the winds to the young flowers
Made love; the blithe bee wound its dulcet horn;
Roused by the mirth and melodies of morn,
Her languid eyes she opens, and perceives
The hints of shepherds on the lonely lawn.
Whilst seeming voices, 'twixt the waves and leaves,
Call back her scattered thoughts—again she sighs and grieves.
Her plants were silenced by soft music, sent
As from a rural pipe, such sounds as cheer
The Syrian shepherd in his summer tent,
And mixed with pastoral accents, rude but clear.
She rose, and gently, guided by her ear,
Came where an old man, on a rising ground,
In the fresh shade, his white locks feeding near Twig baskets wove, and listened to the sound
Trill'd by three blooming boys, who sat disporting round.

Despised by others, but so dear to me,
That gems and crowns I hold in less esteem;
From pride, from avarice, my white spots free,
And mad ambition's visionary dream.
My thirst I quench in the pellucid stream,
Nor fear lest poison the fair wave pollutes;
With flocks my fields, my fields with herbage teem;
My garden-plot supplies nutritious roots,
And my brown orchard bends with autumn's wealthiest fruits

Few are our wishes—few our wants: man needs
But little to preserve the vital spark;
These are my sons; they keep the flock that feeds,
And rise in the gray morning with the lark.
Thus in his hermitage I live; now mark
The goats disport amid the budding brooms;
Now the slim stage bound through the forest dark,
The fish glide by, the bees hum round the blooms;
And birds spread to heaven the splendour of their plumes.
Now let us have Fairfax, and with him there is no fear but that we shall have Tasso.

FAIRFAX.

Her tears, her drinke, her food, her sorrowings,
This was her diet that unhappy night:
But sleep, (that sweet repose and quiet brings)
To ease the griefs of discontented wight,
Spied forth his tender, soft, and nimble wings,
In his dull arms, folding the virgin bright;
And love, his mother, and the graces kept
Strong watch and ward, while this fair ladie slept.
The birds awake her with their morning song,
Their warbling muskies peart her tender care,
The murmuring brookes and whistling windes among
The rattling boughs and leaves, their parts did bear;
Her eyes unclosed, beheld the groves along
Of swaines and shepherd groomes, that dwellings were;
And that sweet noise, of birds, of wind, and waters sent,
Provokes againe the virgin to lament.

Her plaints were interrupted with a sound,
That seem'd from thickest bushes to proceed,
Some lonely shepherd sung a lustre round,
And to his voice had tun'd his oaten reed;
Tauter she went, an old man there she found,
(At whose right hand his little flocke did feed)
Sat making baskets, his three soons among,
That learned their father's art, and learn'd his song.
O povertie, chief of the heav'nly brood,
Dearer to me than wealth or kingly crown!
No wish for honors, thirst of other's good,
Can move my hart, contented with mine owne:
We quench our thirst with water of this flood,
Nor fear we poison should therein be throwne;
These little flocks of sheepe and tender goates,
Give milke for food, and woad to make us coates.

We little wish, we need but little wealth,
From cold and hunger us to cloath and food;
For my soones, their care preserves from stealth
Their fathers' flocks, nor servants none I need;
Amid these groves I walke oft for my health,
And to the fishes, birds, and beastes give heed,
How they are fed in forest, spring, and lake,
And their contentment for example take.
Time was (for each one hath his doting time)
(These silverlocks were golden tresses then)
That countie life I hated as a crime,
And from the forest's sweet contentment ran;
To Memphis stately palace would I come,
And there became the mighty Calpurne man;
And though I but a simple gardner were,
Yet could I mark abuses, see and heare.

Readers of Spenser need not be told where to look for a parallel to this eloquent praise of contented poverty. But for the benefit of the very many who are comparatively ignorant of the finest imaginative poem in the English language, we shall take the liberty of quoting a few stanzas from the Legend or Sir Calidore or Courtisee, where the very language of Edmund's shepherd is put into the mouth of old Melibee. These stanzas will be given in the next chapter.

(To be continued.)

DRAMATICK SKETCHES.

CUNIGUNDA'S VOW.

BY MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

SCENE.—Silesia.—Enter ERNEST, to GERTRUDE and EDITHA.

Ernest. Where is thy lady, Gertrude?
Gertrude. On the turret
Watching the first glimpse of the stranger knight
Who comes to-day to attempt the perilous feat
Ordained by her rash vow.
Editha. Poor Cunigunda!
Now pays she dearly the oath-renewing pride
Of haughty beauty. Love hath well avenged
His martyred votaries.
Ernest. Speak not with that tone
Of pity, maiden! I'm an old retainer
Of Cunigunda's house; have carried her
A smiling child within mine arms; have loved her
Even as a father, as a father gloried
In her unparagoned charms. But her cold cruelty
Dethroned my very heart-strings. Not enough
For this proud beauty to reject all hearts
Of knight, or count, or prince—for princes sued
Cunigunda's feet—but she must tempt
Each wooer to his death, grim ghastly death,
Untimely bloody death, by that stern vow
That she should win her, who should safely ride
Around these Kuenast walls—the narrow walls,
Of these steep mountain towers! She might as well
Command them ride upon a falchion's edge,
Or stand erect upon the topmost spray
Of yon tall poplar. Many a gallant steed
Lies whitening in the abyss, many a brave knight
Hath perished in the rocky gulf—and now
Another victim comes!

Editha. One—If he fall,
The shades of all that for her sake have died,
Were they as countless as the leaves that dance
In Hirschberg vale, would be avenged! She loves him, Believe it, Ernest, with the fervid love
Of stern and holy hearts.
Ernest. Believe who will!
She, thy proud mistress, love the falcon knight!
Albert the falcon knight! A wandering stranger,
Whose house, whose name she knows not. Tush!

Editha. Yet Albert
Is the sole name she speaks; the falcon crest
Her only heraldry.
Ernest. Princes have sighed
For Cunigunda, and that she should sigh
For this poor knight—
Gertrude. She doth!

Ernest. One all unapt
To win a lady's eye! She that beheld
Unmoved the gay Count Cassel, whose light step Came bounding like the roe, whose glance shot fire—
She that beheld unshaken his bright form
Lie stiff and mute before her—she that saw,
Without a tear, the bleeding mangled corpse
Of Rudolf of Thuringia, blooming boy,
Fair, slender, blue-eyed boy, whose nut-brown curls
Clustered o'er his white brow, whose damask cheek
And coral lip, and brilliant smile, and round
And joyous voice were redolent of youth,
And hope, and life—think'st thou that she, whom bloom
And charms like these ne'er touched, can love you sad
And pallid stranger?

Editha. With idolatry,
Passing what hath been told of feigned love
In story or in song. Unapt to win
A lady's eye! Ernest, thou hast been trained
In courts, and camps, and battles; thou know'st well
All that pertains to man, but woman's heart
To thee is a sealed book. I tell thee, Ernest,
Yon pallid stranger, with the serious grave
Of his fine features, delicate yet full
Of mild command; the dark locks closely shorn
Around the noble head; the manly form
Where grandeur blends with elegance; the voice
Clear, deep, and ringing, fitting instrument
Of lofty thought; the reverential port
Majestically bending with a proud
And prompt obedience, to the very name
Of woman rendering homage—such an one Might win—
Gertrude. She comes!

Enter CUNIGUNDA and OTTO.

Cunigunda. Unbar the gates! Be quick,
Unbar the gates! Why bid ye loitering here
When ye should fly to bid the Castellan
Give present entrance to the falcon knight—
The valiant falcon knight!—[Exit ERNEST.]—Ye daily here,
Will'st thou stand waiting—he? Why of yourselves
The Kuenast-gates should open to him.
Otto. He's here,
Fair madam.

Enter SIR ALBERT and a PAGE.

Cunigunda. Now, Sir Albert!
Albert. Beauteous lady,
I come to win thee.—Bid them lead my courser
Round to the court of guard. Is't not the way
That we must gain the ramparts? [Exit PAGE.] Sweet, I come
To win thee or to perish.
Cunigunda. O! No!
Albert. Why, thou shouldst arm me for this viewless peril
As for some tourney fray. Why dost thou sigh?
Why turn so deadly pale?

Cunigunda. 'Tis a vast peril!
Albert. 'Twas thine own vow imposed it; thine own choice,
And now 'tis mine. I know afore I saw thee
What danger must be dard for Cunigunda,
And knowing came. Then wouldst not sure fright me
With that same bugbear Peril! I'm a warrior
Trained to defy, to seek each several form
Of death in glorious battle. Wouldst thou teach me
A cowardice now?—Farewell!—The sun shines bright
On hill and valley; the soft breezes play
O'er leaf and flower; over our heads the lark
Chants his gay matins; Nature smiles on me
And my high purpose—for this deed is holy,
Thrice holy, lady!—When I come again—
Farewell!

Cunigunda. Oh go not! go not!
Albert. Cunigunda,
Hast thou not sworn to yield thy hand to none,
Save him who rides unscathed around these steep
And narrow walls? Is not that oath proclaimed
On earth, and registered in heaven?

Cunigunda. Alas!
Albert. And I too have a vow recorded there
To do this deed or perish.
Cunigunda. Oh, go not!
Not yet! not yet!
Albert. Why should I dally?
Cunigunda. Stay
A month, a little month! Thou wilt not! Then
A week, a day, an hour! Grant but such respite
As the poor sentenced criminal may claim
When he craves time for prayer.—Oh, go not yet!
Not yet! not yet!

Albert. Is this the soft relenting
Of woman's tender heart to all whom pain
Or danger threaten? Didst thou thus implore
Henry of Camel? or the gentle boy
Young Rudolf of Thuringia?
Cunigunda. No. Oh, frown not,
Nor turn away thy head, nor stretch thy hand
From mine! They knew the peril that they braved,

And they would brave that peril. Canst thou blame me
That I ne'er loved afore! that I love now!
Oh, go not, Albert!

Albert. Lady, I am bound
By a strong fettering vow.—If I return,
This hand is mine!

Cunigunda. Ay, hand and heart. Yet go not!

Beseech thee, stay with me!
Albert. When I come back
Thou art wholly mine!

Cunigunda. Ay, ay. But go not yet!

Albert. Mine to dispose even as I will!

Cunigunda. Ay, dearest,
Even as thou wilt. But stay with me awhile!
Stay! stay!

[Exit ALBERT.]

Editha. He's gone!
Cunigunda. Oh, stop him! Stay I beg!
Say I command! Fly! fly!—[Exit OTTO.]—And yet my oath,
My fatal, fatal oath! Without such trial
We may not wed—But, oh, to see him dashed,
As they have been, from off the wall, and lain
A pale, disfigured corpse—Oh, horror! horror!

Re-enter OTTO.

Stop him, I say; and if need be by force.
Command him hither.

Otto. Lady—

Cunigunda. Dost thou hear!
Where is the falcon knight! Am I not mistress
Within these towers? Command him hither.

Otto. Lady,

Even as he left thee, at a bound he sprang
On his proud steed, and scaled the rampart stairs;
Ere now he's on the walls.

Cunigunda. Oh save him! save him,
Ye saints that watch o'er love! Go some of ye
To the high turret that o'hangs the castle,
And look ye send me blessed tidings—no!
The truth! the very truth! Are ye not gone?

[Exit OTTO and GERTRUDE.]

Editha. With thou not go thyself! 'Twere a less grief
Than crouching there in that strong square

Of fear—thy head between thy hands, thy limbs

Cunigunda. He'll die!

Shivering, thy bosom panting. Go!

He'll die! And how could I endure—He'll die

For me! for me!

Editha. Take comfort, lady.

Cunigunda. Comfort!

Who ever passed that dread abyss, where yawns
The Hirschberg valley under the high rock
Crowned with our frowning battlements, or dared
The desperate leap from tower to tower, nor fell Crushed, breathless, motionless! Who e'er returned Alive!—Oh horror! horror! Edith, fly!
Speed me some tidings. [Exit EDITHA.] He must die; and I,
I that so loved him, I that would have given
My life a thousand fold to save him—I
Shall be his murderer.

Enter ERNEST.

Ernest. Nay, lady, nay,
There's yet a hope.

Cunigunda. Old man, art thou turned flatterer!

He'll perish.

Ernest. I beheld the manège steed
Ascend the steep and narrow stair; a steed
Of Arab, light-limbed and fine, with eyes
Of living fire half starting from his slim
And veiny head; a hot and mettled steed;
Yet trained to such obedience, that each motion
Of the swift foot seemed guided by the will
Of the bold rider, even as they had been
One and incorporate. If man may achieve
This perilous deed, the falcon knight alone—
Cunigunda. Ernest, thou shalt have lands enow to make Thyself a belted knight! New blessings on thee
That bring't me hope!—But Edith, Gertrude, Otto,
Why come they not? I could have won to Prague
And back in half the time. Why come they not?
Good tidings find swift messengers. Alas!
I fear; I fear.

Ernest. Shall I go seek them!

Cunigunda. No.

The abyss, the dread abyss, where the old wall
Shelving, and steep, and crumbling, overhangs
The vale of Hirschberg from such dizzying height
As never plummet fathomed;—that abyss—
Henry of Camel there, and the good knight
Of Olmutz—Oh I have been cruel, Ernest,
And for my sins he'll die! to punish me
He'll die! he'll die!

Enter GERTRUDE.

Gertrude. Lady—

Cunigunda. Why dost thou pause?

Ernest. See how she pants! she's breathless.

Cunigunda. Is there any Panting and breathless save myself! He's dead!

I see it in her face.

Gertrude. He hath safely passed

The abyss.

Cunigunda. Now thanks to heaven! The dread abyss.

He's safe! he's safe! Thou shalt be portioned, Gertrude.

He's safe!

Ernest. Yet that wide leap from tower to tower,

Where Rudolf of Thuringia—

Cunigunda. Out on thee,

Raven!

Ernest. That fearful leap, with scarce a ledge

Where stood— [Shouts without]

Cunigunda. What means that cry?

Re-enter OTTO and EDITHA.

Editha, Otto,

What means that cry?

Editha. He's safe! The leap is past:
The falcon knight is safe!
Ernest. Look to her!
Cunigunda. Nay,
I'm well. Say o'er again!
Editha. The leap is past.
The falcon knight is safe!
Cunigunda. My Editha,
Ask what thou wilt of me. Was ever woman
So blest before! The falcon knight is mine,
Mine own, and I am his. Oh, thanks to heaven!
Now, ye that called my yow cruel and rash,
What say ye now?
Ernest. Alas, dear lady, still
I grieve for them that—Cunigunda. Talk not of them. Think
What were a thousand such as they, compared
With the bold falcon knight!—Editha, Gertrude,
Albert will come to claim his bride; wipe off
These blustering tears, braid this dishevelled hair,
Adjust my wimple and my veil;—my knight
Will come to claim his bride.

Enter SIR ALBERT AND A PAGE.

He comes! away!
He will not lose his Cunigunda less
That she hath lain on the stone floor in prayer
And fearful agony, whilst he hath dared
This perilous deed.—Albert!
Albert (to a page.) Lead Saladin
Gently around the court. He trembles still
At the overmastered danger.
Cunigunda. Albert!
Albert (still to the page.) Loosen
The foaming bit. It is a matchless steed.
Cunigunda. Oh, matchless! matchless! I myself would be His groom! But Albert!—
Albert. When he's cooler, bid
Thy comrade, Jerome, ride him back to Prague.
Bring thou another courser straight. The day Wears on.
Cunigunda. Sir Albert!
Albert. Madam!
Cunigunda. Hast thou not
A word for Cunigunda? Dost thou stand
There, like some breathing marble in thy cold
Stern haughty beauty, mute and motionless,
With arms close-folded and down-gazing eyes,
No thought for Cunigunda, not a word
For her whom thou hast won, not even a look!
Dost thou not claim me, Albert!
Albert. Lady, no;
I have a wife—ay, start and tremble! torn
As pale as winter snows! feel every pang
That thou hast caused and scored.—I have a wife,
A sweet and gracious woman; beautiful
Beyond all beauty, for the blush of love,
The smile of kindness, and the dancing light
Of those joy-kindling eyes, in whose bright play
The innocent spirit reveals and lends their spell
With features delicate as lily-bells,
A shape more graceful than the clustering vine.
Talk of thy stately charms! At Ida's side
Thou wouldest show coarse and unsuited, as the brown
And rugged elm beside the shining beech.
Ay, shrink and tremble! hide thy burning cheeks
Within thy quivering hands!—Wilt thou hear more?
This lovely, loving wife, my three years' bride,
And twice a mother—Oh, never bent
With such a grace as she o'er sleeping babes,
Nor ever youthful mother bent o'er her babes
So like the cherubim!—This wife, so fair, so true,
So sweet, so womanly, whose pitying heart
Would ache to see a sparrow die, this wife
I love.

Cunigunda. Why then—Oh cruel!
Albert. Dost thou talk
Of cruelty, proud murderer, whose meed
For true-love hath been death! Whose sinful vow
Slew the most gracious boy of all the earth,
The hope and pride and joy of his high line,
Young Rudolf of Thuringia, my dear brother,
My dear and only brother!
Ernest. 'Tis Duke Albert!
Yet pity her! See how she smites her brow
And tears her raven hair!
Albert. Where was her pity
When that fair boy—Murderer, 'tis Rudolf's brother
That speaks to thee. When first I heard that tale,
Several revenges, deadly, bloody, fierce,
All that the body can endure of keen
And lengthened agony, the rack, the wheel,
The stake rushed through my brain, but they had been
A poor and trivial vengeance, all unmet
For such overwhelming wrong: my coming hate
Hath found a more enduring curse. Thou lovest me,
Thou lovest me, Cunigunda, with the hot
Wild passion of thy nature, and I scorn thee!
Thou art contemned and loathed by whom thou lovest!
Won and abandoned; spurned and thrown aside
Like an infected garment. The plague spot
Of sin is on thee, woman, blackest shame
Shall follow like thy shadow. 'Twas for this
I donned the mask of coarseness; for this trained
My faithful steed. Thy worthless hand is mine—
Nay, touch me not, hang not about my knees—
Mine to bestow. Some horse-boy of my train
Shall provide thy fitting partner.

Editha. Oh for pity!
For manly pity, good, my lord, break not
The bruised flower!
Cunigunda. Be silent, Editha!
I have deserved all evil. Deal with me
Even as thou wilt, Duke Albert. I've deserved

Thy hate—but soon my heart—my burning heart—
Deal with me as thou wilt. 'Twill not be long!
Albert. Nay then—rise, Cunigunda! Lift thy face
From off the ground and listen. I'll not break
The bruised flower. Live and repent. In prayer
And pious penance live. The cloister cell
Were thy meet refuge. By to-morrow dawn
Go join the Carmelites at Prague. For them
Who died untried, for myself, for me
And for my children, pray!—Now home, Sir Page!
My steed! my steed!

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICES.

CLAUDE DUVAL.

LEAVING out of sight Robin Hood, whose thievery has been so varnished over by time and romance, as to look now like a lawful moult of the rich and oppressive, there is no robber or highwayman in the annals of the English "road," who pursued his profession in so accomplished a manner, and threw so many graces over thievery, as Claude Duval. This personage was a real Machiavelli, one who eschewed all the coarser traits of the rogue's character, and there are some incidents in his history, which, we are sure, will amuse those of our readers to whom they are new.

Claude Duval was a Frenchman by birth, having first seen the light, in the year 1643, at Domfront in Normandy, where his father, Pierre Duval, a miller, resided. Claude was well brought up, and received a decent share of education. When a sprightly lad of thirteen or so, he either ran away from his parents, or was permitted by them to go and push his fortune in the world. Having reached Rouen, the Norman capital, Claude chanced to fall in with some post-horses returning to Paris, and was allowed to mount one of them, on condition of helping the conductor to dress them at night.
The lad might still have been badly off for food by the way, had not some English gentlemen, who were also travelling to Paris, taken pity on him, and paid his expenses. On arriving in the French metropolis, Claude attached himself to these strangers, and by their intercession was admitted afterwards as errand-boy at a noted place of entertainment. In this condition he remained till the restoration of Charles II. in 1660, at which time multitudes of people from all nations came flocking to England. Duval also crossed to the island, along with a person of quality, whose service he had entered in the capacity of footman.

The period of the restoration was well fitted for the development of such a character as that of Claude Duval. He speedily became a proficient in gaming, drunkenness, and all those other practices, which, under royal favour, were regarded as the highest accomplishments of a gallant of the time. It may be supposed that such pursuits were not long compatible with the duties of a peaceable occupation. In reality, Monsieur Duval took to the highway to find the means of supporting his irregularities, and rapidly acquired such celebrity by his doings on the roads and heaths around London, as to have the honour of being named first in a proclamation for the capture of several notorious malefactors. But it was less for the extent of his depredations—though their range was by no means limited—than for the manner in which he executed them, that Duval's name became famous in the land. He was the most insuperable of fencers, contriving to steal with such a grace, that, so far from terrifying even the ladies, they were content to lose all they had for the pleasure of contemplating his courtesy, and to wish him good luck with what he had appropriated. One story which is told of him will exemplify his manner of going to work. We quote the words of a quaint and ironical notice of Claude Duval in the Harlequin Miscellany. Having on one occasion received intelligence that a coach was about to pass along a certain road, with a boy of four hundred pounds in it, Duval and four associates took the field, and at the expected time beheld the object of their search.

"In the coach was a knight, his lady, and only one serving-maid, who, perceiving five horsemen making up to them, presently imagined that they were beset; and they were confirmed in this apprehension, by seeing that whither to one another, and ride backwards and forwards. The lady, to show she was not afraid, took a white flagolet out of her pocket, and plays: Duval takes the hint, plays also, and excellently well, upon a flagolet of his own, and in this posture he rides up to the coach-side. "Sir," says he, to the person in the coach, "your lady plays excellently, and I doubt not but that she dances as well; will you please to walk out of the coach, and let me have the honour to dance one curant with her upon the heath?" "Sir," said the person in the coach, "I dare not deny anything to one of your quality and good mind; you seem, a gentleman, and your request is very reasonable;" which said, the lacquey opens the door, out comes the knight, Duval leaps lightly off his horse, and hands the lady out of the coach. They danced, and here it was that Duval performed marvels; the best master in London, except those that are French, not being able to show such footing as he did in his great French riding-boots. The dancing being over, he waits on the lady to her coach. As the knight was going in, says Duval to him, "Sir, you have forgot to pay the music." "No, I have not," replies the knight; and, putting his hand under the seat of the coach, pulls out a hundred pounds in a bag, and delivers it to him; which Duval took with a very good grace, and courteously answered, "Sir, you are liberal, and shall have no cause to repent your being so; this liberality of yours shall excuse you the other three hundred pounds;" and, giving him the word, that if he met with any more of the crew, he might pass undisturbed. Duval civilly takes his leave of him."

The fame acquired by such an exploit as this, which (to use the words of Leigh Hunt) is an "eternal feather in the cap of highway gentility," was calculated to render Duval as much an object of admiration as of terror, and if we take into consideration the loose morality of the times, we shall see some reason for crediting the stories which represent the gentle handsome highwayman as being a great favourite with the ladies. He always treated the fair sex, when he met them on the road, with the most winning politeness, and would restore a favourite trinket with the grace of a cavalier who had picked up a dropped glove. Once, when in company with several of his crew, Duval met a coach filled with ladies, and sent one of his friends forward to lay them under contribution. The fellow did his office rodelly, taking away money, watches, rings, and even the gum-bottle of a baby that was present. The child naturally cried, and one of the ladies, the infant's mother, entreated the man only to return the sucking-bottle. But the surly thief refused, until Duval, observing him to stay longer than necessary, came up and discovered what had been done. Drawing forth a pistol, Duval levelled it at his associate's head, exclaiming at the same time, "Give back the bottle to the child, sirrah! Can't you behave like a gentleman, and raise a contribution without stripping people? But, perhaps, you had some occasion for the suckingbottle yourself, and, indeed, by your actions one would imagine you were hardly weaned." The abashed thief, as he looked at him, and Duval departed, leaving the ladies in admiration of his courtesy.

Claude Duval is said to have exhibited much ingenuity occasionally in compassing such purposes as sheer courage alone could not carry him through. He once entered the Crown Inn, in Beaconsfield, where he heard singing, dancing, and fiddling in merry progress. On inquiry, he found that a sort of wako or fair was kept there that day, and that a large company were assembled. Partly from his natural liking for sport, and partly from the hope of doing business, Duval resolved to alight, and spend the evening there.
He did so, entered the kitchen, and called for a pint of wine. By chance an old farmer was sitting by the fire with a companion, whom he told, in Duval's hearing, that he had a hundred pounds in his pockets, which he was anxious for the safety of. Our apprehensive hero immediately set down this money as his own, more particularly when he heard the old countryman ask leave to enter the dining-room, and see the diversion. Duval made the same request, and did it so courteously, that he was told he might stay as long as he pleased, and welcome. Thinking more of the stable-yard than the fiddle or the dancing, the highway practitioner looked around him for some means of making the money change possessors.
Clever as he was, he was no conjurer, and could not have what he wished by crying "Presto! pass!" But he hit on another method of accomplishing his object. He saw that the only rational way of lightening the farmer of his burden, was to create confusion among the company, during which he might use his fingers unscathed. A chimney in the room, with a large funnel, struck him as a proper means of executing his project. He went out, and having told the ostler of his wish to have a bit of frolic with the good company, prevailed upon that personage, by a bribe of two guineas, to dress himself in the farmer's dress, and to stand in the middle of the room, which lay conveniently at hand, and then, by the help of ladder and rope, to let the disguised animal down the fore-mentioned chimney. Having thus arranged matters with his confederate, Duval returned quietly to the dancers, who continued to foot it in the innest manner. By and by, an alarming noise was heard in the chimney, and a most unearthly howling succeeded from the same quarter, followed by the thundering descent into the room of what appeared to be a black, velvety, horned demon. The whole company was thrown into confusion, and the question was, which should be first out of the room. The most active pushed down others, and the lights were overturned, and trampled under foot. In this state of general consternation, Duval, who had no difficult matter to empty the pocket of the farmer, whom he had not a sharp look in the bustle. The dog, meanwhile, having broken the rope by its weight, bounded over the prostrate crowd, and made its way to the stable, where the ostler instantly unscathed it, and rendered it impossible for the trick to be discovered. Whether it had been found out or not, Duval had taken care of himself. As soon as he had effected his purpose, he took horse, and sparred neither word nor deed with himself in London. The loss of the money was discovered after his departure, and search made for it everywhere; but, of course, it could not be found. It was thereupon settled by common consent that the devil had been permitted to take it away, in order to punish the old farmer, who was noted for his miserly covetousness.

When the proclamation already alluded to, was promulgated,
Duval, being then well provided with money, thought proper to decamp for France. He was not here long ere he had squandered all he possessed, and was compelled to resort to his old practices.
It is recorded of him that he assumed the character of alchemist, ostensibly for the purpose of extracting gold from lead, but in reality squeezing it out of an avartious Jesuit, confessor to the king of France. By putting some pieces of gold into the end of a stick, and then stirring with this stick a crucible filled with melting lead, Duval contrived to exhibit the seeming transmutation of a portion of the lead into gold, by the melting of the particles in the stick. By this means he induced himself into the Jesuit's confidence; and the result was, that one day his reverence, being seated with his philosophic friend, found himself suddenly bound and gagged, and had the satisfaction of seeing his strong-box rifled before his face, himself being all the while unable to utter a word of remonstrance.

This enabled Claude Duval to return to England, which, somehow or other, foreigners of his class have always chosen as the favourite field of their exertions, possibly from the patriotic wish to spare their own countrymen. How long Duval flourished after his return to England, it is difficult to say, as the dates of the principal events of his life have not been preserved. He did not confine himself entirely to highway practice, but preyed upon the world in various other ways. Dressed elegantly, after the fashion of a finished gallant of the time, he frequented gaming-tables, and laid under contribution knights, and squires, and lords of high degree, who little dreamed of the true character of their companion. Duval was a most dexterous cheat at cards—or, to speak in more measured language of such a man's qualifications, he could slip a card beautifully. He was mighty given to being long, and laid his wagers with such skill and prudence, that he often won large sums by the practice, and seldom lost even small ones.

The law, which has no respect of persons, at length laid its hands on this polished highwayman, whom it had described in a thousand bills and proclamations. He was not taken while attacking the king's lieges, but after having assailed the pockets of wine. In plain language, he was arrested, while drunk, at the Hole in the Wall tavern, in Chandos-street. His capture excited a sensation proportioned to the repute he had gained in life. After being arraigned, convicted, and condemned, while he lay awaiting his doom in Newgate, he was visited by many ladies, among whom were several of rank, all anxious to see the man who, in the eyes of the lawless courses, ever preserved a degree of romantic and most unworldly courtesy to those of their sex. There rested on him, besides, we believe, no stain of blood, though from the life he had led, this would be difficult to determine. The life of Duval was interested for, but in vain. On the twenty-first of January, 1669-70, when he had barely reached the age of twenty-seven, he was executed at Tyburn. His young comeliness, and extraordinary character, in which even of good ran through the bad, caused tears, it is said, to dim many gentle eyes, when he suffered at the fatal tree. Thanks to the improved morals of society, and thanks to an improved system of police, the race of Duvals are now extinct in the land, never, it is hoped, to be revived.

LITERARY NOTICES.

BOOK TABLE.

"The Huguenot, a tale. New-York: Harper and Brothers."—Mr. James has here illustrated a remarkable portion of history, and one with which he evidently has an intimate acquaintance. His management of his subject is extremely artist-like, and his style is unexceptionably pure and expressive. Another great charm and merit of his writings is the healthy moral tone which pervades them. They have none of that morbid misanthropy, that frigid feebleness, which is too often affected by the authors of the day. The works of James may with safety and profit be confided to the young and unsophisticated, for they will derive from them no false views of the world and human nature. But the author himself, in his preface, eloquently describes the scope and tendency of his writings: "He who in the course of a well-conceived and interesting tale, excites our good passions to high and noble aspirations; depicts our bad passions so as to teach us to abhor and govern them; arrays our sympathies on the side of virtue, benevolence and right; expands our hearts, and makes the circle of our feelings and affections more comprehensive; stores our imaginations with images bright and sweet and beautiful; makes us more intimately and philosophically acquainted with the characters of our fellow-men; and, in short, causes the reader to rise wiser and with a higher appreciation of all that is good and great, attains the grand object at which every man should aim, and deserves the thanks and admiration of mankind. Even he who makes the attempt, though without such success, does something, and never can write altogether in vain."

"Demonstrations of the truth of the Christian Religion. By Alexander Keith. New-York: Harper and Brothers."—This is a republication from the second Edinburgh edition. It is a luminous and succinct array of the evidences, amounting to demonstration, of the truth of the Christian religion. There is nothing didactic or supererogatory in the argument. Every line has an immediate bearing upon the great purpose of the work; and, apart from its value in the eyes of the religious, it will be found full of interest by the general reader. We know of no manual more suitable to be placed in the hands of the young. The engraved illustrations are very appropriate, and add much to the sterling attractions of the book. We hope that it will be generally read and circulated, for its influence cannot fail to be beneficial on the public mind.

"The Harmony of Christian Faith and Christian Character; and the culture and discipline of the mind. By John Abercrombie. New-York: Harper and Brothers."—A new work from the pen of the distinguished author of "The Philosophy of the Moral Feelings," and "Inquiries concerning the Intellectual powers and the Investigation of Truth," will be welcomed by a large portion of the "reading community" in this country. Mr. Abercrombie is a close and cogent reasoner, and his style combines strength with beauty. The little volume before us is well calculated for the wants of the industrious classes, and there are none who may not derive benefit and pleasure from the perusal.

"Breese's Address before the Mercantile Library Association." We directed the attention of our readers last week to the eloquent address, recently delivered before the Mercantile Library Association, of Boston, by the Hon. Edward Everett. It is worthy of a much more extended review than we were able to bestow upon it, and has been, we doubt not, already perused with gratification by many, whose glance will be attracted by this notice. The following exquisite passage is as full of poetry of thought and expression, as it is of sound sense and an enlightened philosophy:

USES OF CAPITAL.

When we hear persons condemning accumulations of capital employed in manufactures, we cannot help saying to ourselves, is it possible that any rational man can desire to stop those busy wheels—to paralyze those iron arms—to arrest that falling stream, which works while it troubles? What is your object? Do you wish wholly to deprive society of the fruit of the industry of those inanimate but untiring labourers? Or do you wish to lay on aching human shoulders the burdens which are so lightly borne by these patient metallic giants? Look at Lowell. Behold the palaces of her industry, side by side with her churches and her school-houses, the long lines of her shops and warehouses, her streets filled with the comfortable abodes of an enterprising, industrious, and intelligent population. See her fiery Sampsons roaring along her railroad with thirty laden cars in their train. Look at her watery Golgothas, not swelling a weaver's beam like him of old, but giving motion to hundreds and thousands of spindles and looms. Twenty years ago, and two or three poor farms occupied the entire space within the boundaries of Lowell. Not more visibly, I had almost said not more rapidly, was the palace of Aladdin, in the Arabian tales, constructed by the genies of the lamp, than this noble city of the arts has been built by the genius of capital. This capital, it is true, seeks a moderate interest on the investment; but it is by furnishing to all who desire it the cheapest garment ever worn by civilized man. To denounce the capital which has been the agent of this wonderful and beneficent creation—to wage war with a system which has spread and is spreading plenty throughout the country, what is it but to play in real life the part of the malignant sorcerer in the same eastern tale, who, potent only for mischief, utters the baleful spell which breaks the charm, heaves the mighty pillars of the palace from their foundation, converts the fruitful gardens back to their native sterility, and heaps the abodes of life and happiness with silent and desolate ruins? Form, from the first, a large conception of the character of the liberal and upright merchant. Regard him as one to whom the country looks to sustain her honour in the hour of trial; to uphold her public establishments, to endow her charities, to be the father of her orphans: as one whom no success will make ashamed of his vocation; who will adorn his days of prosperity with moderation and temper; and hold fast his integrity, though fortunes turn to ashes in his grasp.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

Thanks to "T. P. M." for his translation. It shall appear.—The "Modern Epitaph" is informed that if the style of his promised communications is equal to that of his letters, we shall esteem him a worthy addition to our corps of contributors.—The "Lunes to a Star" are very pretty, but is not the writer aware that he has been anticipated in all his thoughts, and most of his expressions, by one Mr. Leigh Hunt? If not, this coincidence is certainly remarkable.—The "Notes in an Omnibus," by Quix, are well conceived, but inadequately executed. His ideas, in proper hands, might be carried out to advantage.—The remarks on Mrs. Martineau's article, in the Westminster Review, by "B," are altogether too savage, considering there is a lady (qu?) in the case.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1839.

The late gale.—As we proceeded up Broadway during the late gale, while bricks and slates were flying "thick as hail" about our path, we were irresistibly reminded of the congratulatory exclamation of the sailor, who, when his ship was scudding under close reefed topsails before a tremendous "sou' wester," thought only of the danger of the poor people on shore, and ejaculated,

"Lord pity those unhappy folks,
Who live at home in houses."

A good caricaturist might have found some capital studies for his pencil in the mishaps, which were to be seen at every corner during the late gale. Here a post might be observed chasing his hat. Alas! the precious manuscript enclosed in it, has been snatched out by the mischievous wind, and is borne fluttering through the mud, like a scared gosling. The unhappy votary of the muses is diverted from the pursuit of his hat—to be candid, it is a shocking bad hat—and sets off in a different direction after his fugitive verbiage. He is hard upon them—the gale has given them a moment's respite—their owner's hand is held out to catch them—alas! they are illusive as the phantom dagger of Macbeth, and are once more whisked aloft by that importunate critter, the wind, far out of the reach of the despairing author. Little did he anticipate that his productions would meet with such a blowing—up! He turns from the unavailing pursuit, moves doggedly towards his hat, which is nestled like a hen in a thunder shower in the nearest gutter, and puts it, "with all its imperfections," on his head. So much for picture number one. The kaleidoscope next shows an editor, on whom a shower of mortar has been scattered by a falling chimney. No matter. He is used to plastering. Behold that lawyer endeavouring to weather the corner of Barclay-street. He looks as if he could bring an action for assault and battery against the aggressing element. As he reaches the opposite corner, a new obstacle arrests him, and a sound like a sudden explosion falls on his ear. The sign of the "New-York Mirror Office" has been wrenched from its fastenings, and is borne with a crash to the ground, within a foot of the advancing pedestrian. Had it fallen a little nearer, his neck would have been broken. Push ahead, my friend, and do not look so indignant! You cannot pick an action out of the accident, "no way you can fix it." Ah! gentle maiden, who trippest so lightly along, beware of the gust that is sweeping up the street, or it will leave you on the cuspola of the City-Hall. Venture not athwart the crossing. She heeds not our advice. She advances. She is caught in the strong, though invisible arms of the wind, and—we will not pursue the picture.

The waltz in New-York.—We have received a communication, evidently from the pen of a lady, on the subject of waltzing. Is it possible that the grievance which she complains exists to the extent she describes? A single paragraph from her letter will explain the purport of the whole—"It must be evident to the frequenters of our fashionable parties that the waltz is fast absorbing the favourite old dances, which were in vogue a few years since. The sociable and graceful quadrille, the lively contra-dance, and the inspiring Virginia reel, in which young and old were wont to join, must all give way to the monopoly of the aristocratic waltz. And for what? For the pleasure of a few mustachioed foreigners, who presume to dictate the fashions of our society, when in their own country they would not and could not, in all probability, aspire above the dignity of a barber or a vale-de-chambre. It must be well known, that more than one half the young ladies in society abstain from the waltz either from an actual sense of its impropriety, or from the objections of parents and friends. The number that can join in the waltz, both among the ladies and the gentlemen, is trivial compared with the number of those who would be glad to join the cotillon. And yet for the pleasure of some four or five couples, the patience of some thirty must be exhausted by the perpetual see-saw of the waltz. Not content with the alternate waltzing, two-thirds of the time of a party is now generally given to that amusement. I was at a ball the other evening where twenty minutes were appropriated to a waltz, when a quadrille would be cut short before five minutes had passed; compelling some forty or fifty to surrender the floor to a dozen! This may be very fashionable, but really it is very vexatious and intolerable to the majority. For my own part, I will candidly confess that I do not on the waltz, and when in Paris took lessons of the most distinguished professors, but my worthy sire has taken a notion into his head that it is improper, and imperiously commands me to abstain. I know hundreds in the same predicament. Ladies and gentlemen, who give balls, in pity let us have fair play. Let the time be equally shared between the waltz and the quadrille; and do not, because Count Wiskerandos thinks it "quite genteel," deprive the greater part of your company of the pastime of the dance. For the life of me, I cannot see either the justice or the gentility of such an anti-democratic custom."

Legislation and the ladies.—A friend in Washington writes—"I have been a week in the metropolis, and every day attended the debates in the House of Representatives, with the view of forming an idea of the style of oratory of the different members. But, thus far, my efforts have been wholly ineffectual. You are aware that none but privileged persons are admitted on the floor of the hall. The gallery is the only place for 'lookers on in Vienna,' like myself. But in the gallery, I find it impossible to hear a word of what is going on in the area below. The ladies daily hold a regular levee in this part of the House, and they keep up such a perpetual buzz, interspersed with occasional shrill ha-ha's, that the words of the speaker below are as inaudible as the new bell of the City-Hall is when it is necessary to sound the alarm of fire. The nuisance is really 'tolerable and not to be endured.' There is one young lady, in particular, who has made herself an object of marked antipathy to me, by her loud talking and still louder laughing. She has a dozen brainless dangles in her train all the time, and chatters like a magpie. By the quiver of Diana! I have a mind to marry her, and play Petruccio to her Kate. I would soon curb the unruly license of her tongue." We need only remark, by way of comment on the above, that our friend and correspondent is a Goth not to prefer the gossip of the ladies' gallery, to the long-winded debates on the floor of the House.

Wall-street.—Rents in Wall-street have advanced for the next year about one hundred per cent, in consequence of intended improvements. The Merchants, Union, and Manhattan Banks, are all to be torn down in the spring, and splendid granite buildings to be erected in their places. The Bank of the United States paid for their lot about one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, which is the greatest price a lot has been sold for in this city. The building on it is nearly finished—and, already, two of the rooms for a small size are rented to an Insurance Company, for four thousand dollars per year. The old house, formerly occupied by Daniel Bahr, the tailor, was leased by him some four years since, at an annual rent of two thousand eight hundred dollars, for twenty-one years—the lease was sold within a few days, having seventeen years to run, for a profit of twelve thousand dollars.

Plain speaking.—A writer in Tait's Edinburgh Magazine has addressed a letter to Queen Victoria, which is nearly as bitter as that which Junius addressed to her grandfather. He tells her that she is but a child, and that were she anything but a sovereign, her opinions would never be consulted, even in her own family, beyond the choosing for herself of a cap or a gown, and that she would not be considered infallible even upon that. He severely condemns the excess of favour which her majesty still manifests towards the present ministry, and is particularly impudent when speaking of Lord Melbourne, whom he considers as little better than a popinjay. We doubt if such plain speaking as this can penetrate through the cloud of adulation and flattery to the ears of the youthful queen.

International copyright.—A petition is in circulation for the passage of an international copyright law. Signatures may be left at the bookstore of Mr. George Adlard, in Broadway. We sincerely trust that a measure, so essentially necessary to the prosperity of American literature, and so righteously claimed by British authors, may be adopted by congress. An enlightened examination of the question will show that no interest in the country will be injuriously affected by the passage of such a law. The international copyright bill of Mr. Clay is nothing less than a new declaration of independence—a declaration of independence from the unsustained thralldom of British opinions, British prejudices, and British dictation in matters of taste and literature. What true American, with a spark of national pride or national ambition, will refuse to sign such a declaration?

Literature and office.—We are glad to see by the papers that Nathaniel Hawthorne, of Salem, has received the appointment of Inspector of the Boston Custom-house. Why should not the man who has contributed to the literary distinction of his country possess, claims as strong, in the distribution of the favours of government, as the professional political druggist, or the avowed office-seeker? Mr. Hawthorne is the author of a volume of excellent prose sketches, bearing the title of "Twice-told Tales." His style is singularly beautiful and original; but the principal charm of his pieces is their peculiarly American character. Hawthorne will, before many years, be acknowledged one of the most remarkable and gifted writers of his day.

New-York and Albany railroad.—We have read the able report of the New-York and Albany railroad company, and are happy to find that the work is soon to be commenced. It should, of course, be united with the Harlem railroad, and it appears evident that this is the intention of its projectors. The advantages of a winter thoroughfare between this city and the capital of the state, can scarcely be estimated. The wonder is that the road has not been made before. We shall again refer to this subject.

The Lady of Lyons.—This elegant and effective drama, by Bulwer, appears to have met with extraordinary success at the south. It has been played, some forty nights, in New-Orleans. A journal of that city, generously asking, "will the manager never tire of giving us the Lady of Lyons, or rather will people never tire of going to see it?"

The Paul Pry.—Such is the title of a weekly dramatic journal, published by Elton, in Nassau-street. It is conducted with much ability and fairness, and is the best theatrical register of the day.

WHEN THROUGH LIFE UNBLEST WE ROVE.
A FAVOURITE MELODY—THE WORDS AND MUSICK BY THOMAS MOORE.

SLOW

When through life un-blest we rove, Los-ing all that made life dear,
Should some notes we used to love In days of boy-hood meet our ear, Oh! how wel-come the strain, Wak-ing thoughts that long have slept, Kin-dling for-mer smiles a-gain In sad-ed eyes that long have wept.

2d—Like the gale that sighs along
Beds of oriental flow'rs,
In the grateful breath of song,
That once was heard in happier hours;
Fill'd with balm the gale sighs on,
Though the flow'rs have sunk in death;
So when pleasure's dream is gone,
Its memory lives in music's breath.

3d—Music! oh, how faint, how weak,
Language fades before thy spell;
Why should feeling ever speak,
When thou canst breathe her soul so well?
Friendship's balmy words may fade,
Love's are e'en more false than they;
Oh! 'tis only music's strain
Can sweetly soothe and not betray!

THE STAGE.

THE LATE CHARLES GILFERT.

CHARLES GILFERT, like Sheridan, was in the habit of borrowing money from everybody, very little of which was ever paid back; but he always intended to return it at the time he promised. He was a visionary man, and did not make the best calculations in the world. We heard of his meeting a friend in the Bowery, one day, when the following circumstance took place:

"Ah," said Gilfert, "you are the very man I wanted to see. Lend me two hundred dollars."

"I would, in a moment," replied his friend, "but it is impossible. I have a note to pay, and I don't know where to get the money."

"A note," said Gilfert, "so have I. Let me see your notice."

The gentleman produced it from his pocket-book.

"Well," said Gilfert, "how much are you short?"

"About two hundred dollars," said his friend. To his utter surprise, Gilfert handed him the money.

"There," said he, "go and pay your note. I'll let mine be protested, as they can't both be taken up. If your note laid over, it might hurt your credit, but with me it don't matter, as I am used to that sort of business."

This anecdote shows what a careless fellow Gilfert was.

At one time Gilfert owed Conrad, the printer, a bill. Conrad grew tired of dunning him for it, and one day wrote Gilfert a letter, which put the manager in a towering fury. Down he sat, and challenged Conrad to fight, declaring that if he refused, he would horse-whip him in the public streets the next day.

Conrad returned for answer that he would not fight, until his bill was paid, as no man in his senses would voluntarily go out to shoot at his own money.

Some few weeks after this occurrence, Gilfert had an unexpected windfall. Conrad received a letter from him, couched in something like the following terms:

"MY DEAR CONRAD—I WAS WRONG, but you had no right to insult me. Yet, I ought to have paid you the money before. I enclose it to you now, principal and interest. Come and dine with me. Yours ever, GILFERT."

What a pity it is that some good writer would not give us the memoirs of this extraordinary man.

LA PETITE AUGUSTA.

We perceive with unfeigned satisfaction the advances which our talented young townswomen is making in her fascinating but difficult profession—that of the dance. It was but the other day that she left her native shore, accompanied by her mother, to study the graceful principles of "the poetry of motion," in that school where alone they are carried out to the extent which astonishes connoisseurs all over the world; and before we have turned from bidding her farewell, we are greeted with the news that the young American prodigy is dancing with success upon the Opera stage—a matter of wonderment to the Parisians themselves, and still more so to the thousand aspirants for a similar honour, who find that it must cost them years of laborious study, and no small share of theatrical influence.

We do not contest to a participation in this great surprise, for our own notions of the child's promising talents were such as almost led to the result which has taken place. But our admiration is thereby confirmed and increased, and whenever this charming artist shall return to her native land, we shall be among the first to hail her arrival, and shall expect to find her at the very head of her graceful, imaginative, and poetical profession.

ENGLISH DRAMAS IN AMERICA.

We find in the London "Sunday Times" the following remarks, in relation to the dependency of the American stage upon the dramatic authors of England. We agree with the writer; but we fear the day is far distant when his suggestions will be adopted, although we can never hope for a national drama, until some such arrangement with the authors of England shall be made.—"The American stage is almost entirely dependent upon that of London for pieces, and since Bulwer's act has given playwrights a chance of getting some remuneration for the performance of their pieces here, there may be some hopes of obtaining hereafter a similar recompense from the other side of the Atlantick. When Mr. Forrest brought out the tragedy of The Gladiator here, its author (Dr. Bird) was unanimously elected a member of the Dramatic Author's Association, and whosoever this tragedy may be played in Great Britain, the doctor will derive a certain emolument. Cannot America reciprocate? Wellack (an Englishman) is now lessee of the National. Let him set the example, and when he plays pieces which in England must be paid for, transmit from New-York a similar sum. He has it in his power to make the first step towards the establishment of international copyright. We believe him to be an honourable man, and will take care that our hunt reaches him."

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE ALBION.

Our respected contemporary, Dr. Bartlett, has commenced a new series of his valuable journal, and we take sincere pleasure in calling public attention to its merits. The paper has been in publication upwards of seventeen years, in the course of which time it has completed two distinct series, and has been constantly increasing in steady and deserved success from its first establishment to the present. We presume it may be quite unnecessary here to describe minutely the plan and conduct of this excellent paper, it being so largely and so widely circulated; we shall, therefore, briefly observe that its columns consist of judicious selections from the most approved British periodicals, general summaries of British, colonial, and foreign intelligence, notices of the drama, literature, and the arts, and luminous editorial remarks on British affairs. In publishing a paper essentially British in the commercial emporium of the United States, it is due to Dr. Bartlett to say, that he has laboured anxiously and successfully to keep up the relations of good feeling and kindness between the people of the two countries; his lucubrations have always been marked by suavity of manners and benevolent sentiments; and it is a just praise to him of no small moment to say, that he has at all times kept aloof from meddling in that collision of domestic politics which would derogate from the plan originally laid down by him for the general conduct of the Albion. In the illustrative department of this paper, the proprietor shows distinguished taste and liberality, as evinced in the choice and execution of the subjects which occasionally adorn its numbers. We have just seen the proof impression of a fine portrait of Queen Victoria, engraved in line, on steel, and which will be well worthy to adorn the saloons of those who shall possess copies of it. It is at once elegant in design, and national in sentiment, and completely harmonizes with the objects upon which the Albion was originally founded.

THE FINE ARTS.

NEW SPECIES OF COTTAGE PIANOFORTE.

Messrs. Dubois, Bacon and Chambers have just produced a pianoforte on the principle of the horizontal grand, but so far reduced in length as to admit of its standing in less space than a square instrument, and enabling the performer to avoid the awkwardness of sitting with his or her back to the company. Each note has two strings instead of three; they are strained upon a metallic frame to a high pitch of tension, in consequence of their being of increased thickness, and the effect is a round and powerful tone. We remarked, on hearing it, that, contrary to the usual quality of pianofortes, the upper notes have increased force and brilliance, while the bass notes decrease somewhat in those qualities; but, altogether, the new instrument is a manifest improvement and convenience, and we think will be largely patronized.

MISCELLANY.

SINGULAR COINCIDENCE—IF TRUE.

General Bazaine lately breathed his last in Paris after a few days' illness. In connexion with his death, a correspondent tells us a strange story, which may at least be set down under the head of "singular coincidence." A few days before his demise, the general is stated to have met a friend, Count F—, in the garden of the Tuilleries, and on the latter's expressing his regret at having been long deprived of the pleasure of meeting him, "Well," said the general, "you will see me next Sunday at eleven o'clock, at the church of the Assumption." The count, on arriving at the church on the appointed day, observed the portal hung with black, the court filled with mourning coaches, and a hearse ornamented with armorial bearings and escutcheons. "Who is the deceased?" inquired the count of a sergent de ville. "A Russian general," was the answer. "His name?"—"General Bazaine." At this precise moment, adds our correspondent, the clock struck—eleven!—Truly awful, and most wonderful—if true!

MUSICAL TREE.

In the neighbourhood of St. Quentin, in Aisne, stood a remarkable tree, from whose roots dull sounds were frequently heard to issue. It had excited much surprise and alarm among the inhabitants of Nauroy and the circumjacent parishes, but the mystery is now unravelled. The enchanted tree is a very strong beech, at the summit of which two branches crossed each other in such a manner, that when the wind blew a vibration took place, which resounded as far as the roots.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. TERMS, FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM, payable, in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

G. P. Scott, Printer, corner of John and Gold-streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL, DEVOTED TO LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR.] SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NUMBER ONE BARCLAY-STREET, NEXT TO THE CORNER OF BROADWAY. [PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

VOLUME SIXTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1839.

NUMBER THIRTY-FOUR.

THE ENGRAVING.

THE SOAKING MOUNTAIN ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

PAINTED BY J. C. WARD.—ENGRAVED BY HENRY JORDAN.

We cannot doubt that the beautiful and highly elaborated engraving, which we this day present to the readers of the Mirror, will be generally appreciated and admired. It is a view of the celebrated Soaking Mountain near the head waters of the Upper Mississippi. This singular elevation received its name from the peculiar absorbent and spongy nature of its soil. Its original Indian title, which, being interpreted, is "the thunder-mountain," or, rather, "the hill that withstands the thunder," would, we think, be more poetical, if not more euphonious.

The landscape, as every one will perceive, is peculiarly and characteristically American; and the skill of the engraver, Mr. Jordan, has given to it a softness, which is in admirable accordance with the subject and the design. This young artist is destined to attain to much distinction in his profession. The painter appears to have fixed the time of his scene a few moments before sundown, and during the delightful period of the Indian summer. The stillness and quiet of the landscape appear to be shared by the animate objects in the picture, and the sketch may be commended as in every respect true to nature, and a faithful representation of one of the most lovely scenes on the waters of the Upper Mississippi.

ORIGINAL TALES.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

BY JOHN NEAL.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

The Gloves.

We were now about half-way through the formidable Notch; and I was returning from a last peep over the rocky parapet, when, as I stepped into the narrow foot-path, I saw a glove lying there, a woman's glove—like an open hand—with the palm up. Taking it for granted that our little friend Julia had lost it, for she was the only person before me in this part of the road, I slipped it into my pocket, and pushed on, without thinking more of the matter, until, after walking a few rods further, not more than fifty, I saw a fellow-passenger, (the greatest oddity I ever met with,) stop and pick up something in a hurry, on the other side of the way, examine it for a few moments with great care—walk forward a few steps—turn aside, look warily about, as if to make sure that nobody was near enough to see, and then, watching his opportunity, fell to another and more deliberate examination of the prize. What could it be! Once, to be sure, as he held it up to the light, I detected a sort of greenish glitter, and the idea flashed upon me that he had found either a green purse or a green ribbon, of bright changeable silk. Curious to know the truth, I turned my steps that way, and called out haloo! But the moment he saw me approaching, he slipped his hand into his bosom, lengthened his pace, instead of quickening it, and replied to my salutation by repeating the same word, haloo!

"Pray sir," said I, all out of breath—for he kept a-head of me, in spite of all I could do, though I took upon myself as a first-rate traveller for my inches—"pray sir!"—calling after him at the top of my voice—"pray sir!"—was that a watch, or a purse, or only a garter you lighted on just now, and put away so carefully in your bosom?"

"And pray sir!" he answered afar off, and without turning his head till he found me trotting at his elbow—"pray sir!"—stretching away on the other tack, and eyeing me with a subdued smile, which made me almost wish I had let him alone—"pray sir!" was that a tree-toad, a dragon-fly, or a string of orient pearls, you lighted on just now, and slipped into your breeches pocket?"

"I!—do slacken your pace, will you—what a tremendous head-way you have got on, to be sure!"

"Have I!—well, now that you have satisfied yourself you can't keep up with me, without running, I'll shorten sail."

Shorten sail! said I, to myself. Oh, ho! my fine fellow, have I got you at last!—if I don't make you out now, and that before we've got much further, I'll give up my whole day's work for a bad job. And well I might; for I had been trying to make out what he was, and so had everybody else in the stage, ever since we took him up, the other side of Conway. He was either a madman or a miracle—a downright wonder; for though he said nothing like other people, though aloud by the half-hour, and persuaded the romp to acknowledge, in so many words, that he hadn't a whit of common sense, nor an atom of good breeding, all which he took in every good part, I confess; yet, somehow or other, we had always found him at home, all day long, upon every subject that was mentioned. He had been everywhere—seen everything—and knew everybody, and everybody appeared to know him, though at one place they called him squire, and at another master. He talked half a dozen different languages; appeared familiar with history, ancient and modern, with government, commerce, literature, law, physic, and divinity. At one place, where we stopped, we missed him at the table, and when the stage drew up, we found him prescribing for a poor woman, already given over, and assuring her, with perfect seriousness, that she had nothing to fear, and would be a well woman within a month or six weeks at farthest—and this, too, in the presence of the doctor himself; at another, I caught him eating crackers and fish, and scolding the village blacksmith and wheelwright, with his mouth full, as a master might a pair of bungling apprentices—the wheelwright for dishing his wheels too much, and the blacksmith for putting too many nails in the shoe, and just as many on the inside, where the hoof is weaker, as on the outside; for using the buttress; for fitting the hoof to the shoe, instead of the shoe to the hoof; and for the shameful treatment of the frog, in paring it away so much as to spoil the hoof, and cause the frog itself to be absorbed, as a worthless appendage; here, telling the man of the house how to manage his own crops, and how to strengthen every kind of soil in the neighbourhood, with or without lime; how to cut his hay and where to plant his potatoes; and there, every woman he met with, how to make her soap, and save her slops, to fix her dyes, to hatch her eggs, and feed her poultry, in the dead of winter—say, even the schoolmaster, how much easier and pleasanter it would be for him to teach reading, writing, and arithmetic, and English grammar, not only without rules, but for a long time without books; the parts of speech, by conversation, for example; reading by the help of newspapers, or handbills, or whatever might happen to fall in the way of children; writing, with a bit of chalk or a slate-pencil; and arithmetic any how, so that no figures were made till the babies began to take a pleasure in doing shily what they were not allowed to do openly. And so it was with every body we met, and whatever happened to be the subject of conversation, he was always at home. This, to be sure, was rather strange; but still stranger!—there was no sort of ostentation about him—no display—no mystery; for his very name appeared at full length upon the way-bill—Ichabod Weare, junior—without shuffling, prevarication, or flourish: nor could we help acknowledging, after he had left us, and we came to compare notes, that he had always been listened to with most admiration by those who best understood the subject, whatever it was, upon which he happened to be holding forth at the time; and that, instead of being found out, as most people are, in the course of a single hour after they have begun to show off among strangers—the lawyer finding they are no lawyers, and the physicians that they are not medical men, whatever else they may be, and however astonishing their information may appear to the multitude, who are ignorant alike of both sciences, (if either may be called a science in the present condition of both,) it was directly the reverse with our new associate: for one of the party, a merchant in the Russia trade, soon satisfied himself, and whispered the thing to me before they had been together half an hour, that neighbour Weare, as he called him, was not only a merchant and a shipowner, but evidently engaged in that particular trade, being very well off in the world, and perfectly at home in the matter of Russian and Swedish iron, hemp and duck, the duties and the rates of exchange, and the modes of doing business throughout all northern Europe—though, to be sure, for reasons best known to himself, he wouldn't like to have it go any further.—But, added my fat good natured friend, laying his fore-finger along the nose, and tapping it, with one eye upon his wife—it's too late now—knew I should corner him; don't you say a word for your life, though! I promised not to betray him, and within two hours after this the young collegian drew me aside and assured me that he had completely satisfied himself, that Ichabod Weare, junior, must be a president of a college, or a professor of something—somewhere—he rather thought of modern languages and literature, or belles-lettres in general; for, to tell you the plain truth, said he, adjusting the tie of his cravat with a simper, I found him altogether too much for me—that's a fact—after I had brought him out upon the subject of literature generally; and then, by way of a regular blow off, mentioned every confounded name I could think of, in French or Italian, Dutch or Spanish, German or Swedish—but he had me! faith, he had me!—for I hadn't even got their names right, and for the life of me, I couldn't tell, three-quarters of the time, whether the tiresome old wretches had written prose or poetry, sermons or plays—bang me if I could! Oh, but I am sure he's a professor of modern languages, or literature—by Julia!

"Or of something else—somewhere," said Miss Julia, in a roguish whisper, and turning to me with a deal of mischief in her eye. So much for their opinions; but as for myself, we hadn't interchanged a dozen words, before I set him down for a lawyer; and, long before we parted, I became perfectly satisfied that he was not only a lawyer, but a profound lawyer—a great lawyer—"great let me call him, for he conquered me;" having set me right with regard to Burr's trial, the court of King's Bench, and the practice there, and greatly enlightening me on the subject of a national bankruptcy law, bills of credit, and two or three opinions of Mr. Justice Marshall; nay more, upon the learning of Lord Coke, Luther Martin, and Judge Parsons, and upon the very dangerous encroachments of the admiralty and equity, upon the common law jurisdiction; and I was the more satisfied of this, from the fact, that instead of talking learnedly, he talked plainly, and to the purpose, and so as to be understood even by those who were wholly unacquainted with law—never introducing the subject himself—nor ever allowing a law phrase or a law maxim to escape his lips, where the same thing might be said in hearty English. No! and if you will believe me, not once did I hear him say any thing like this—qui facit per alium facit per se, or communis error facit jus, and therefore—but enough. Let us go back to the story; I was trying to bring him to action, if you recollect.

Shorten sail! said I—that's the language of the sea!—and, all at once, a sort of misgiving came over me!—He might be neither a merchant, nor a professor, nor even the president of a college, perhaps not even a lawyer! but, in all human probability, nothing more than a sailor, a sort of well-informed master mariner, who had learnt what he knew of the world from the sea shore, from a ship's library, long voyages, and from having visited all the ports and harbours of our earth, like our friend B—, the oriental traveller, and lecturing to crowded houses, on the languages and literature, the manners and monuments, of the East, and matters and things in general; though, but the other day, no longer ago than the last war, he was sailing out of Norfolk, Virginia, in the command of a merchant ship.

"But you haven't answered my question," said I, as soon as I had warped up alongside and got my breath.

"Nor you mine; fair play's a jewel."

"Fair play's a jewel, hey!" That settles the question. "The man is a sailor, and nothing but a sailor after all! But," I continued, "how on earth could you see me! haven't got eyes in the back of your head, have you?"

"To be sure I have; eyes all over. My spectacles are so contrived, I can see behind me like most of the lower—Ah! what have we here! a most beautiful orchid, and in full flower, too," gathering it as he spoke, and putting it away in his hat with the greatest possible care.

Determined not to be baffled about the watch or purse, or whatever it might be, I renewed the attack. "But you haven't answered my proposition," said I. "What say you, haloo or not?"

"Just as you please," he replied; "but first let me tell you a story, it may put you on your guard. I went with a neighbour of mine to the races, one day. The pickpockets were busy. Hearing somebody call out haloo! I looked about me, and there was my neighbour, a poet by the way, and a very good fellow for a poet, too, standing stock still with the hand of another person fumbling in his pocket. Haloo! cried he, without turning his head, upon which the light-fingered gentleman took to his heels, with a crowd of boys after him, and a laugh that would have done you good to hear, following him all round the heath."

"Nevertheless," continued I, wondering what he meant by the story, and resolved not to be laughed out of my purpose, nor diverted from the pursuit by a mere change of subject; "nevertheless, I do insist on the law of the road where a fellow-traveller lights upon a waist or estray."

"Not being ferè natura, as you please. However—"

"Ferè natura! Oh, ah! nothing but an attorney after all! the thing is clear—clear beyond the possibility of a doubt, as we say at the bar."

"However," continued he, "if you say so, haloo it is, law or no law; but how are we to divide the spoil! It may be incapable of division, you know. Would you establish a joint tenancy, or shall we be tenants in common?"

"Worse and worse," thought I; "an attorney's clerk at the best, I'm afraid. But," continued I, "you are right, and therefore—recollecting that I had but one glove—"and therefore, what say you to a swap?"

"With all my heart!—a pig in a poke!—are you ready?"

"All ready, sir!" and reaching forth the glove in my shut hand, I waited for the prize; not without a little inward exultation, I acknowledge, as he turned his back to me and began fumbling in his bosom, at the idea of having so handsomely outwitted him; nor was that exultation diminished—when I observed his look as he first caught sight of the glove, and after staring at me for a minute or so, took it between his fore-finger and thumb, with a strange expression of the eye, which I often thought of afterwards, and laughed at again and again, till my sides ached, though I did not understand it at the time, while, with the other, he handed me something close cuddled up in the shut palm. Fagh! how my fingers thrilled at the touch! my very flesh crawled, and I let it drop like a frightened girl. And what think you it was? Neither a green riband, nor a green silk purse—no! not even a string of orient pearls—but a little green snake!—as green as emerald—not more than a foot long; with eyes like two sparks of fire, and the nimblest tongue I ever saw in a reptile—of that shape.

"Man alive!" cried my strange associate, flinging himself head first into the short grass, and catching the little creature again with the most astonishing dexterity, "man alive!—a little or more so you'd 'a' lost him; and what's more, he might have been seriously hurt by your carelessness—poor little thing!—here! hold out your hand—both hands, if you please, till you get better acquainted."

"No, I thank you," said I, "had enough o' that—would rather give up the trade, if you say so—what'll you take to let me off?"

"Are you serious?" looking at me with a sort of compassionate smile, as if unwilling to take advantage of my ignorance.

"To be sure I am."

"You are! then all I have to say is, that you are no naturalist! and I'm sorry for you."

I bowed, not knowing what else to do.

"Look here, now," continued he, coiling the creature up in his palm, with unspeakable tenderness, and slipping it into his vest pocket, as if it were a diamond watch, or the miniature of a woman he loved—"were you a naturalist now, as I thought you were when I agreed to the swap, else I'd have seen you hanged first, you wouldn't give that little fellow in exchange for the prettiest glove on earth—no! not if the prettiest hand on earth were inside."

"Or the prettiest mouth not far off," said I, looking after Miss Julia, who had just gained the top of the hill, and appeared to be waiting for the children.

"But," said he, "if you are no naturalist, how came you with all those plants I saw on your table?"

"Ah, they were a few I had hunted up for Miss Julia."

"Hunted up! where on earth could you hunt them up! There wasn't a specimen among the whole that grows within two or three thousand feet of us—perpendicular—to my certain knowledge. There was the dwarf birch—the Betula nana, you know,"—I bowed—"the dwarf willow, the Andromeda hypnoides, the Diapensia Ja-ponica with its snowy flowers, the Ledum latifolium, or Labrador, tea,—I bowed again—and I believe the magnificent Orchis dilatata, which, to be sure, cannot be found above this region."

"Ah," said I, "they were not gathered by me; I found them for her at the house where we stopped last among the leaves of an old almanack."

"Pshaw! then you are not even a botanist—fiddle-de-dee—there's your glove!"

"And pray, sir," I continued, beginning to feel rather waspish, and somewhat anxious to change the subject—"pray, sir, what did you suppose you were going to get me in exchange for your snake, when you agreed to the swap?"

"Get! why, a new dragon-fly at the least, or a moth, or a new species of the humming-bird—and now it turns out to be only a woman's glove that you were breaking your neck after! pshaw!"

I didn't much like this, to be sure; but what could I say. Nothing, unless we were to have a turn up on the spot; and so we continued our journey in dead silence, till, stopping suddenly, and pointing with a bitter smile toward a distant object on the road, the very shape of which I was unable to make out until we were half a dozen steps nearer, he asked me if I was glove hunting; "for," said he, "if you are, there's another, you may as well make sure of; and, between ourselves, I shouldn't much wonder if it turned out to be the fellow of that you are dangling now;" and I thought, he added, from between his shut teeth, a naturalist indeed! he a naturalist! or something of the sort.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

COPY OF A LETTER TO A LADY,

ENCLOSING A SPECIMEN OF THE WRITER'S POETRY.

It is true, my dear L., I did promise to send you a copy of verses of my own manufacture, but I did not anticipate a call for the performance of that promise. What is there in this round world that a gentleman, under certain circumstances, will not promise a lady? But what lady before ever dreamed that such promises would be remembered for an hour! and yet you tell me that a gentleman is bound to keep his word even at the expense of his understanding! A pretty story to be sure, and full of encouragement.

But, come, I am not among the number of those who think it creditable to a man of business to write verses. The folly consists in showing them. I have, it seems, promised to commit that folly, and you hold me to my word. 'Tis very well. You shall have the poetry, but you must take some pains with it. I cannot consent to send my little untried argosy to sea without a convoy. I cannot suffer my poetical offering to go forth into the world without a letter of introduction. Therefore, be it remembered, that at a certain period of my life I was peculiarly subject to one of those natural or constitutional infirmities, for which it is said there are but two remedies, to wit, hanging and marriage; both desperate, since that which is generally preferred as the milder of the two, is often found to be worse than the disease it cures. The symptoms of the malady, for such I may venture to call it, are first discoverable in absence of mind, loss of appetite, loss of judgment, a whining melancholy, a fearful countenance and a feverish imagination. The disease, however, operates differently upon different temperaments. In some it annihilates moral principle, destroys the sense of reputation, the dignity of virtue, and even triumphs over humanity itself. In others it elevates and purifies the mind; banishes whatever is sordid, silences whatever is ignoble, corrects the selfishness of the heart, and places the reins of passion in the hands of honour. But in all it disorders the vision and weakens the judgment. The eye becomes subject to an illusion which no medical skill can correct, and no effort of the mind can dispel. Even deformity seems vested with grace, and ugliness clad in the raiment of beauty. Thus forms, features and qualities, of the most commonplace character, are by its magic power endowed with whatever is lovely and attractive.

I shall not presume to name the malady. It is a name already too familiar to the female ear; since it is profaned by thousands who affect its presence, but never felt its power. I, however, can speak of it from experience, from knowledge dearly bought. I caught the disease at the early age of nineteen, by thoughtlessly looking in the eyes of a beautiful girl, as I was carelessly walking with her across the fields, at the close of a delightful day in June. It passed through my veins like wildfire, and the fever never entirely left me until I had been married more than a month! Thus, for a period of "seven long years and something over," was I familiar with its palmy dreams and feverish hallucinations. But I must confess, the contagion flowed not always from the same source, nor were the paroxysms always equal in violence or duration. Had I believed in astrology, I should have considered myself as moon-struck, and under planetary influence; so strongly was I attracted and bewildered by the meteors that shot across my path, or blazed around me.

Among the number of those alluring lights was Miss ——. She was then in the zenith of her glory—the leading star in the constellation of beauty, and to my eye transcendently bright. She realized, and even surpassed, in form and feature, in grace and loveliness, all that I had read in romance, and all that my youthful imagination had conceived of female perfection. She was to me the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end of every thought. I would not have exchanged her smile for a principality, nor a walk with her by moonlight, for Paradise itself. But "the course of true love never did run smooth." All my rhapsodies, all my protestations were in vain, all lost, all thrown away. They were altogether too sublime for her conception. They had, in fact, but little of the tangibility of this world about them. They were not absolutely rejected; but, like incense offered to a pagan idol, they rose above the form, and mingling with the grosser vapours, were scattered by the winds of heaven. In plain English, she had, fortunately, more judgment than passion, and thought vastly more of a principality than I did. I had nothing but passion and imagination, and they served only to increase each other. At that feverish period of my life I looked with contempt upon what the world calls fortune, and scorned the inert and barren forms of material splendour. She valued fortune above all things, and there we differed. I was unwilling to be consumed by a slow fire; she was disposed to hold the torch and prolong the tortures, and upon that we quarrelled. I was ardent and perhaps impetuous; she was cool and talked of time and patience. I hated the very name of patience as I did the d—l himself, and in the burning fever of the moment I cursed it with all its attributes. It was, I believe, an audible malediction, for she rose—I bowed—and so—we parted!

But we both lost by it. She a true, but impassioned lover; I a vain, but golden dream. We met again last winter for the first time since that parting; but the interval was a fatal one. It was a period of twenty years! yet so vivid were my recollections of the past, that I was greatly embarrassed at the meeting. I was shocked, too, at the change she had undergone. She appeared, indeed, but a mere wreck of what she once was; while the picture of her youth and beauty, left upon my mind, had suffered no change. It was a picture, no doubt, greatly indebted to the pencil of the imagination; but it was one formed of colours "dipt in heaven"—colours upon which the lapse of years had made, and could make, no impression. But the original! Time had played the very mischief with it. I could not help internally cursing the old filine for the havoc he had made. I felt it as a sort of personal injury; and though I had no right to interfere, yet on my way to my lodgings I determined to write him a note. So, walking directly to my room, and calling for two candles and a glass of gin and water, I sat down, and after several unsuccessful beginnings, at length produced the following epistle: which I now beg leave to transmit in fulfilment of my promise. If it should afford you a moment's amusement, I shall have accomplished more than I ventured to hope.

P. S. I have this moment received the old gentleman's answer, which I also take the liberty to enclose.

EPITILE TO TIME.

O Time! thou rude relentless power,
Why from the dreams of youth awake me?
Why darkenest thou the future hour,
Thou heartless churl! perdition take thee!

Why, tyrant, quench that glorious flame
That once with such intenseness burned?
Why leave the light of Myra's name
To blaze o'er blighted charms unburned!

Why her once magic form divest
Of sceptred love's heart-thrilling power!
And why, O Time! with scythe and scudst,
Crop'st thou life's passion-flower!

Why from the throbbing bosom take
The aspiring hopes that rec'd it there,
And in their purple palace wake
Pale thought and heart-corroding care!

Why in thy reckless flight invade
Youth's towering strength and beauty's bloom,
And cast, while yet in light array'd,
The shadows of their coming doom!

And is it thine, stern power, to wake
The slumbering heart from dreams of bliss,
And ere to other worlds we take,
Blight every joy that beams on this!

And tell me, tyrant, can it be
That love's soft light on Ellen's brow,
Shall e'er, like Myra's beauty, flee,
Or wax as dim as that is now!

Must disappointment's cruel sting,
And sorrow be the lot of all?
If so, swift speed thy withering wing,
And cast o'er thought oblivion's pall!

P. S. May I ask, sir, the favour—a trifle at most. Of an answer to this by return of the post: 'Tis a subject important to others, you see, And not a mere matter between you and me; So the trouble it gives you, I pray you'll excuse, And while you are writing, just drop me the news

TIME'S ANSWER.

Vain mortal! cease thy idle strain;
'Tis worse than folly to complain
Of my relentless power.
This world is but a passing show—
A scene of trouble, joy and woe,
Where clouds and darkness lower.

Then turn from this dim spot thine eye,
Nor leave one unavailing sigh,
At my unceasing flight:

A flight, which e'en to thee may bring,
That faith which soars on radiant wing,
From darkness up to light!

Man's mortal race to Time must yield—
No prayer can save, no power can shield
From pre-ordain'd decay.
It is life's dark glorious lot,
To fade, to die, and be forgot,
And pass unth aways.

Earth's dreams of bliss, love, glory, power!
What are they! pageants of an hour,
Which touch'd, dissolve in gloom
Thus human hopes and human fears,
Borne on the silent stream of years,
Sink to oblivion's tomb!

All cover beneath my withering wings—
The imperial chief of scepter'd kings,
The beautiful, the brave;
And mingling in one common urn,
Alike to vulgar dust return,
The despot and the slave.

O'er rolling worlds, to man unknown;
O'er all beneath the eternal throne,
My chast'ning power extends.
The vast infinitude of space,
The multitudinous abyss,
E'en dead before me bends!

Yet shall my course in heaven be run,
The years dissolved, the glorious sun,
In final darkness close!
This world shall press to funeral pyre,
And nature, through all space, expire,
In agonizing throes.

But o'er creation's smouldering pile,
Shall man's immortal spirit smile
Serene, and fearless soar
Mid fading worlds to its abode,
Its native home, the throne of God,
When Time shall be no more!

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

A DOG-STAR.—An actor named Smith, and a sagacious dog named Brute-us, were the principal performers in a drama introduced at Drury-Lane under the dynasty of Sheridan. One day, when the two stars were advertised to perform in the evening, Smith came to the manager with a very long face and expressed his apprehensions that the performance would have to be deferred. "Why, what is the matter? speak at once!" said Sheridan. "I have broken my leg, and can't play," replied Smith. "Is that all?" rejoined Sheridan. "Why did you keep me in suspense? Good heavens! I was afraid the dog had been taken ill."

AN UNFORTUNATE EXPRESSION.—A London paper, in noticing the performances at the Drury-Lane theatre, says: "The lessee's speculation in producing the opera of Guillaume Tell has completely answered, and must be an assurance to all managers that a good thing, well done, will eventually remunerate the undertaker." Alas! is the poor drama on its death-bed, and is the remuneration of the "undertaker" already a matter of consideration!

RESIGNATION.—The Picayune mentions the following singular case of resignation:—"The most remarkable instance of resignation we have heard of lately is that of the Iowa Banner, which calmly folded up its arms, sung its own death-song, A Taden, and died! We are wearing caps on the left arm." Newspapers generally die hard. The I—owe—ah! Banner is an exception.

FICTION AND FACT IN AMERICAN LITERATURE.—It is remarked by Mr. McMichael in his late published address before the Philadelphia Lyceum, that superficial observers are apt to believe that the chief productions of American pens are works of imagination, but directly the reverse of this is the truth. In our home productions, the scientific and practically useful predominate, and to subjects connected with the education special attention has been directed. Thus, of two hundred and fifty-one original works published in 1834, only twenty-seven were novels and poetry, and all the remainder related to education, divinity, history, and biography, jurisprudence, travels, the sciences and arts.

OLIVER TWIST COMPLETED.—Messrs. Lee and Blanchard have published a very new edition, in one volume, of "Oliver Twist," with all the illustrations by Cruikshanks. It is one of Dickens's most popular productions, and will be found an agreeable entertainment for young and old. The moral is unexceptionable, the story entertaining, and the style pure and vigorous. Mr. Dickens has already reached a distinction paralleled only by that of the author of Waverley in the history of literary successes.

ANNON.

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

TREACHERY FOR TREACHERY.

From the French of Eugene Hugo.

In the midst of one of the forests of Westphalia, in a vast glade, stands a tribunal, constructed with the trunks of trees. At the four corners are four men armed with axes. In front is placed a block, covered with black drapery, on which is a sword. By the light of torches, attached to the trees, are seen moving at a distance in the forest, men enveloped in cloaks, who converse, who make unusual gestures, and pace the ground in tumultuous agitation.

Suddenly seven men, likewise enveloped in cloaks, and with high plumes on their heads, mount the tribunal. The crowd approaches and presses under the trees which surround the glade. The four men armed with axes proclaim the sinister cry of Welch Gericht—(a word of recognition of the free judges.)

"What is the hour?" asked the chief of the seven judges.
"It is the first hour of day," reply the four executioners.
"It is well," says the grandmaster, seating himself.
And the four executioners proclaim in a loud voice—"Silence for the judgment of the free counts!"

The grandmaster rises and says—"The emperor addresses to us the order to dissolve our austere tribunal. But can Sigismund destroy that which Clotemnege has established? Can he dispense with transmitting to his successor the sword which he has received from those who have preceded him upon the throne? It is not for Sigismund more than for any of the emperors who may reign after him, that we have been created by those who have founded the empire. Sigismund has not, then, the right to dissolve us. I maintain that we should appeal from his decree to the future emperors, and that we ought to exist until we are recognized by ourselves as having become useless, by a true reformation in the conduct of those who obey, and of those who reign."

The discourse of the grandmaster is welcomed by a murmur of approbation. The cry of "Secret tribunal!" "Secret tribunal!" is heard from all sides. The judges alone shudder; for it seemed to them that in the midst of the cries of the crowd, and through the sound of the wind, a voice had pronounced the famous cry of the partisans of the imperial power, "Prohibited tribunal!"

The grandmaster rises a second time and says—"We be to us, if hate or friendship have any influence on our decisions! May the blood of the innocent, as well as the impurity of the guilty, be on our head! I cite before you, as guilty of treachery, the knight Eberhard Von Wolfenbuttel!"

Here different opinions arose between the other six knights and the free judges.

"There is a decision of the emperor against us. Who will dare to charge himself with the execution of the sentence of death? We to those who will have pronounced it! Besides, it is certain that we are not assuring here private vengeance?"

"Here there is no private vengeance," answered the grandmaster. "The law speaks Eberhard merits death. I have sent knights to seize him in his castle. He will be convicted by his own words, and put to death by our swords."

For the second time the four men armed with axes exclaimed in a loud voice—"Eberhard Von Wolfenbuttel!" and the crowd answered by the shouts of "Respect to the free judges! Fulfilment to the justice of the free counts!"

At this moment, at the extremity of the glade, appeared a knight, tied on his horse, and conducted by four armed men, who walked with their swords in their hands.

Two knights advanced, and received in a low voice the password that the guards of the prisoner transmitted to them; and then halting at some distance from the tribunal, exclaimed—"Behold Eberhard Von Wolfenbuttel!" The night was gloomy; dark clouds flitted across the moon; the torches attached to the trees threw but a feeble light; the greater number of the knights, terrified by the orders of the emperor, feared equally to recognize those who surrounded them, and to be recognized themselves.

"Art thou Eberhard of Wolfenbuttel?" demanded the grandmaster of the prisoner.

"I am he," replied a voice, that all the knights present recognized for that of Eberhard.

It was remarked only, that the knight who was tied on his horse let his head fall on his breast; some believed that he heard a stifled groan. But all were attentive to the words of the grandmaster; and the forest was beginning to be agitated by an approaching storm.

"Eberhard," said the grandmaster, "thou art accused of treachery; what hast thou to say in thy defence?"
"The treachery," answered Eberhard, "is that of him who has no fear to send his son into my castle, under pretext of hospitality, to take possession of my person, and conduct me before this tribunal of blood."

"There is no treachery towards traitors," replied the grandmaster. "I think so likewise," answered Eberhard.

"Thou art accused of treachery," said the grandmaster; "what hast thou to say in thy defence?"

"Free counts," rejoined Eberhard, "be judges between him and me. One of the sons of the grandmaster had dishonoured the sister of my friend; and, to withdraw himself from his vengeance, he became a monk. Notwithstanding the sanctity of his habit, my friend dared to slay him. According to your laws he merited death. I was chosen by the grandmaster to assassinate him. I preferred my friend to my oath. I declared to him the password, and aided him to cross the Rhine. Of what am I guilty?"

"Of a crime which merits death," answered all the free judges.

"What!" cried Eberhard, "there is then no distinction of motives? He who reveals the secrets of the order must perish?"

"Thou hast said it," answered the grandmaster.

"But if he were a prisoner in the castle of his enemy; if he were menaced with tortures; if he were approached by red-hot braziers?"

"If he declares the words of the order he must perish," replied the grandmaster.

"It is you that have said it!" exclaimed Eberhard. "May the blood which is about to be shed be on your head!"

At this moment the four armed men conducted the horse of the knight to the fatal block. Sword in hand, they forced him to descend. The unfortunate groaned faintly, and his stifled sighs contrasted with the language which had been just heard.

"Who will charge himself with the execution?" demanded the grandmaster.

No voice answered. The orders of the emperor were so formidable and precise, that no one presented himself.

"It shall then be myself," rejoined the grandmaster with eagerness, and as if irritated by the silence.

He descended from the tribunal. He advanced, followed by the four executioners. Arrived near the armed men, he demanded of them—"Where is my son?" They replied—"He is not far." Thereupon they retired, and were lost in the crowd.

"At last thou art going to die, Eberhard!" exclaimed the old man, with a fierce joy.

A stifled groan was all the response of the prisoner.

"On thy knees, coward!" exclaimed the grandmaster.

And as the prisoner hesitated the executioners forced him to kneel, and seizing his hair, held his head upon the block. The old man struck. There was a profound silence. Then, lifting his sword, he cried in a triumphant voice—"He is dead!"

"Who is it that is dead?" demanded a voice, that all the assistants recognized with affright for that of Eberhard.

They bring torches. They examine the corpse. A gag had closed his mouth. The grandmaster recognized with horror his own son! He rises. "Light torches! Search the forest! Knights, aid me to find the traitor, who is hidden among us!"

A voice makes itself heard.

"We to those who have transgressed the orders of the emperor!" Suddenly the torches go out. There is a profound silence; and the entire assembly separates, as if it had been dispersed by a prodigy.

I. F. H.

ORIGINAL SCRAPS.

NOTES FROM MY COMMONPLACE-BOOK.

BY T. IRVING.

COMPOSITION OF ORIGINAL MUSIC.

ALL know how difficult it is for the greatest poetical genius to free himself, in any considerable degree, of those common-places and idioms, which long custom, and eternal repetition of versifiers, have made a habit almost as inevitable as a natural tendency. In music this is ten times worse. The common-places "musical phrases," as they are styled, which have spread themselves everywhere through the medium of the voluminous and endless compositions of science, have, of necessity, become almost a part of the nature of every one who is possessed of a musical ear. They fly abroad "upon the wings of the wind," like the feathered seeds of the thistle or dandelion. There is no avoiding them. We hear them by day and by night; in the theatre, in the street, in the church, in the ball-room. Like Pharaoh's plagues, they follow us into our very chambers. The difficulty of original composition is thus increased a hundred-fold, and the most determined cultivator of simple, expressive melody, will find himself, at every step, sliding into some of the innumerable artificial turns or modulations, with which constant custom has indelibly impressed his imagination.

CONSULTING THE POPULAR TASTE.

The more general the opinion that modifies and directs a poet's taste, the more original will he be. There never has been tale or epic since the world began, so original as the early English dramas, which were composed imperatively for success and bread, and consequently kept ever in view the taste of the auditory. But people at present fancy that the only entrance to originality is through the narrow duct of their own egotistical spirit, and that to wing their way through the free and open space of general sentiment, would be but to follow a beaten path. It is just as if a carpenter or a blacksmith were to attempt perfecting himself in his trade by chiselling or hammering his own nose instead of the wood or iron, which are his natural materials.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

It is asserted somewhere by Rousseau, no mean judge of such matters, that the musical world may be divided into three classes. Those who are capable of feeling the intellectual part of music, who are generally men with something of a poetical temperament, and no very correct ear for harmony; those who have an ear for harmony, and a taste for harmonious arrangement, but whose feelings are not excited by expressive melody, and who are, for the most part, men deficient in imagination; and lastly, those who unite these two qualifications—a class, says Rousseau, rather rare.

EGOTISTICAL WRITERS.

The simplest and easiest effort of the mind is egotism—it is but baring one's own breast, disclosing its curious mechanism, and giving exaggerated expression to every-day feeling. Yet no productions have met with such success—what authors can compete as to popularity with Montaigne, Byron, Rousseau? Yet I cannot but believe that there have been thousands of men in the world, who could have walked the same path, and have met the same success, if they had had the same impudence.

A TROUBLESOME VICE.

It was a remark of Sheridan, that of the several sorts of vice that prevail in this sinful world, one of the most troublesome to him was advice.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

PERE-LA-CHAISE.

BY CHARLES CONSTANTINE PISE, D.D.

WHERE am I?—Whither have my wandering steps
Conducted me?—Among the twilight haunts
Of Sorrow; where, lone maid! in mourning clad,
Her brows bound with funeral leaves, she weeps,
In silence, o'er the tombstones of the dead.

Groves of green cypresses! gray pyramids,
Whose tops commingle with the gloomy boughs
In sad sepulchral grandeur! ye proclaim
The spot whereon I tread—ye tell, in sooth,
That I am now within the hallowed walls
Of a vast cemetery, where, will rest,
In their due time, with those who now lie here,
Myriads of beings now so full of life.

Ah! there is something in these precincts lone.
In this asylum for the dead, which chimes
Congenially, yet sadly, with my heart.
I love these silent haunts, recesses deep;
For here, my spirit, wearied with the world,
May court the quiet of the solitude.

Ye narrow paths that wind among the groves!
Sepulchral alleys! where the pompous tombs,
Sublimely wrought and finished, of the great,
Rear high their heads! and others, not so proud,
More simple, more appropriate, strewn with flowers,
Disclose their modest worth!—'Tis good to stray,
With pensive Contemplation by my side,
And read the lines inscribed upon the tombs.

But why these monuments, these empty urns,
These mausoleums, and lugubrious trees?
Why all this pageantry above the dust
Of those who sleep unconscious of it all?
'Tis meet,—let every honour be bestowed
Upon the relics of the dead we love;
They are enshrined but for a brief career:
And though to dust they moulder, still they are
To be collected at the last great day,
And re-united with the immortal soul.

Lo! o'er the city, where, awhile ago,
A dense fog brooded, shoots the setting sun,
Gladdening the spires with its departing beams.
Ah! what a contrast!—here, 'tis silence all,
Eternal silence! there, all noise and stir.
A thousand cars are rattling o'er the streets;
The welkin with ten thousand voices rings.
There is a rush of living beings on—
A tumult in creation—passions wild
Urges forward men and women, light and gay,
Trip on luxuriously!—there, all is life!
Here breathless silence—silence of the grave.
Hushed generations slumber, and dream not!
Genius is quenched—talent absorbed in death;
Passions are calmed and chilled—their pulse beats not!
But all is clasped in horrible repose.
In vain upon the silent manes I call.
Echo may answer—but they answer not.

But hark! the clock tolls forth the knell of day!
Evening, in sombre weeds, usurps the hour;
And the half moon, with watery crescent pale,
Hangs o'er this place of death—still there is light
Sufficient to decry upon a cross
These tender words, deep in the granite carved,
As the last token of parental love:

"HERE LIES EUGENE—FAREWELL, BELOVED ROY."

And thou, lone spot, farewell!—ye stately rows
Of mortuary trees and shrubs—ye tombs,
The homes—last homes—of husbands, wives, and babes;
Of warriors, princes, wealthy, great, and wise!
Adown the hillside's side I wend my way,
And reach the fatal gate—an aged man
Unbars it—with a harsh and grating sound
It open swings—and I am once again
Breathing without the precincts of the dead!
That gray-haired man hath made his dull abode
Among the tombs—the guardian of the place.
Habit hath made him callous to the scene.
He views, from morn till night, this field of skulls;
Without emotion sees the mournful hearse,
And hears, unmoved, the sobs of wailing friends.

Farewell, old man!—How many victims more
Will it be thine to usher in these gates,
Never again to leave them!—Ah! kind heaven,
Grant, as the boon the dearest I can crave,
That my poor ashes may find rest—not here—
Not mid these gorgeous sepulchres—but on
The soil that gave me birth, beyond the deep.
My pillow be the turf wherein I trod
In childhood—let the guardian angel there
Who o'er my cradle watched, watch o'er my grave.
And be no pompous marble reared in pride
Above my dust—a rural cross be there,
Dear emblem of all hope beyond the grave.
No flattering eulogy be there inscribed;
My name—and one last wish to all who pass,
That, for my spirit they would breathe a prayer.

Paris, December 9th, 1833.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THOUGHTS ON LAWYERS.

BY THEODORE S. FAY.

In a late paper, headed "a Lecture for the Lawyers," I ventured a few philosophical reflections on that intelligent and useful class of our fellow citizens, and I took the liberty to show how one of their body would act, supposing Owen's 'Moral World' to be true. Several other ideas have occurred to me upon the same subject, to which, as I do not mean to be very prolix, I invite the reader's attention, nor do I deem it necessary to make any apology to the fraternity, as I know that, skillful as they are in discerning reasons on either side, they will find arguments in my favour a plenty—if they wish to do so.

The nominal purpose of a Court of Justice is to seek the truth; but I question whether the truth is ever in other places more attacked, snored at, brow-beaten, ridiculed, and put out of countenance. It is the truth, which every one in his turn finds it his interest to conceal. It is truth that every one is afraid of. Even the party most unequivocally in the right, is anxious to exclude the truth from the other side, lest it may seem to contradict his own; and all the lawyers, and even the judge, seem as much on the watch to stop the witness's mouth, every two minutes, as they have to make him come there to open it. To me, one of the most ridiculous things in the world is, a witness upon the stand, trying (poor fellow!) to give in his testimony. He is, we will suppose, not in the slightest degree interested in either of the parties, and doubtless, wishes them both tied together by the neck, and dropped off the stern of one of the North river steamboats. He comes into court, not voluntarily, but dragged if he resists, by two or three scowling ministers of the law, who, from the mere fact of his being presumed to know something about the pending suit, think themselves entitled to treat him as if he had been brought up for robbing a hen-roost. He is forced from his business or his amusements for the purpose of speaking the truth, and he inwardly resolves to tell the whole story as soon as possible, and get rid of the thing. He thinks he knows the worst. He thinks the loss of time, and the awkwardness of speaking for the first time of his life in public, are the extent of his sufferings. Unsuspecting victim! He no sooner mounts the stand, than he finds himself at once the centre of a circle of enemies, and holding a position not greatly unlike that of a prisoner in an Indian war-dance. He tries to tell his story.

Witness.—I was going down Maiden-lane—

First Lawyer.—Stop, sir.

Second Lawyer.—Don't interrupt the witness.

Third Lawyer.—The witness is ours.

Fourth Lawyer.—(Fiercely and indignantly,) we want the fact.

Judge.—Let the witness tell his story.

Witness.—I was going down Maiden-lane, where I live.

First Lawyer.—We don't want to know where you live, sir.

Second Lawyer.—That is a part of his testimony.

Third Lawyer.—You can take the witness into your own hands when we are done with him; at present he is ours.

Witness turns pale.

Fourth Lawyer.—(Sarcastically,) Very well, sir.

Judge.—Gentlemen, I beg you will sit down.

One of the Aldermen.—Officer, keep order.

Officer, (in a tone of thunder, and with a scowl of more than oriental despotism upon the spectators, who aint making any noise that they know of.)—Silence!

Witness.—I was going down Maiden-lane, where I reside, as I said before, when—

First Lawyer.—You don't come here to repeat what you said before, sir.

Second Lawyer.—I beg.

Third Lawyer.—(Starting to his feet,) I demand.

Fourth Lawyer.—I appeal to his honour, the judge, to protect me from the impertinence of this witness.

First, second, third, fourth, Lawyer and Judge together.—"The witness must—"

Officer.—(Looking at the audience again, and in a voice of thunder)—"Silence!"

Judge.—Gentlemen, it seems to me that the best way to come at the truth, is to let the witness go on, and I will call him to order if he wanders from his duty.—Witness!

Witness.—Your honour.

Judge.—Tell the plain fact of this assault—tell the jury what you know about it—remember you are here to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—raise your voice—turn your face to the jury. What do you know of this affair?

The poor wretch commences again. The first, second, third, and fourth lawyer continuing to skitish around him all the while, like a parcel of wild arab fighting for the clothes of some unhappy prisoner. So far from getting a chance to say the truth, the poor man can't get a chance to say anything. At length, bewildered out of his recollection—frightened, insulted and indignant—however really desirous of telling the truth, he stumbles upon some inconsistency; some trifling, or not trifling paradox—accounted for at once, and to every one's entire satisfaction, by the idea that he has forgotten. But then comes the cross examination. Then the scientific artillery of a cool, able lawyer, sharpened by thirty years of similar practices, is brought to bear upon one trembling and already nervous stranger; perhaps ignorant, perhaps a boy. Then comes the laugh of judge and jury, the murmur of astonishment from the crowd, that a person could be found degraded and base enough to say that "the defendant wore a little rimmed-hat," when he acknowledged subsequently off his guard, that he had "a tolerably large rim." Then the poor fellow, sore all over, and not quite sure that he will not himself be sent to the states prison, at ten years hard labour, for perjury, before the week has rolled away, although he is the only person in court who does not, in a greater or less degree, merit that punishment, is dismissed to a bench, a few yards off, where he is obliged to remain to hear the lawyers, in their address to the jury, tear his character to pieces with fine turns of rhetoric, and yet finer gesticulations.

"What, gentlemen of the jury," says the first lawyer, summing up in a tone of the deepest contempt, "what does the next witness, this Mr. Boggs, say?" Gentlemen, he comes forward under the most peculiar circumstances. A dark mystery shrouds his motives, which I shall not endeavour to altogether dissolve. But he comes forward, and he takes his place upon that witness's stand, with the open, the avowed, the undisguised, the unaffected, the determined resolution to fix upon my client, the injured Mr. Swipes, this foul and unnatural assault and battery. You saw him, gentlemen, when I cross-examined him, tremble under my eye—you saw him hesitate and turn pale at my voice." (The first lawyer, very probably, has a voice that would intimidate a bear.) "You heard him stammer and take back his words, and say he did 'not recollect.' Is this, gentlemen of the jury, an honest witness! The language of truth is plain and simple—it requires no previous calculation. If I ask you if you saw the sun set to-day, you answer yes, or no—you do not hesitate, you do not tremble. You do not say, 'yes, I did,' and in the very next breath, 'no, I did not.' You do not at first tell me, 'I walked ten miles yesterday,' and afterwards say, 'yesterday I was all day ill in bed.' (Here one of the jurors puts his nose by that of another, and utters something in approbation of this argument, and the other one nods his head and looks at the speaker as much as to say, "there is no use in trying to elude the sagacity of this keen-sighted lawyer. The witness had much better have told the truth." "Now, gentlemen, what does this witness say? He commenced by telling you, gentlemen, that he lived in Maiden-lane, that he was going home on the day when this ridiculous and unnatural assault is said to have taken place, that he saw a crowd, that he approached, that he saw Mr. Swipes, my client, the defendant in this action, come up to the plaintiff, Mr. Wilkins, and give him, Wilkins, the said plaintiff, a blow with a bludgeon. But, gentlemen, when I come to sift this plausible story, you heard him equivocate and contradict himself. 'What sort of a hat had Mr. Swipes on?' 'A black one.' Of what breadth was the rim?' 'About an inch.' He thought, doubtless, that he was to have everything his own way, till I brought upon the stand to confront him, the latter, who made and sold the hat, and who proves to you that the rim was broad. You cannot morally doubt that the hat worn on that day, by Swipes, was a broad-brimmed hat; all the witnesses for the defendant swear it, and even Mr. Boggs himself, when closely questioned, acknowledged that it might have been a broad-brimmed hat. Next, gentlemen, the pantaloons. What colour were Mr. Swipes' pantaloons? 'Black,' said this Mr. Boggs. Gentlemen, I have produced these pantaloons in court. They have been identified beyond the possibility of doubt. What was the result? You saw, yourselves, gentlemen. The pantaloons were pepper and salt."

A cry of admiration throughout the court-room. The officer cries order. The poor witness unfortunately occupies a conspicuous seat, and all eyes are fixed upon him with the most virtuous indignation. He is calculating at what sacrifice he can wind up his business, and go and settle in Kentucky. The lawyer waxes triumphant, and after a withering look at Boggs, goes on.

"Furthermore, gentlemen, I asked this witness to describe the bludgeon. He could not. Had it ivory or gold on the handle? He could not tell. Was there a ferule upon the end? Did not know. Was it heavy? Yes. Had he ever handled it? No. How could he tell the weight of a thing which he had never handled?" (Another buzz of admiration.) "Was he personally acquainted with Mr. Swipes? No. Had he ever seen him before? No. Since? No. Could he tell whether he had an aquiline nose or not? No. Was he not a friend of Mr. Wilkins? Yes. Had he not expressed an opinion upon this case? Yes, he had said the scoundrel ought to have been ashamed of himself. Was Mr. Wilkins' hat knocked off? No. But, before he left the stand, he said he saw the blood on the top of the plaintiff's head. How could he see the top of his head, unless the hat had been knocked off?"

Another buzz. The witness here rose and said, "Mr. Wilkins took it off to show me."

Officer. Silence, there!

Judge. Witness, you must not interrupt the counsel. You have had your turn on the stand. You then had the opportunity to say whatever you pleased. If you are again guilty of so great an indecorum, I shall be obliged to commit you.

Witness stands stupid.

Officer.—"Sit down!" (in a tone of indignant command. Witness sits down. Officer scowls at him as if he would snap his head off.)

I shall not follow the learned gentleman further. In only of justice, every witness that has ever been brought into a court of justice, whether he has not found it often the most difficult place in the world to tell the truth in, and whether, when the truth was at length told, there ever were so many attempts made to mystify it? Whether so much of what every one present knew in his heart to be the truth, could anywhere else be so deliberately rejected, and whether, when this poor, belaboured, mutilated, unhappy truth, so much demanded, was at length produced, it did not have such an aspect, so disguised that its own mother might not have known it?

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

GRAVE SPECULATIONS.

BY WILLIAM COX.

WHERE Hamlet soliloquizes upon suicide, and exclaims—

—To die,—to sleep.
No more—
No more—and, by sleep, to say we end
The heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to,—'tis a consummation Devoutly to be wish'd."

he but gives vent to the floating speculations and thick-coming fancies of a sick mind; or, at the most, expresses the half-formed and feverish wishes of an individual, rendered world-sick by the peculiar nature of the position in which he is placed; and by the wickedness, perfidy, duplicity and knavery of those who surround him. Perplexed with doubts and misgivings touching the truth or falsehood of the terrible disclosures of a supernatural visitant—way-laid by falsehood in the guise of friendship; his affection tangled with by the "fair Ophelia," who "repels his letters" and denies him access, at the suggestion of others; aware that the kindly familiarity of schoolfellowship and the claim of old companionship, are brought to bear against him merely "to pluck out the heart of his mystery"—distrustful of all, save Horatio—enclosed by meshes on every side, and obliged to keep his faculties constantly on the alert, and stoop his noble, sensitive, and reflective nature to subterfuge and cunning in order to combat subterfuge and cunning—in a moment of weariness and impatience he longs for death as a "consummation devoutly to be wish'd," were it not on account of—

"What dreams may come

When we have shuffled off this mortal coil."

and he proceeds to infer that the clinging to life manifested by mankind is the natural consequence, not of the love of life, but of the "dread of something after death." But here he enters upon questionable ground. He invests mankind generally with one peculiar sensitivity to the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune," and supposes that no one would "bear the whips and scorns of the time," were it not for the aforesaid dread.

But experience shows us that this, at all events, is not

"The respect

That makes calamity of so long life."

Indeed, it is the thought that death is but a means of transition, and the hope of what may follow the change, overcoming the antagonist principle dread, that is the great means of reconciling us to the distasteful visits of that "exorable Slave."

A great portion of mankind are so engaged and wrapped up in the bustle, profits and cares of business, or so involved in the pursuits and whirl of society, that they hardly ever bring it home to themselves that their bodies, which they are so solicitous about, are the mere depositories of spiritual essences that have to outlast and these people, who have never given what could be dignified with the name of a thought, as to what was to follow death, are precisely those who manifest the strongest attachment to life. They have no idea of reveries—they cling to present possession, and would "fardels bear," and "groan and sweat" most grievously, rather than consent to "shuffle off this mortal coil." Without any reference to what is to come, it looks so like a dead loss to them to give up the fortunes they have accumulated, the houses they have built, the grounds they have purchased. It is worse than the stoppage of a bank or the failure of a commercial speculation. They cannot bear the idea.

"The wreck of matter, and the crash of worlds."

When the French passed a decree, abolishing the belief in a God, and caused to be inscribed on the entrances to the gay and fanciful cemeteries of Paris the tremendous words—"Death is a perpetual sleep," did it at all reconcile them to the idea of going to repose in the picturesque precincts of Pere la Chaise, or make them more anxious to avoid "the sea of trouble," and the "thousand natural shocks that flesh is heir to"? No, it made them "bloody, sensual, devilish"—utterly regardless of the lives of others, but most uncommonly careful of their own. The opiate of annihilation was, after all, not a pleasant draught. An extraordinary avidity to quaff it was manifest. No one displayed any great relish for the "perpetual sleep." On the contrary, they avoided it by every art and device in their power, and sought to crowd as much gaiety, dissipation, and excitement into their span of life as was well possible. Matter predominated over spirit. Intellect was despised, at least in its more noble, abstract, and refined forms. In its inferior grades it was in some request, for ribald plays and "Spectacles of Nature" ministered to the pleasures of the passing moment, and oratory led to place and power; nay, more, kept a man's own head on his shoulders, or helped to dislodge that of an obnoxious opponent. All, or nearly all, were engaged in a bloody and brutal race after material objects or gross sensualities. It was natural—though humiliating—that this should be so. They had made up their minds that this "bank and shoal of time," was to be their "be-all" and their "end-all;" they "jump'd" no "life to come." All they had to know of consciousness was in this world, and to this world they clung as if it had been a crowded wreck, with desperate fervour and with intense selfishness, careless whom they thrust into the yawning gulf, so as they only kept their hold. The wonder is, not that their conceited dogmas produced any other effect, but that how such a revolting doctrine as that of annihilation—a doctrine from which the nature of man instinctively shrinks—ever gained such footing in the world. And yet it was for some time the professed and legalized belief of a nation of thirty millions! It is a conception and a suggestion worthy of the arch-fiend himself. No thing more deadening or debasing can by possibility be imagined. It is in its very nature to either make man cold, heartless, sensual and selfish, or else to render him intensely miserable. If it make him cold, and heartless, and sensual and selfish, it may leave him coarse enjoyments, but it deprives him of anything worthy of the name of happiness; for "happiness was born a twin." It must be shared—diffused; it cannot be hoarded. But supposing the blight of such a belief to come upon a man of a warm and affectionate nature, engaged in the discharge of the duties, and encircled by the charities of life, can anything be imagined more terrible! To-day, he has parent, and wife, and child. He loves them—he rejoices in them; they are entwined and mixed up with every thought, hope, fear, or aspiration of his existence. Some common accident of life occurs, and to-morrow they are as the ground he treads upon—senseless, senseless—gone, and for ever! There is for him no futurity, no re-union. Eternity brings not back to him their looks or smiles. That brief word "forever," crushes at once and forever the garnered affection of a lifetime. They die, and hope dies with them. He sees them laid in the cold earth, and, in the anguish of such a moment, no soothing thought springs in his breast—"It is but for a little time—we shall meet again." Lost to him is the mysterious yet unutterable consolation that in the dim and distant spirit-land man may again behold the wife of his heart, the child of his hopes, the parent, the friend, the brother; the loved, the lost, the perished.

And yet there be in these enlightened days those who would endeavor to persuade us of the advantages of being without a soul; or at least any more of a soul than what serves to minister to our senses during the brief time that we strut about this speck in space—this fragment of creation! Such people ought not, perhaps, to be violently blamed, because it is difficult to enter into their natures, or form an idea of the motives or impulses by which they are actuated; but they are sincerely to be pitied. True, they will throw pity back in the bestower's face with huge indignation, for they lack not self-complacency; nevertheless it is their due, for, whether for good or evil, the great majority of us recognise ourselves as the possessors of immorta spirits; we cannot consent to degrade ourselves by the belief that we are more superior animals—children of chance—things of time and accident, that to-day are, and to-morrow as if they had never been. Without being a poet, that individual is wofully to be pitied who has not enough of the spirit of poetry in his composition—of love and hope, and yearning after the unknown and invisible—to spurn such a paltry yet appalling dogma as that of annihilation.

But it is difficult to fancy (despite Shelley) not only for any one to be a poet, but to be a lover of poetry, who seriously entertains this gross and soulless doctrine. How trivial must appear our passions, feelings and affections viewed as mere animal impulses; regarded as things finite, instead of the seeds of things infinite and everlasting. How superfluous to such a man, must seem the mighty agonies of the drama. What a fuss about the extinction of a little life! How ridiculous the lawless agencies employed to tempt Macbeth, and the "horrid suggestions," that "unfix his mind," and

"Make his seated heart knock at his ribs Against the use of nature."

How would that character be shorn of all its ghastly grandeur, if, in place of the guilty Thane stealing to the silent chamber of his guest, to violently send an immortal spirit to its dread account "with all its imperfections on its head," we could suppose Macbeth a cold materialist merely dismissing an old man from one sleep to another and a sounder! Would not the whole of that most wonderful production of the mind of man appear an unnecessary attempt to excite the feelings and call for the sympathies of the reader upon insufficient grounds!

It would, however, be a work of pure supererogation to go on illustrating what is obvious. Take the spiritual from poetry, and what do you leave but a mass of stagnant words—a few sensual, satirical, or evanescent rhymes! It would be literally divorcing soul and body.

But take the opposite view of the subject, and regarding this world but as the stepping-stone to one which "fadeth not away," the scoffing and sceptical are often accustomed to twist those who profess to believe in the glories of futurity with their extreme unwillingness to go and share in them. Now it is a truth, and therefore not to be denied, that the great body of us do not show any great inclination to move; we hold back as it were, and when there is no choice, take our departure somewhat unwillingly. With all our knowledge of the cares and troubles of this world, and all our hopes of a better, it requires much anxiety and suffering—the disappointment of our schemes, the blighting of our prospects, the loss of those that are nearest and dearest—to dissociate us from the present state, and loosen the ties which bind us to it, and make us at the last, in the affecting language of scripture, really and truly long to lay ourselves down "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." And yet there is nothing very inconsistent in all this. It is the law of our being, to love that which is immediate and present, albeit inferior, to that which is remote and distant; it is the law of our being to shun as much as we possibly can, without dishonour and disgrace, the "Fearful Shape"

"Fierce as ten furies, terrible as hell!"

and even the greatest of heroes have manifested at times, a decided repugnance to have anything to do with him. This is no imputation upon their courage; for what is courage, at least of the nobler kind, but a high moral principle which, from a sense of duty or de-

* A piece in which the actors and actresses were at the least possible expense for clothing.

vation to others, combats and overcomes the natural love of life, and enables men to frown in the destroyer's face—despise him, condemn him, brave him in his most terrible forms! Without a love of life there could be no such virtue as courage, for what merit is there in a brutal insensibility to death! No one mistakes Master Barnardine for a hero from the character given of him—"A man that apprehends death no more dreadfully but as a drunken sleep; careless, reckless and fearless of what's past, present, or to come; insensible of mortality, and desperately mortal;" and we feel that even Caesar, when he exclaims,

"Of all the wonders that I yet have heard,
It seems to me most strange that men should fear;
Seeing that death—a necessary end,
Will come when it will come!"

speaks more after the fashion of the conventional Roman than the natural man.

No—in all nations, in all ages—under every form of belief, and constitution of society, the bravest, unless mastered by high motives, have regarded death as a loathly and abhorred phantom to whom they specially deprecated an introduction.

Yet it is a rather curious, a very prominent, and an extremely nauseous feature of the light literature of the recently past and present day, that it contains so much sighing and crying, and pining and whining after the grave, as a "pleasant refuge" for the various worthy poetaster's chicken-hearted woes and sorrows. This is pitiful affectation. As if it were becoming that that tremendous Shape, at whose portentous birth his mother, Sin,

"flod, and cried out, DEATH!"
Hell tremol'd at the hideous name, and agh'd
Through all her caves, and back resounded Death!"

should be invoked merely as a means of producing a small poetical effect; as if the "dread unknown" had to be lightly longed for, on account of every trivial ill or puny disappointment—a fit of indigestion, a returned billet-doux—a harsh criticism per chance! This is disgusting, because it is felt to be false and unreal. There are many exceptions to all great rules, and unquestionably there have been, and there are, those who have longed, and do long for death as the last refuge; who have calmly and steadily pursued his every lineament, and said unto him—"Come!" and such there will be while this globe endures; but then they are, and will be, the truly worn-out and world-sick, and not the well-dressed fantastical ladies and gentlemen who write in annuals and almanacs, and publish neat octavo volumes of innocuous rhymes. People troubled with such wishes hold their tongues about the matter; they affect not angularity; they advertise not their anxiety for an undertaker.

But just in proportion as such affectations are sickening and offensive, is the desire for death impressive and affecting when felt to be real. It is impressive, because the contemplation of the meeting of dissolution and humanity is so under all circumstances; and it is affecting, because it proclaims that in a human heart Hope has expired; that the world henceforth holds nothing worth the wishing for, and that life, so sweet to all around, is to one being at least, desirable no longer. There is not anything in Bulwer finer than the sentiment (apart from the rare dramatic skill with which it is introduced) to which Rienzki gives utterance in the presence of his seeming friend and intended assassin. "Why, then, my Angelo, Cola di Rienzki may die in peace! There is a want which a profound experience of power and pomp brings at last to us—a want gnawing as that of hunger, wearying as that of sleep! My Angelo, it is the want to die!"

We feel the beauty and pathos of this because we feel its truth and sincerity, and we deeply sympathize with the noble heart from whence it breaks. Yet fine as it is, it is inferior to many passages in the old Scotch and English ballads. It lacks their simple earnestness. Take one from "Lady Anne Botwell's Lament," for instance—

"O Martinmas wind, when wilt thou blow,
And shake the dry leaves from the tree—
O gentle Death! when wilt thou come,
And take a life that wears me!"

This is no feigning.

Truly, it is a matter of fearful and overpowering interest in which ever way we regard it; and there is no "thinking" man, let his natural temperament be ever so vivacious or cheerful, but who has pondered over and over again upon the "great mystery." Philosophers have discussed it in all ages, moralists have written upon it in all forms, divines have used it as a standard theme, and myriads of millions have passed from off the face of the earth in every possible variety of shape and way, and yet the interest about it remains unabated. Addison has touched the spring of this universal sympathy. "There is nothing in history," says that fine writer, "which is so improving to the reader as those accounts we meet with of the deaths of eminent persons, and their behaviour in that dreadful season. I may also add, that there are no parts in history which affect and please the reader in so sensible a manner. The reason I take to be this: there is no other single circumstance in the story of any person, which can possibly be the case of every one who reads it. The general, the statesman, or the philosopher, are, perhaps, characters which we may never act in; but the dying man is one whom, sooner or later, we shall certainly resemble." And so it is; and notwithstanding the records of all that have died—in the silent chamber, or on the battle field—by torture, by flood, by flame, or in whatsoever way, still curiosity remains unsatisfied. There is still the same intense desire on the part of every human being to see—or, if their nerves cannot bear that—to hear, how Man and Death have met; still the same feverish anxiety concerning the mysterious separation of spirit and matter.

Surely, if there was not a something in the breast of the living which whispered to him that death was not annihilation; that turned the eye on vacancy, as if it would seek to follow the course of the enfranchised spirit through boundless space to the deep secrets of futurity, this would not be so. Surely, if all human hopes, fears, affections, agonies, were felt to be finite, all this would be superfluous, and life indeed be but

"A tale,
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury,
Signifying—nothing!"

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

ROMANCE OF THE NEWSPAPERS.

BY JOHN INMAN.

A QUESTION is sometimes discussed, "in the literary circles," at young gentlemen's debating clubs, and in print, touching the real object of newspapers. Even the conductors themselves, of those indispensable potencies—those legitimate minders of everybody's business but their own—are not unanimous, in theory, as to their own powers, privileges and obligations, although in practice they all seem to be governed by one sufficiently definite and well-understood principle, to wit, that of doing whatsoever seems good in their own eyes, unchecked save by the peril of losing subscribers. We are prepared to maintain, and to show, that in all the controversies upon this important subject—in all the disquisitions, without controversy, to which it has given rise—and in all the opinions heretofore uttered, or held without utterance, relating thereto, there has yet been no approximation even to a discovery of the truth. In short, we have a theory of our own in the matter, from the invention of which we anticipate no little credit.

The prevalent notions as to the legitimate business of the newspaper may be classed under three heads; to wit, entertainment, instruction and censorship; or, in other words, the newspaper is variously regarded as a thing helping to pass away time, like an agreeable book, a play, or any other diversion—as a periodical exhibition of pabulum to the general appetite for knowledge, a concentrator and welder, or say representative, of public opinion to the correction of abuses, the prevention and the punishment of offences. And it is all those things, besides several others, which affirm that neither of these, nor any other that has ever yet been signalled, is the great and primary end of its ministration. Up to this moment, the reality of that ministration has been a secret, no more discovered, and a great deal less conjectured than the true name of the Man in the Iron Mask, or the whole purpose for which the pyramids were erected. The honour of the discovery belongs to us, and the nineteenth century—of its promulgation, to New-York and the New-York Mirror.

We will not detain the reader by a retrospect of the toils through which we have achieved this remarkable and most valuable addition to the small sum of definite knowledge, of ascertained truth. We will not awaken his sympathies by an enumeration of the days and nights we have employed in the diligent study of all manner of gazettes; daily, semi-weekly, tri-weekly, and weekly altogether; of the patient fortitude with which we have continued, through an unknown series of years, manu versare diurna, manu nocturna, sheets of all sizes, from the prairie-like expanse of the New-Orleans Bee, or the London Times double, down to the Lilliputian pettiness of the Gibraltar Chronicle, or the least of the censorship-haunted sheets, scarcely larger than the palm of a respectable hand, that are made to satisfy the desires of an Austrian or an Italian. We look back upon these our labours truly with no little self-approbation, for indeed, they have been mighty; but we ask not the tribute of public admiration and applause, for the reward has not been wanting. We have it, rich and rare, in the triumph of success, the sense of having rendered an inestimable service to the world, and the proud assurance of going down to remotest ages as a great discoverer in the glorious fellowship of Newton, Galileo, Columbus, and the ingenious Mr. Redheffer.

Without further preamble, then, we aver that the main object—the essential business—of a newspaper, is simply to keep its readers in a worry. Of its thousand and one other agencies, all are merely subordinate and occasional; its records of passing occurrences, its notes of commercial changes, its scraps of pathos or of drollery, its fires and fatal accidents, yea, even its marriages and deaths, puffs of new books and stereotyped eulogiums of new patents, are but filling-up matter, in the estimation of the mysterious power that directs its energies, or at the best thrown in to meet the possible wants or wishes of some few excessively green readers, who live in entire ignorance as to what they ought to desire in a newspaper.

It is possible that some may ask for proof of the dictum herein before advanced; and to such we answer, "Look over your file, if you keep your papers—consult your memory, if you do not." Are you of the opposition in politics? We ask you, then, in all sincerity, have you not been daily admonished by your favourite editor, any time these nine years, that General Jackson and ultra democracy were driving the country headlong to ruin, with frightful impetuosity! You have been assured, over and over again, with a pathetic earnestness befitting the occasion, that the Indians and fortunes of the citizens were on the eve of being sacrificed; that the government was bankrupt and over and over in debt, although daily squandering thousands in bribes; that the Indians were just going to commence their barbarities on the peaceable and helpless inhabitants of the Western States; that the French, or the English, or somebody else, were playing the mischief with our commerce, and that the abolitionists were splitting the Union all up into bits, no larger than a German principality.

On the other hand, if you are a believer in "Old Hickory," and read one of the administration papers, then have you been horrified with the atrocious designs and doings of "the monster" and the shocking federalists; all your happiness has been in constant jeopardy from the nefarious projects of his honour, the mayor, your property has been wrested from you by the villainous banks, and the great bug-bear monopoly has been all the time opening his jaws to devour you.

It is so all over the world; that is, wherever editors are at liberty to write what they think proper. In those happy countries whose rulers do not choose to have their subjects worried by anybody but themselves, and where the "leading article," as well as all the other articles, must be trimmed down by the censor before it is put in type, the case is of necessity different; newspapers there have no particular object beyond the promulgation of decrees and official papers, and the indication to the people of what the government authorises them to think or believe; but where the press is at liberty to "gang its ain gait," the gait is invariably to the terrifying of the innocent public. Take any of the English or American journals—go over a file of six months, or three months, or even one, and see what a wonderful perseverance is exhibited in the humane employment of trying to frighten the people out of their wits. The English journalists always have a pet bugbear or two, which they flourish about for a season with astonishing zeal and industry. While Bonaparte was alive, he served their turn to a miracle. Every day brought to light some horrible project of his for playing the very deuse with Old England; and even when he was caged on the rocky island of St. Helena, the editors managed to keep John Bull in an agony with ingenious plots for his escape.

For the last six or eight years, the handsome, good-humoured emperor of Russia, has been the especial object of editorial terror in England. His movements have been watched with a suspicious vigilance, from which the keenest of mousers might take example. Whether he takes one of his scamping journeys, or marries off a daughter, or invites an ambassador to dine with him, or goes to see "Agliani dace at the Opera"—no matter what it is, his actions are all scrutinized, reported, exaggerated and commented upon; and always there is found in them some portent of mischief to England. If he reviews one of his regiments at St. Petersburg; lo, it is an army of fifty thousand men, to be marched instantly for war against the British possessions in India. If he pays a flying visit to one of his brother monarchs, at Stockholm, or Berlin, or Hanover, it is to concoct an alliance offensive against the peace and prosperity of Victoria's unfortunate subjects. If he gives his daughter a fine young fellow for a husband, the guineas are all in a bustle to fathom the secret policy of the match. The poor czar cannot even treat himself to a new coat, without giving rise to some fearful conjecture, which, emanating from the murky obscurity of a London printing house, enlarges and gathers force as it goes, until it assumes a form perfectly adequate to the terrification of several millions.

Now we venture to believe, and to say, that his imperial majesty is a sensible, kind hearted fellow, quite willing to mind his own business, and no way disposed to trouble himself about other people, if they will but let him alone. The government of his unwieldy empire, no doubt, gives him employment enough for his thoughts and his time, without running all over the world to meddle with the concerns of his neighbours; and as for his personal movements, we can readily imagine how glad he must be, now and then, to escape from the toils of his trade, and go off, all alone, on a frolic.

He is represented by all travellers in Russia, to be of a domestic, tick, happy in his private and personal circumstances, and remarkably fond of his children. We can imagine him sitting on a sofa, before a good fire, of a sharp-winter day, after dinner, amusing himself with a platter of hickory nuts, and chatting with his empress and their children. We can fancy him saying to his eldest daughter, a fine blooming girl of about eighteen, "Mary, my dear, you are getting to be quite a woman. We must be thinking of a husband for you one of these days." Mary looks down, smiling and blushing, and Nicholas has a suspicion that Mary has thought of the same thing before. Turning to his wife, the emperor says, "Charlotte, my love, we must talk over this matter, and see what's to be done. So Mary, my daughter, go away to your piano." Nicholas and his empress then "talk over the matter," and the latter suggests that Mary seemed very much pleased with the young duke of Leuchtenberg, when she met him at Berlin. Nicholas ponders a few moments and then says, "Well, if she likes him, and he likes her, I'm sure they shall have my consent. His father was an honest man and a brave soldier, and the young man himself bears the same character. An honest man and a brave soldier will never make a bad husband, and we must see about it directly." But, Charlotte, how odd I shall feel when I find myself a grandfather!"

Somewhat in this wise, we suppose, was the marriage of the princess first hit upon; and Nicholas must have laughed heartily at the solemn conjectures put forth by the London journalists, touching the secret policy of the alliance.

Quite recently, France and the United States have been added to the London stock of material, for the fabric of worry. And it is really amusing to read the distressing accounts in the papers, of the terrible things meditated by Louis Philippe and Mr. Van Buren. The abstraction of the Canadian, by fraud or force, is among the least of our president's nefarious designs; but not a whit less improbable than the idea which has taken possession of some of the English editors, that he is only waiting a favourable opportunity to form an alliance with France and Russia, and make war at once upon Great Britain in every quarter of the globe.

We cannot better conclude this article, than by an extract from the London Times of November thirty; preparatory to which, however, it is well enough to remind the reader that, at or about the same time, very fearful statements were put forth in some of our papers, about the wretched insufficiency of our naval and maritime defences—the formidable squadrons assembling in our neighbourhood, by orders from London and Paris—and the great danger of a sudden onslaught by John Bull, in which all our Atlantic cities should be laid in ashes, and our half-dozen poor little sloops-of-war, be sent on a visit to Davy Jones, or "told" off bodily to Sheerness or Portsmouth. The extract that follows shows, very laughably, how the tables were turned on the other side of the Atlantic, for the laudable purpose of giving all honest Englishmen a fit of the horrors.

"With regard to the United States. Is it looking to a continuance of peace that she has sent a formidable squadron to South America, of seven men-of-war, all perfect of their kind, a part of which would be sufficient to take possession of the whole of our contemptible squadrons there, at the Cape, and in India, and to send them, with our three admirals commanding them, to New-York? America does not want for seamen, and she has already too many British seamen, which should have been retained in our own ships, as a nucleus for a navy; and a few of their powerful ships, with troops, might run into Halifax harbour, and all Nova Scotia would be in their power. There is scarcely any land defence to Halifax; the troops are nearly all in Canada. George's Island is not of great force alone for large ships to pass, and they might run up to the very dockyard itself, and land with impunity, unless we have some large ships of war there. The Americans might also, at any time, take possession of Cape Breton, and establish themselves at the fine harbour of Louisbourg, and fortify it. The plentiful coal-mines would be a great acquisition to them, for coal is much wanted in the United States. New-Brunswick would soon follow; and all communications being cut off by the Americans having the superiority at sea, how long could we preserve Canada! The United States has now a navy, such as she never had before; her ships are of prodigious strength. Those called seventy-four mounts from ninety to one hundred and forty-six guns, the heaviest mount, the complement of the smallest, one thousand men. Those called frigates, of forty-four guns, generally carry sixty thirty-pounders. Those called sloops, of eighteen guns, twenty-four long twenty-four-pounders, the complement two hundred and fifty men. The Delaware, a seventy-four, mounts one hundred guns, forty-two and thirty-two-pounders; her lower gun-deck is only one foot shorter than that of our Britannia, of one hundred and twenty guns; and she threw more shot at one discharge of her guns than the Britannia, when Sir Pulteney Malcolm's flag was flying in her, by six hundred weight. Immediately upon a war, the Atlantic would be strewn by fast-sailing American privateers, (the beautiful New-York packets would soon be transformed into vessels of war,) even to the English and Irish Channels; our trade would be nearly destroyed before we could have anything to protect it; many of the English seamen captured would enter on board their privateers, and our own coast would not be safe. Brighton, and other places near the sea, could be plundered and burnt at any time, in the state they now are, by a few frigates. There are no defences whatever."

And so it goes on, for nearly a column. All which, and the like, wherever it is found, we advise our readers to pass by with a smile, as so much "romance of the newspapers."

ORIGINAL RETROSPECTIVE REVIEWS.

FAIRFAX'S TASSO.

In our review of the works of Tasso, given in our last number, we promised the following stanzas from Spenser, Book II. Chap. 9:

Surely, my sonne, then answered he againe,
If happy, then it is in this intent
That having small, yet doe I not complaine
Of want, no wish for more it to augment,
But doe myselfe with that I have content;
So taught of nature, which doth little need
Of forrenne helpe to life's due nourishment;
The fields my food, my flocke my rayment breed;
No better doe I weare, no better doe I feed.
Therefore, I doe not any one envy,
Nor am envidy of any one therefore;
They that have much, feare much to loose thereby,
And store of cares doth follow riches store.
The little that I have grows dayly more,
Without my care, but only to attend it,—
My lambs doe every yeare increase their score,
And my flockes father daily doth amend it
What have I but to praise th' Almighty, that doth send it?
Sometimes I hunt the fox, the vowed foe
Unto my lambs, and him I dislodge away.
Sometimes the fawle I pounces from the doe,
Or from the goat her kiddie, how to convey
Another while I baytes and nets display
The hards to catch, or fishes to beguile;
And when I weare am, I down doe lay
My lumbes in every shade to rest from toyle,
And drinke of every brooke, when thirst my throte doth boyle.
The time was once, in my first prime of yeares,
When pride of youth forth piced my deares,
That I diddard amongst mine equal peares,
To follow sheepe and shepherd's base attire:
For further fortune then I would inquire;
And leaving home, to roiall court I sought,
Where I did sell my life for yearly hire,
And in the prince's garden laid my wight;
There I beheld such vaineesse as I never thought.

A writer of more time and more reding than ourselves, might make a delightful article on the comparison between Tasso and Spenser. A thousand passages might be pointed out in which the English poet has borrowed largely either from "that famous Tuscane penne," of Ariosto, or, as in this instance, from the classic strains of the poet of the Holy Land. His stanza, "O goodly usage of those antique times," is taken literally from Ariosto's famous

"O gran bonità del cavalieri antich."

The idea of the legend of Artegall and Britomart, is drawn evidently from Tancréd and Clorinda, and almost the whole of the Legend of Sir Guyon or Temperance, the speaking trees in Book I, chapter ii., and the "Bourne of Bliss," are from the same source, as we shall see presently. Let it not be thought, that we lessen or seek to lessen the fair fame of one of the sweetest and purest of our English bards, in thus reminding our readers of some of the sources whence he drew his inspiration. To Spenser, less than to any man, belongs the charge of plagiarism. He copied openly, and often improved so much on the ideas he took from others, as to make them his own, by right of cultivation, if not of discovery. The boundless wealth of his mind made him independent of others, and justified him in becoming indebted to them. The rich can best afford to borrow. In whatever he copies, we find embellishment as well as appropriation—a giving, as well as a stealing of odour. Compare Spenser with Tasso, even with Fairfax for his translator, in any of these borrowed passages, and there can be no doubt as to where is the superiority in poetical feeling and expression. We dare not cumber the pages of our paper with long-winded extracts from Spenser, and can only ask our readers to take Tasso and Spenser, and trace out the likeness for themselves. They might be worse employed.

The description of the descent of the angel, in Book IX., is one of the noblest in the book. It met with the approbation, we are told, even of the learned D. D.'s of Tasso's time, who criticised the Jerusalem Delivered pretty severely, and like Dominie Sampson, pronounced the whole story of Armida and the Enchanted Island, frivou-ous. Hoole frutters away all its beauty and sublimity. Dullness is often the greatest leveller; for it can bring even Tasso down to its own standard.

While thus on either side the combat stood,
And streaming gore in equal rivers flow'd,
The Heavenly monarch from his awful height
Declined his eyes, and view'd the dreadful fight.
There plac'd aloft, presides th' omnipotent cause,
And orders all with just and equal laws,
Above the confines of this earthly scene,
By ways unsearchable to mortal men.

Tasso, on eternally founded throne,
With triple light he blazes, Three in One!
Beneath his footstep, Fate and Nature stand,
And Time and Motion wait his dread command.
There power and riches no distinction find,
Nor the frail honours that allure mankind
Like dust and smoke they flee before his eyes;
He mocks the valiant, and confounds the wise.

It is plain to every one, that this is Hoole, and not Tasso. "Awful height" and "dreadful fight," are highly poetical, but not wholly in the style of the Jerusalem Delivered. Wiffen, as usual, rises many degrees higher; but is not high enough to rival Fairfax.

WIFFEN

And now the christians were in flight, when Guelph

The field of slaughter opportunely gained;

He made them turn their forces; he himself

Bore the foe's onset, and his rage restrained.

Thus fought they; and on both sides the blood rained

In equal showers, and equally they earned

The dreary laurels of revenge disann'd.

His eyes, meanwhile, where hot the battle burned,

From his empyreal seat the King of Glory turned

There he abides, there, full of truth and love

Creates, adorns and governs all that be,

High o'er this narrow-bounded world, above

The reach of reason and of sense; there He Presides from all to all eternity.

Sublime or solemn throne, unbuilt with hands,

Three Lights in One! whilst in meek ministry,

Beneath his feet, with Fate and Nature stands

Motion, and he whose glass weighs out her golden sands.

With Place and Fortune, who, like magic dust,

The glory, gold, and power of things below,

Tosses and whirls in her capricious sport,

Reckless of honour, pride and human worth;

There He in splendour shrouds himself from show,

Which not e'en boldest eyes unshaded see,

And round about him in a glorious bow,

Millions of happy souls keep jubilee,—

Equals alike in bliss, though differing in degree.

As the loud harmony of angel hymns,

Joyous through Heaven's resounding palace rolled,

Michael he summoned, whose scrappick limbs

Sparkle and burn in adamant and gold;

And thus serenely spake—

This said, the wing'd archangel low inclined

In reverent awe before the Almighty's throne;

Then spread his golden pinions on the wind,

And swifter than all thought, away is flown:

He passed the regions which the blessed own

For their peculiar home; a glorious sphere

Of fire and splendour, next the midler zone

Of whitest crystal; and the circle clear,

Which, gemmed with stars, whirls round and charms his tenefel ear

To left, distinct in influence and in phase,

He sees bright Jove and frigid Saturn roll;

And those five other errant fires, whose maze

Of motion some angelic spark of soul

Directs with truth unwearied to the goal:

Through fields of endless sunshine he arrives

Where thunders, winds and showers, from pole to pole,

Waste and renew, as each for mastery strives,

Green Earth, that fades to bloom, and to decay revives

The horrors of the storm, the shadowy glooms,

With his immortal fans he shakes away:

The splendour falling from his face illumines

Night with a sun's fire luminous as day.

So after rain in April or in May,

The sun with colours fine of every hue,

Paints the moist clouds green, crimson, gold and gray,

Cleaving the liquid sky's calm bosom blue,

So shines a shooting star in momentary view.

FAIRFAX.

Now fled the Frenchmen, when in lockie howr
Arrived Guelpho, and his helping band,

THE AMERICAN WALTZ.
COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

NEW MUSICK.

"LOVE, HONOUR AND OBEY!"

THE WORDS BY GEORGE P. MORRIS.
Musick by Charles E. Horn.

I.
WHEN Love in myrtle shades reposed—
His bow and darts behind him slung—
As dewy twilight round him closed,
Lisette these numbers sung:
"Oh, Love! thy sylvan bower
I'll fly, while I've the power;
"Thy primrose way leads maids where they
"Love, honour and obey!"

II.
"Escape," the boy-god said, "is vain!"
And shook the diamonds from his wings:
"I'll bind thee captive in my train,
"Fairest of earthly things!"
"Go, lovely archer, go!
"I freedom's value know:
"Then hence away, to none I'll say
"Love, honour and obey!"

III.
"Speed, arrow, to thy mark!" he cried—
Swift as a ray of light it flew!—
Love spread his purple pinions wide,
And faded from her view!
Joy filled that maiden's eyes—
Twin load-stars from the skies!—
And one bright day, her lips did say
"Love, honour and obey!"

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Elements of Guitar-Playing," by James Ballard. Published by Greb and Walker, Maiden-Lane.—This is a work which has for some time been much needed by the guitarists of our country where no elementary book has heretofore been published, which, by combining theoretical with practical instruction, would enable those who study it, to master the guitar-musick of modern composers. In England, indeed, a translation of Sor's large work is to be had; but it is miserably executed. The guitar is now becoming every day a greater favourite as its capabilities are better known, especially among the ladies, who esteem it for the elegance of its form and the facilities it affords for accompanying the voice in singing. For this purpose, the work of Mr. Ballard is particularly useful; he having laid down a system of fingering for all the chords, with tables for cadences in every key, and arpeggios in every kind of time which are calculated to give a deeper insight into the nature of guitar musick than any system with which we are acquainted, and which cannot but exceedingly facilitate the making of accompaniments even to those who do not wish to enter deeply into the mysteries of the science of harmony. This is a matter of no slight importance; for we are well convinced that many who want neither inclination nor ability to learn to accompany themselves, are deterred from making the attempt, by a consideration of the time and expense demanded for the study of the pianoforte. We are glad to see the guitar become better appreciated; for we look upon the instrument as one of the best means for diffusing through the whole mass of our variously constituted population the softening and elevating influences of musick. The beauty and accuracy with which this work is printed, must also prove a powerful recommendation in its favour.

"Wales, and other Poems." By Maria James. With an introduction, by A. Potter, D. D.—We are informed by the editor of these poems, that Maria James is a young woman at service in the family of Mrs. Garretson, of Rhinebeck, sister of the late Chancellor Livingston. The introductory remarks of Mr. Potter are judicious and to the purpose. He says—"The taste for books and original composition which Maria James early manifested, has not been repressed; nor, on the other hand, has it been encouraged at the expense of duties, which, however humble, are still duties. Happily for herself, she early made the discovery, that the highest dignity of a rational mind is to be found in coupling the cultivation of its own powers with the diligent discharge of duty; and I need not say that, to those who have made this discovery, the fame of successful authorship is but a secondary object." With such excellent advisers as Mr. Potter, we cannot fear that the publication of this little volume will excite any anticipations in the author which are doomed to be disappointed. Her verses give evidence that she possesses one of the most essential attributes of the poetick character—a keen sensibility to the beauties and harmonies of nature, combined with reverential feelings and aspirations. Her versification, with the exception of her attempt at blank verse, betokens a good ear for rhythm, and a taste for poetical expression. These qualities go far to the composition of a poet, but they must be united with something of a higher and diviner order. The creative faculty must be present, to breathe the breath of life into the moulded statue. There is no more frequent and dangerous error among young writers and would-be authors, than that which leads them to mistake the imitative for the true poetical, the creative faculty. How many youthful prodigies and "uneducated poets" have been led by a fatal facility of imitation, and an unfortunate knack at tagging rhymes, into the delusion that they were poets—creators! Alas! how many a precocious genius, who, in the belief of his too partial parents and friends, was to turn out a Shakespeare or a Milton, has gone down to oblivion with the undistinguishable mass, unhonoured and unremembered! These remarks are, perhaps, not altogether pertinent to the case in point, for neither Maria James, nor the editor of her works, pretends that there is any evidence of genius in these agreeable little poems. They, perhaps, give evidence of what is far better, a grateful heart, a cultivated and contented mind, rich in the consolations of religion and in its own quiet thoughts and "thick-coming fancies."

"An Address delivered before the Northern Lyceum of the city and county of Philadelphia," by Morton McMichael, Esq.—We have read with much interest this eloquent and appropriate address, and find that the high eulogiums elicited by its delivery, are more than justified by the deliberate criticism of the closest. The prolix subject chosen by Mr. McMichael is that of popular education, and he has treated it in a manner at once philosophical and practical. His diction combines energy with grace, and his views are evidently the result of his own reflection, and not shadowed forth from the minds of others, or gleaned from books and reviews. We have marked many passages in this excellent address for quotation, but we hope that, in the meantime, our readers will possess themselves of the whole. It should be extensively circulated and read.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK.—Hamblin has a long engagement at this theatre, and will produce in rapid succession the pieces which drew so largely at the Bowery during its palmy days. We doubt not the engagement will be a profitable one to Simpson.

NATIONAL.—Burton, the inimitable Burton, concluded his too brief engagement at this theatre, on Saturday last. No actor ever visited this city who made a more decidedly favourable impression upon his audience. He kept everybody in good humour, and there was scarcely a serious-looking visage—until he left us. The truth is, Burton is an extraordinary man—besides being one of the very first of living comedians, he is a scholar and a man of letters, to say nothing of his other good qualities, which have won him the respect and esteem of all who have the pleasure of his personal acquaintance. He left this city with the kindest wishes for his prosperity; and we have heard earnest hopes expressed for his speedy return. Let him come when he will to New-York, he will be welcome. Miss Shirreff, Wilson and Seguin are still at the National, doing all in their power to delight a public that has done so much for them. Mrs. Bailey's engagement at this house has given universal satisfaction. She is a charming vocalist, and a light and graceful actress. Opera is more popular in this city than any other species of theatrical entertainment. Viva la musica!

BOWERY.—Arrangements for reconstructing the Bowery have been made, and the work is already commenced. The structure, it is believed, will be complete some time in May. We learn that several new pieces are in preparation for Hamblin, which promise to prove equally attractive with those which have brought such large sums heretofore to the treasury of this theatre.

THE FAILURE OF MR. AND MRS. MATTHEWS.—The London papers are full of speculations as to the causes of the failure of Mr. and Mrs. Matthews. The journalists generally acquiesce in assigning as the principal cause, "the puritanical displeasure of individuals at the lady's alleged cosmopolitan and anti-platonic habits." If such were the cause, and we believe it was, we consider it honourable to our community. If it be puritanism to manifest displeasure at notorious outrages upon the moral decencies of society, we hope that puritanism will continue to be a characteristics of our people.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. Terms, five dollars per annum, payable in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

G. P. Scott, Printer, corner of John and Gold streets.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL, DEVOTED TO LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS.

Embellished with Fine Engravings, and Music arranged with accompaniments for the Piano-forte.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR. SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED AT THE OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, NUMBER ONE BARCLAY-STREET, NEXT TO THE CORNER OF BROADWAY. (PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.)

VOLUME SIXTEEN.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1839.

NUMBER THIRTY-FIVE.

ORIGINAL TALES.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

BY JOHN NEAL.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

The Gloves.

It was even so! There lay the fellow to the very glove I had picked up! I began to feel vexed with myself, and half ashamed of the little romp. If accident, or carelessness, how came it there! lying, not in the narrow path where it might have been dropped, but in the very middle of the highway, as if it had been flung there, and left as a challenge where it could not be overlooked. Was it a lure? "Had a glove been dropped for want of a handkerchief? Pooh!" said I, and was just on the point of stepping to the edge of the road and throwing them both into the bushes together, when he caught my arm. "Stop! stop!" said he, "what are you doing?" "Why, to tell you the truth," I replied, speaking with great deliberation, for I meant to be impressive—"to tell you the truth, sir, I am not at altogether satisfied with the behaviour of our young friend there, at the top of the hill."

"Ah, ha! yes, I perceive, now—ha, ha, ha! but you may make yourself easy. The gloves do not belong to her."

"No! to whom, then?"

"Can't say; but they don't belong to her."

"But how do you know?"

"How do I know! Man alive! where are your eyes! Don't you see that this glove must belong to a woman of a different shape—a different complexion—say, and of a very different character."

Was the man mad! "Pray, sir," said I, "are you serious?"

"Serious! to be sure I am. Can't you see for yourself? Look at the colour of that glove—so faint and pure and flower-like—tinged like the inner blossom of the purple orchis—the woman that ventured to wear that glove must have been very fair, very; see how the fingers are filled out, even to the very tips! how plump; and smooth every part of it is! not a wrinkle in it!—just large enough, you see, by coaxing, and not the millionth part of an inch too large! And stay! look here—here's a little rent, you see, but just observe how it is drawn together and strengthened! Not only is the silk of the same colour, but as I live! there is a little patch of kid underneath of precisely the same tint."

"And what do you infer from all that?" said I.

"What do I infer! why just what any person with two eyes in his head, and a little of the planet's common sense, couldn't help inferring: that she is a woman of great steadiness and sweetness of temper—patient, persevering and sensitive; so unchangeable as to wear gloves of precisely the same tint—a good manager, too, or she wouldn't have taken the trouble you see there, in matching that gore so perfectly both in colour and shape; and then, just look at the stitches! Did you ever see anything so beautiful!—did you ever?"

"Oh, but the man is a tailor!" said I, in a whisper, to the collegian, who had contrived to overtake us, while the odd creature was holding forth about the glove. "Strange it never occurred to us before."

"And of what age might the lady be! and what the colour of her eyes and hair!" said the collegian, with a twist of the mouth which I understood.

"Some five years older than Miss Julia, I should say; old enough, not to be taken by surprise in the shape of a bonnet or a lover; and young enough you see to have a passion for delicate flowers, and to enjoy the touch of the softest kid; nay, more, old enough not to be a romp herself, and young enough to enjoy the romping of others. Light hair she must have, and a plenty of it—probably of a rich brown; clear blue eyes, or hazel, I am not certain which, with great sweetness of expression."

"But why so!—how do you arrive at such a conclusion?" said I, just in time to relieve my young friend, who managed to smother, by cramming a pocket-handkerchief into his mouth, and coughing obstreperously.

"Why, from the shape of the hand to be sure—its delicate fullness and plumpness; from her exquisite eye for colour—from the consistency she betrays by wearing precisely the same colour—from her foresight, if she buys more than one pair at a time—for let me tell you, gentlemen, this glove is not mended with a patch snipped out of the wrist, either of itself or its fellow, as you might have supposed—I have satisfied myself on that point. And," he continued, with a triumphant smile, "and, from the patient persevering assiduity she must have betrayed in matching this glove so perfectly, as if she had no other pair to go to; and to say all in a word, from the exquisite finish of her needlework, all these things are enough to show what I have inferred—perfect health—a fine shape, and the greatest possible delicacy of physical organization."

"A gentleman, I hope!" said I, hardly able to keep my countenance.

"Undoubtedly. Such frugal, unostentatious neatness and finish are never found in others. In a word, gentlemen, if either of you is in want of a wife, that's the woman for you, take my word for it, if you should be happy enough to find her."

"Why not make after her yourself!" asked the collegian.

"What! and pass two or three of the best years of my life running round the country with a glove in my fingers, like the prince in the fairy tale, with the little glass slipper, instead of bunting butterflies and cockshafers, at the risk, too, of seeing it split open, or stretched out of all shape. Hoity toity! Miss Julia! are you there?" and laughing at me, I suppose—"out of all shape, I say, by every little romp."

"And pray, sir," said Miss Julia, starting up from behind a large rock-heap, near which we had been resting ourselves, and waiting for the stage, "pray, sir, why shouldn't I laugh, to see what a fool you are making of cousin George, there, to say nothing of that other gentleman"—with a courtesy.

"Never mind me, Miss Julia, never mind me," said I, with dignity; "I have no sort of objection to being made a fool of when I have an object in view."

"Nor I, either," said Miss Julia.

"And therefore," I continued—bowing—therefore, one question more if you please. How do you explain the loss of two gloves, and not in the same place nor near it! If they had been found together, now, it might be accounted for; but to tell you the truth, whatever I might be disposed to think of the lady, after your account of her, I must acknowledge a sort of misgiving on that score, if that could be cleared up now."

"My friend, I see you are in earnest. I cannot clear it up—I cannot explain it. But this I can say, and this I do say, if you are ever so lucky as to meet with the owner of that glove, she will give you a good reason for the circumstance, I'll engage, one that will satisfy you, I will risk my life on it; and you may tell her so."

"Then, I hope you may find her, and that very soon," said Miss Julia, "if it's only that I may have the pleasure of hearing you tell her what Mr. Weare thinks of her—Mr. Ichabod Weare, junior, I believe!" whereupon she dropped another low courtesy, and Mr. Ichabod Weare, junior, took off his hat with a flourish, and in so doing covered her feet with wild-flowers, which wild-flowers he lost no time in gathering up again, so eagerly, that he had well nigh gathered up her feet with them.

"But how do you know that either of us would be likely to suit the lady in question, should we be so happy as to find her," added the collegian, with a side look at Miss Julia, who returned it with a pouting of the under lip.

"As to that, I should not like to say positively; yet, if I were you, the trial should be made. Faint heart never won fair lady. That you would like her—that you do like her now, I am sure."

Julia stared at her cousin, and blushed all over—her cousin looked puzzled; and I opened my mouth, I suppose, and stood with it open; for the next thing I saw, Miss Julia was pointing at me, and laughing through her pocket-handkerchief.

"I do wish the children would walk faster," said she, as soon as she could speak, "and the stage, too. Where on earth can it be? I saw the horses' heads in that hollow, there, a good half hour ago." "Perhaps," continued the collegian, dusting himself with an embroidered handkerchief, the perfume of which completely overpowered the professor, as he called him—"perhaps you have adopted Rousseau's theory about love being founded, not on resemblances, but on differences?"

"Rousseau's!"

"Ay, ay; Rousseau or D'Alembert, I forget which."

"St Pierre, you mean—Bernardin St Pierre."

"Precisely, though I have a notion that Chateaubriand or D'Alembert has quoted the theory with approbation. The passage occurs, I believe, in Paul and Virginia of St Pierre."

"No, excuse me; in the Studies of Nature. You allude to the experiment he made, in describing the object of a woman's passionate love to her, so that she was provoked to leave the room, covered with tears and blushes, though St Pierre had never seen her lover and merely described him, as her opposite in every particular, complexion, eyes, hair, temper and shape."

"Precisely!" said the collegian, rapping his boots with considerable energy, and looking as I thought, rather sheepish.

"And are you a believer in such nonsense, I should like to know, Mr. Weare?" said Julia.

"Such nonsense, my dear child!"—how she coloured!—"such nonsense, let me tell you, is founded upon the established laws of nature. Love is the growth, not of likes and resemblances, but of fixed differences of unchangeable opposites. And so with all our attachments. Why do the tall peck the short, and the short the tall? the choleric and overbearing those of a different temper? and the gentle and trusting those who are neither! with all attachments, I say, for even friendship and companionships are unsafe, where the parties are much alike—ah! there comes the stage!"

"The children cannot be far off," added Julia, "for which I am thankful enough; I hear their voices from that clump of bushes, yonder."

The next moment they appeared, the father puffing and blowing with his hat off, and waistcoat all unbuttoned; the children with eager eyes and flushed faces, and a fist full of flowers, and the mother out of all patience with the playgy stage and the nasty driver.

SKETCHES OF THE OLDEN TIME.

THE GRAY CHAMPION.

BY NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

THERE was once a time, when New-England groaned under the actual pressure of heavier wrongs, than those threatened ones which brought on the Revolution. James II. the bigoted successor of Charles the Voluptuous, had annulled the charters of all the colonies, and sent a harsh and unprincipled soldier to take away our liberties and endanger our religion. The administration of Sir Edmund Andros lacked scarcely a single characteristic of tyranny: a governor and council, holding office from the king, and wholly independent of the country; laws made and taxes levied without concurrence of the people, immediate or by their representatives; the rights of private citizens violated, and the titles of all landed property declared void; the voice of complaint stifled by restrictions on the press; and, finally, disaffection overawed by the first band of mercenary troops that ever marched on our free soil. For two years, our ancestors were kept in sullen submission, by that filial love which had invariably secured their allegiance to the mother country, whether its head chanced to be a parliament, protector, or popish monarch. Till these evil times, however, such allegiance had been merely nominal, and the colonies had ruled themselves, enjoying far more freedom, than is even yet the privilege of the native subjects of Great Britain.

At length, a rumour reached our shores, that the Prince of Orange had ventured on an enterprise, the success of which would be the triumph of civil and religious rights and the salvation of New-England. It was but a doubtful whisper; it might be false, or the attempt might fail; and, in either case, the man, that stirred against King James, would lose his head. Still the intelligence produced a marked effect. The people smiled mysteriously in the streets, and threw bold glances at their oppressors; while, far and wide, there was a subdued and silent agitation, as if the slightest signal would rouse the whole land from its sluggish dependency. Aware of their danger, the rulers resolved to avert it by an imposing display of strength, and perhaps to confirm their despotism by yet harsher measures. One afternoon in April, 1689, Sir Edward Andros and his favourite councillors, being warm with wine, assembled the red-coats of the governor's guard, and made their appearance in the streets of Boston. The sun was near setting when the march commenced.

The roll of the drum, at that unquiet crisis, seemed to go through the streets, less as the martial music of the soldiers, than as a muster call to the inhabitants themselves. A multitude, by various avenues, assembled in King-street, which was destined to be the scene, nearly a century afterwards, of another encounter between the troops of Britain, and a people struggling against her tyranny. Though more than sixty years had elapsed, since the pilgrims came, this crowd of their descendants still showed the strong and sombre features of their characters, perhaps more strikingly in such a stern emergency than on happier occasions. There was the sober garb, the general severity of mien, the gloomy but undismayed expression, the scriptural forms of speech, and the confidence in Heaven's blessing on a righteous cause, which would have marked a band of the original puritans, when threatened by some peril of the wilderness. Indeed, it was not yet time for the old spirit to be extinct; since there were men in the street, that day, who had worshipped there beneath the trees, before a house was reared to the God, for whom they had become exiles. Old soldiers of the parliament were here too, smiling grimly at the thought, that their aged arms might strike another blow against the house of Stuart. Here also, were the veterans of King Phillip's war, who had burnt villages and slaughtered young and old, with pious fierceness, while the godly souls throughout the land were helping them with prayer. Several ministers were scattered among the crowd, which, unlike all other mobs, regarded them with such reverence, as if there were sanctity in their very garments. These holy men exerted their influence to quiet the people, but not to disperse them. Meantime, the purpose of the governor, in disturbing the peace of the town, at a period when the slightest commotion might throw the country into a ferment, was almost the universal subject of inquiry, and variously explained.

"Satan will strike his master-stroke presently," cried some, "because he knoweth that his time is short. All our godly pastors are to be dragged to prison! We shall see them at a Smithfield fire in King-street!"

MORNING CALLS.

It was noon when Mr. Drummond Craven ordered his tiger and tilbury, and drove quietly up Regent-street, until he arrived in that most delightful of aristocratic residences for dukes, diplomatists, and dowagers—Portland-place; and, as one of the initiated, soon

THE CONQUEROR AND THE UPRIGHT JUDGE.

MOMAHMED the second being, like Iem, a very passionate monarch, severely rebuked his architect for not having built his mosque of the same height as "Aya Sofyah;" and also for having cut down the columns, which were each worth the whole tribute of Rûm (Asia Minor). The architect excused himself by saying that he had reduced the two columns three cubits each, in order to give his building more solidity and strength against the earthquakes so common in Islam; and had thus made the mosque lower than Aya Sofyah. The emperor, not satisfied with this excuse, ordered the architect's hands to be cut off; which was done accordingly. On the following day the architect appeared with his family before the tribunal of the Kazi, styled "Iskall Mollusi," to lay his complaint against the emperor, and appeal to the sentence of the law. The judge immediately sent his officer to cite the emperor to appear in court.

The conqueror, on receiving this summons, said: "The command of the prophet's law must be obeyed!" and putting on his mantle and thrusting a mace into his belt, went into the court of law. After having given the Selam Aleik, he was about to seat himself in the highest place, when the Kazi said: "Sit not down, O prince! but stand on thy feet, together with thine adversary, who has made an appeal to the law."

The architect then made his complaint: "My lord, I am a perfect master builder, and a skilful mathematician; but this man, because I made his mosque low, and cut down two of his columns, has cut off my two hands, which has ruined me, and deprived me of the means of supporting my family; it is thy part to pronounce the sentence of the noble law."

The judge, upon this, thus addressed the emperor: "What sayest thou, prince? have you caused this man's hands to be cut off innocently?"

The emperor replied: "By heaven, my lord! this man lowered my mosque; and for having reduced two columns of mine, each worth the produce of a year's tribute, thus robbing my mosque of all renown, by making it so low, I did cut off his hands: it is for thee to pronounce the sentence of the noble law."

The Kazi answered: "Prince, renown is a misfortune! If a mosque be upon a plain, and low and open, worship in it is not thereby prevented. If each column had been a precious stone, its value would have been only that of a stone, but the hands of this man, which have enabled him for these forty years to subsist by his skilful workmanship, you have illegally cut off. He can henceforth do no more than attend to his domestic affairs. The maintenance of him and his numerous family necessarily, by law, falls upon thee. What sayest thou, prince?"

Sultan Mohammed answered, "Thou must pronounce the sentence of the law."

"This is the legal sentence," replied the Kazi: "If the architect requires the law to be strictly enforced, your hands must be cut off; for if a man do an illegal act which the noble law doth not allow, that law decrees that he shall be required according to his deeds."

The Sultan then offered to grant him a pension from the public treasury of the Mussulmans.

"No!" replied the Molla: "it is not lawful to take this from the public treasury; the offence was yours: my sentence therefore is, that from your own private purse you allow this maimed man ten akchehs a day."

"It is well," said the conqueror; "let it be twenty akchehs a day; but let the cutting off his hands be legalized."

The architect, in the contentment of his heart, exclaimed, "Be it accounted lawful in this world and the next; and having received a patent for his pension, withdrew. Sultan Mohammed also received a certificate of his entire acquittal. The Kazi then apologized for having treated him as an ordinary sutor; pleading that the impartiality of the law requires justice to be administered to all without distinction, and entreating the emperor to seat himself on the sacred carpet.

"Effendi," said Sultan Mohammed, angrily, "if thou hadst shown favour to me, saying to myself, 'This is the Sultan,' and hadst wronged the architect, I would have broken thee in pieces with this mace," at the same time drawing it out from under the skirt of his robe.

"And if thou, prince," said the Kazi, "hadst refused to obey the legal sentence pronounced by me, thou wouldst have fallen a victim to divine vengeance, for I should have delivered thee up to be destroyed by the dragon beneath the carpet." On saying which he lifted up his carpet, and an enormous dragon put forth its head, vomiting fire from its mouth. "Be still," said the Kazi; and again laid the carpet smooth: on which the Sultan kissed his noble hands, wished him good day, and returned to his palace.

THE PLUNDERED HEIRESS.

A HINT TO LADY VISITORS OF FOREIGN WATERING-PLACES.

Baden-Baden is, as all the world knows, a very popular resort for people who fancy themselves out of sorts, and think that the use of waters will restore them to health; for people who are haunted by ennui, and think that the spirit may be laid by the dissipation of the place; and also, by another class of people, whose motives for a residence there are less praiseworthy—we mean knights of industry. And, certainly, if indefatigable attention to their particular calling, alone constituted a claim to our admiration, we should say that none deserved it more than the chevaliers to whom we have alluded. But a circumstance occurred at that place during the past season which has given us a valuable hint, and we are bound to add that the conduct of some of the parties concerned was of so bad a character, that it calls for the deepest reprobation of every one not lost to all sense of honourable feelings. The following are the particulars of the case:

Mr. and Mrs. —, accompanied by their ward, Miss F —, left Paris for the baths of Baden-Baden. The young lady is heir to a large property—will shortly be of age—is reported to be very amiable and accomplished—and is, we know, remarkably beautiful. It is too notorious to be denied that ladies, whilst residing at the baths, do not hesitate to lay out their money at the tables; that is, without any circumspection, ladies of the highest distinction frequent the public gaming-tables, losing or winning, as the case may be, large sums of money, in the same open and undignified manner as men. If this practice were restricted to the risk of a Napoleon occasionally, no great harm might accrue; it might be considered much in the same light as a raffish here. But it not unfrequently happens that such serious amounts are staked that moral and pecuniary ruin are alike the result. Miss F —, with others, was accustomed to stake trifling sums, without an interference on the part of her guardians, and she was particularly successful. The consequence was, that the young lady soon became a constant attendant at the tables—her whole soul was devoted to Rouge et Noir. Instead of reconstruing with her, the dishonourable guardians of Miss F — rather encouraged the propensity. But this was not all—they had private parties in their own apartments; these parties were wholly devoted to gaming, and we believe French hazard was the game played. It was remarked that Mr. and Mrs. — never engaged in any contest with their ward, her almost constant opponent was a French countess. Miss F — lost immense sums! Her ample allowance was exhausted. Will it be believed that Mr. — did not hesitate to advance large sums from his private purse, to enable his ward to pursue this fatal propensity! Even his funds were at last exhausted, or he pretended that such was the case. Still he did not interfere! The play continued, Miss F — giving bills, payable when she came of age, for the amount of her losses. It is evident that the parties had perfect confidence in Miss F —'s honourable intentions, as the bills could not legally be recovered; but why they took bills at all, instead of the usual acknowledgments, seems very mysterious. It is well imagined that the play was unfair, and that the parties concerned obtained the bills as a means of annoyance, should the fact be suspected by the young lady, and she should in consequence refuse payment.

It fortunately happened for Miss F — that some of the bills were sent to London to be negotiated, one of which fell into the hands of the other guardian of the lady. This gentleman's conduct was at once prompt, business-like, and honourable; he discounted the bills in London, went directly to Baden-Baden, took away the lady, having previously, by threats of exposure, obtained the remaining bills from the French Countess; and it is said that he intends to contest the payment of the sums due to his brother guardian. The lady is with him in a western county; and it is to be hoped that the present severe lesson has not been lost upon her.

FACTS AND SCRAPS.

THE "LADIES' CANYAN."—When the parliament which supported the famous coalition ministry of Fox and North was dissolved by George III., the unpopularity of many of those who had been its members was so great, that the most extraordinary measures were obliged to be resorted to, in order to secure their return to the new parliament which had been summoned. The means used to secure the election of Fox in Westminster, where his influence had received an almost fatal blow, were not less extraordinary. Three of the most beautiful and accomplished women in England, namely, the celebrated Duchess of Devonshire, Mrs. Damer the sculptress, and Mrs. Crew, resolved to canvass the whole of Westminster, and they carried their little party with them. They secured a decided majority of the votes for their great friend. If any of the electors hesitated to comply with the fair canvassers' requests that they would vote for Fox, they then inquired of them as to the condition of their families, the health of their wives and children, and made use of all these nameless allurances which few men, whatever their rank and intellect, can resist. If, however, these did fail of their intended end, the ladies thought nothing of kissing, not they! and the meanest freckler luxuriated on cheeks and lips that were the admiration of the age. The nether millstone would be softness itself, when compared with the heart that could have resisted appeals thus made, and in the course of liberty too! Of one of these brave dames, Mrs. Damer, it has been said that she was a bold woman; nothing more, for she did three things which scarce any other English lady would have dared to do—she canvassed the third of Westminster for Fox, entertained Queen Caroline during her trial, and sent her respects and sincere wishes for his success to Napoleon, when he departed for the last of his fields!

ANECDOTE OF THE STAGE.—Mr. John Palmer, well known as an actor on the London boards, terminated his dramatic career and his life on the Liverpool stage, in 1798. On the morning of the day on which he was to have performed the "Stranger," he received the distressing intelligence of the death of his second son, a youth in whom his dearest hopes were centered, and whose amiable manners had brought him to the greatest affections of a parent. The play, in consequence of this, was deserted; and during the interval, he had in vain endeavoured to calm the agitation of his mind. The success with which he performed the part called for a second representation, in which he fell a sacrifice to the malignancy of his own feelings, and in which the audience were doomed to witness a catastrophe which was truly melancholy. In the fourth act, Baron Stenrope obtains an interview with the Stranger, whom he discovers to be his old friend. He prevails on him to relate the causes of his seclusion from the world; in this relation the feelings of Mr. Palmer were visibly much agitated; and at the moment he mentioned his wife and children, having uttered, (as in the character,) "O God! O God! there is another and a better world!" he fell lifeless on the stage. The audience supposed for a moment that his fall was nothing more than a studied addition to the part; but seeing him carried off in deadly stiffness, the utmost astonishment and terror became depicted in every countenance. The lifeless corpse was conveyed from the stage into the scene-room. Medical assistance was immediately procured; his veins were opened, but they yielded not a single drop of blood; and every other means of resuscitation were had recourse to, without effect. The gentlemen of the faculty, finding every endeavour ineffectual, formally announced his death.

INEXHAUSTIBILITY OF LITERATURE. Books are the cause of books. Were there no books in the world it would be difficult to write one; but because there are so many, there may be so many more. The great principle of literature is, that the rays of intellectual light, are by the prism of operation of books, broken into an infinity of lines and colours. Men may as soon cease to talk as cease to read and write books. All our daily and hourly talk may be made matter of literature, by the use of words, and the use of words, books that are printed, the more food is given to the mind; and the more nourishment the mind receives, the more vigorous its powers; and the greater its strength, the more valuable its thoughts, and the more excited its powers and capacities. There is no one topic, in the whole range of literary interest that can be conceived capable of exhaustion; and in matters of imagination there is no intellectual forefront, however sagacious, that is capable of conjecturing what may be done.

FILIAL AFFECTION OF ONE'S FATHER'S ATTRIBUTES. Though my father was neither young, being forty-two nor handsome, having lost an eye—nor sober for he spent all he could get in liquor—nor clean, for his trade was oil and wine without shackles, for he had five children—yet the women of various descriptions courted his smiles, and were much inclined to pull cups for him.

HOW TO MAKE A HORSE GROW.—"That's a tartan tall horse," said Lauder. "Yes, I guess you can't account for it," replied Jonathan. "No boy," said Lauder. "He belongs to Hummums the livery-man," replied Jonathan, "and his tallness comes through his having been regularly higged (hired) every day for the last seven years."

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

HEBREW MELODY.—FROM JOEL.

BY G. R. SMITH.

SOUND, sound an alarm! let your clarions resound
Till God's holy mountain shall echo around;
Blow the trumpet in Zion! his wrath to record,
And tremble, oh earth! in the day of the Lord.

A day of thick darkness, of gloom and of shower,
Like clouds on the crest of the mountain which lower;
For the mighty in battle, the proud and the strong,
To quench all thy glories are hastening along.

Around them are flames and behind them despair,
In vain is resistance, and vain is prayer;
Before them the garden of Eden they find,
Desolation and terror are blackening behind.

Like the blast of the desert their chariots shall sweep
On whirlwinds, which frown o'er the wide-dashing deep;
And the pride of Judah their horses shall shatter;
With their hoofs of destruction and nostrils of flame.

Oh! bright shine their arms, as the Gentiles press on,
From Acrs, and Carmel, and Mount Lebanon,
And their chariots and horsemen shall scatter dismay
On the hosts led against them in battle array.

Oh! where is the strength of the mighty in war,
If the face of Jehovah be veiled from afar!
Jerusalem, vanquished Jerusalem, mourn!
When, alas! shall the light of thy glory return!

SOCIAL INTERCOURSE.

Without friends what is man? A solitary oak upon a sterile rock, symmetrical indeed in its form, beautiful and exquisitely finished, out-vying the most lauded perfection of art in gracefulness and grandeur, but over which decay has shaken her black wing, and left its leaves blighted; its limbs contract as they die; its roots, rottenness, and its bloom dried; a scathed, lifeless monument of its prime beauty. When the rebuffs of adversity are rushing us earthward, when the clouds look black above, and the muttering thunder of misfortune grows along the sky, when our frame is pained by the skeleton hand of disease, or our senses whirled in the maelstrom of insanity, when our hearts are torn by the recent separation of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of some beloved object, when our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentous storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star

ORIGINAL, RETROSPECTIVE REVIEWS.

FAIRFAX'S TASSO.

But the best specimen of Fairfax's powers is beyond doubt the opening of the fourteenth book. It is one of Tasso's grandest flights, yet Fairfax has not only kept way with him, but soared even beyond his leader. The readers of Tasso will not fail to see that in the first lines below much of the beauty and grandeur belongs of right to Fairfax. Hoole's hackney version we shall not grace by a place in our pages. Wiffen understands the spirit of the passage and has succeeded, in some degree, in expressing it.

Now from the fresh soft lap and twilight bowers,
Of her still mother flew the gentle queen
Of shade, with light airs compassed, and a shower
Of starlight dews, pure, precious and serene;
And shaking o'er the universal scene
The humid border of her veil, impetuous
With honey-balm the flowers and forests green;
While the sweet zephyrs their still wings unfurled,
And fanned to dulcet sleep and peace th' o'erwearied world.

Each busy thought of rude disturbing day
In sweet, oblivious quietude was drowned;
But he, whose wisdom heaven and earth doth sway,
Yet kept his ruling watch, inspired and crowned
With countless light, and from Heaven's starry round
Casting on Godfrey the ecstatic beam
Of his mild eye, to him in sleep profound,
By silent precept of a missioned dream,
Of his Almighty mind revealed the will supreme.

In the rich orient, near the vales of gold
Whence the sun sallies, turns a crystalline
Clear gate, whose doors in harmony unfold,
Ere pale the planets and the day-beams shine:
'Tis thence the glorious dreams which the Divine
In grace to pure and holy spirits sends,
Issuing fly forth: from that pictorial shrine
This dream to placid Godfrey now descends,
And o'er his placid face its radiant wings extends.

Nor dream, nor gifted vision e'er portrayed
Such beautiful or lively fancies, as have
To Godfrey's fancy this which now displayed
Of heaven and its stars the secrets clear;
As in the mirror of a glassy sphere,
All was at once presented to his sight
That in them is, he scanned in swift career,
Caught up to an expanse of perfect woe,
Adorned with thousand flames that gave a golden light.

Here as the moving spheres, the vast blue sky,
The lights, and the rich music he admires,
Lo, to his side a winged knight draws nigh;
With sunbeams crowned, and circumfused with fires!
And in a voice to which the clearest choirs
And perfect marriage of sweet sounds below,
Breathed out from beauteous lips or golden wires,
Would be but discord, said: 'canst thou bestow
No smile, or dost thou not thy once loved Hugo know?

But now look round more fixedly: behold—
To quicken for the skies thy pure desires,
These lucid balls and starry orbs of gold,
Which, whirling round, th' Eternal Mind inspires!
Observe the beauty of those ethereal choirs,
Of seraphs: hear the angelical sweet strains,
In concord sung to their celestial lyres:
'Next view,' he said, and pointed to the plains
Of earth below, 'what yon terrestrial globe contains.

'Think of your earthly titles and designs;
With what a vile reward is virtue crowned!
Mark what a little ring your pride confines!
What naked deserts your vain glories bound!
Earth like an island the blue sea surrounds.
Now called the mighty deep from coast to coast,
Now the vast ocean; to that pompous sound
Nought corresponds, to authorize such boast—
'Tis but a shallow pool, a narrow marsh at most.'

The spirit said, and he his sight let fall
On earth, and smiled with a serene disdain.
Shrunk to a point, seas, streams and mountains tall
He sees remote, but here distinguished plain;
And much he wondered that weak man should strain
At shades and mists that swim before the eyes,
And chase these radiant bubbles of the brain—
Capricious fame and power that, followed, dies,
Nor heed th' inviting voice that calls him to the skies.

Now for Tasso.

Now from the fresh, the soft and tender bed
Of her still mother, gentle night out flew,
The fleeting balme on hills and dales she shed,
With homie drops of pure and precious dew,
And on the verdure of green forests spread
The virgin primrose and the violet blew,
And sweet breath'd Zephyr on his spreading wings
Sleeps, ease, repose, rest, peace and quiet brings.
The thoughts and troubles of broad-waking day,
They softly dipt in mild oblivion's lake;
But he, whose Godhead heav'n and earth doth sway,
In his eternal light did watch and wake,
And bent on Godfrey down the gracious ray
Of his bright eye, still ope for Godfrey's sake,
To whom a silent dream the Lord downe sent,
Which told his will, his pleasure, and intent.
Far in the east (the golden gate beside Whence Phobus comes) a chrystal port there is,
And ere the sunne his broad doores open wide,
The beams of springing day unclose this,
Hence come the dreames by which heav'n's sacred guide
Reveals to man those high decrees of his,
Hence towards Godfrey ere he left his bed,
A vision strange his golden plumes bespied.

Such semblances, such shapes, such portraites faire,
Did never yet in dreame or sleepe appeare,
For all the formes in sea, in earth, or aire,
The signes in heav'n, the stars in every sphere,
All what was wondrous, uncouth, strange and rare,
All in that vision well presented were,
His dreame had plast him on a chrystal wide,
Beset with golden fires, top, bottom, side.

There while he wondreth on the circles vast,
The stars, their motions, course and harmonie,
A knight (with shining raies and fires embrast)
Presents himselfe unware before his eie,
Who, with a voice, that far for sweetnes past
All humane speech, thus said, approaching nie:
What, Godfrey, know'st thou not thy Hugo here!
Come and embrace thy friend and fellow deere.

But to increase thy love and great desire
To heaven-ward, this blessed place behold,
These shining lampes, these globes of living fire,
How they are turned, guided, moov'd and rold,
The angels singing heare, and all their quire:
Then bend thine eyes on yonder earth and moold,
All in that mass, that globe, and compass see,
Land, sea, spring, fountaine, man, beast, grasse and tree.

How vile, how small, and of how slender price,
Is there reward of goodnesse, virtues' gaine;
A narrow roome our glorie vaine up-ties,
A little circle doth our pride containe,
Earth, like an isle amid the water lies,
Which sea sometimes is call'd, sometimes the maine,
Yet nought therein responds a name so great,
It's but a lake, a pond, a Spanish strait.

Thus said the one, the other bended downe,
His looks to ground, and half in secret he smilede,
He saw at once earth, sea, fount, castell, towne,
Strangely divided, strangely all compilde,
And wondred folke man so farre should drowne,
To set his hart on things so base and yilde.

The whole of Tasso's fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth books are a mine of poetry. Some of the reverend critics, we have spoken of above, found fault with him for making the enchantress her bower of pleasure too attractive, a fault which, if true, will be easily forgiven by a lover of the beautiful, but which we can hardly deem well-founded; for Tasso has taken more pains than almost any other poet to place the antidote alongside of the bane; and to show us that a life of indolence and pleasure is as hollow as it is glittering, and that the delights of mere sense are empty and unsatisfying. Fairfax has translated these cantos with so much poetical feeling, with such exuberance of fancy, and into such pure and racy English, that we are sure we might spread the whole of them before our readers without their being satisfied, much less surfeited. Let us, however, confine ourselves to more modest limits, and only take as a sample of the whole, the description in Canto XIV. of Rinaldo's visit to the Enchanted Island.

Landed, he stalks about, yet nought he sees
But verdant groves, sweet shades, and massive rocks,
With caves and fountains, flowers, herbs, and trees,
So that the words he read he takes for mockes:
But that greenie isle was sweet at all degrees,
Wherewith entised downe sit he and unlockes
His closed helme, and bares his visage faire,
To take sweet breath from coole and gentle aire.

A rumbling sound amid the waters deepe
Menewhile he heard, and thither turn'd his sight,
And tumbling in the troubled stream tooke keepe,
How the strong waves together rush and fight,
Whence first he saw (with golden tresses) peepe
The rising visage of a virgin bright,
And then her necke, her breastes, and all, as low
As he for shame could see, or she could show.

So in the twilight doth sometimes appeare
A nymphe, a goddess, or a faire queene,
And though no siren but a sprite this were;
Yet by her beautee som'd it she had beene
One of those sisters false, which haunted neare
The Tirrhene shores, and kept these waters sheene:
Like theirs her face, her voice was and the sound,
And thus she sung, and pleas'd both skies and ground:

Ye happy youthes, whom April fresh and May Attire in flow'ring ring of lustie age,
For glorie vaine, or vertue's idle ray,
Doe not your tender limmes to toile engage,
In calme streames, fishes; birds, in sunshinie play,
Who followeth pleasure he is onely sage,
So nature saith, yet gainst her sacred will
Why still rebell you, and why strive you still!

O foolles, who youth possesse, yet scorne the same,
A pretious, but a short abiding treasure,
Vertue itselfe is but an idle name,
Priz'd by the world howe reason all and measure,
And honour, glorie, praise, renowne and fame,
That men's proud hearts bewitch with tickling pleasure,
An echo is, a shade, a dreame, a flowre
With each winde blasted, spoild with every shower.

But let your happie soules in ioy possesse
The ivorie castles of your bodies faire,
Your passed hares and with forgetfulness,
Haste not your coming ill with thought and care,
Regard no blazing star with burning teares,
Nor storme, nor threat'ning sky, nor thundering aire,
This wisdom is, good life, and worldly blis,
Kinde teacheth us, nature commands us this.

Few passages have been more admired or quoted in more languages than the song of the Bird in canto XVI. In Hoole's translation, it has a very Della Cruscan air.

MOOLE, XVI.

Behold how lovely blows the vernal rose,
When scarce the leaves her early bud disclose,

When half enwrapt, and half to view revealed,
She gives new pleasure from her charms concealed,
But when she shows her bosom wide displayed,
How soon her seeds exhale, her beauties fade!
No more she seems the flower so lately loved,
By virgins cherished, and by youths approved!
So sweetly fleeting with the transient day,
Passes the flower of mortal life away!
In vane the spring returns, the spring no more
Can wanning youth to former prime restore:
Then crop the morning rose, the time improve,
And while to love 'tis given, indulge in love!

Wiffen's is in a sing-song style, that is unworthy of himself as well as of his author. Fairfax is fine.

The gentle budding rose (quoth she,) behold,
That first aye peeping forth with virgin beames,
Half ope, half shut, her beauties doth unfold;
In their deere leaves, and less scene, fairer scenes;
And after spreads them forth more broad and bold,
Then languisheth and dies in last extremes,
Nor seems the same; that decked bed and bower
Of many a ladic late, and paramour.

So in the passing of a day, doth pass
The bud and blossom of the life of man,
Nor ere doth flourish more; but like the grass
Cut downe, becometh withered, pale and wan:
O gather then the rose while time thou has,
Short is the day, done when it scant begun,
Gather the rose of love, while yet thou maist
Loving be loved; embracing be embrast.

But Spenser is too much even for him.

Ah see, whose fayre thing dost faine to see,
In springing flower the image of thy day;
Ah see the virgin rose, how sweetly shee
Doth first peepe forth with bashful modestie,
That fairer seems the lesse ye see her may:
Lo! see somee after how bold and free
Her bared bosome she doth broad display,
Lo! see somee after how she fades and falls away!

So passeth, in the passing of a day,
Of mortal life the leafe, the bud, the floure,
No more doth flourish after first decay:
That earst was sought to deck both bed and bower
Of many a lady, and many a paramour:
Gather therefore the rose whilst yet in prime,
For somee come age that will her pride defoule:
Gather the rose of love whilst yet in time,
Whilst loving thou mayest loved be with equal crime.

We forgot to mention, that a translation of the Jerusalem Delivered, now very scarce, was published in 1590, ten years before Fairfax's appeared. To prove that our favourite author could have owed nothing to this version, and to show the curious contrast in style and language between two translations published within ten years of each other, we shall extract our article a little to take from each the description of Armida visiting the Christian Camp:

The fair Armida priding in her heave,
And in th' endowments of her sexe and age,
Thus change takes on her, and as o'ring drew,
Doth part, and to close ways her steps engage,
Stout harts she hopes, and arm'd hands to subdue,
With her tresses, and wenchlike equipage,
But of her parting dowers tales are spread
By set device, 't' amuze the peoples heed.
Within few daies this dame her journey ends,
There were the Princes their large pavillions spread,
Whose bewtie rare at his appearance lends:
Babbling to tongues and eyes a gazing led,
As when some starre or comete strange ascends,
And in cleere day through sky his beames doth shed
They flocke in plumps this pilgrim faine to view,
And to be wized what course her hither drew.

Not Argos, Cyprus, Delos, ere present
Fulmes of shape, or beautee so secure,
Gold are her lockes, which in white shadow pent,
Eft do but glimpse, e'ft all discloses appear,
As when new clemde we see the element,
Sometimes the sun shines through white cloud unclere,
Sometimes from cloud outgoe his raies more bright
He sheeds abroad, dubling of day the light.

And then,
The sweet Armida took this charge on hand,
A tender peece, for beauty, sexe and age.
The sunne was sunken underneath the land
When she began her wanton pilgrimage,
In silken weedes she trusteth to withstand,
And conquer knights, in warlike equipage,
Of their night ambling dame, the Syrians part
Some good, some bad, as they her lov'd or hated.
Within few daies the nymphe arrived there,
Where pusan Godfrey had his tents right;
Upon her strange attire, and visage cleare,
Gazed each soldier, gazed everie knight:
As when a comet doth in skies appeare,
The people stand amazed at the light,
So wondred they, and each at other sought,
What mister wight she was, and whence ibrought.

Yet never eie to Cupid's service vow'd,
Beheld a face of such a lovely pride,
A unsell wile her amber locks did shrowd,
That strove to cover what it could not hide.
The golden sunne behinde a silver cloud,
So streameth out his beames on everie side,
The marble goddess, set at Gnidos, naked
She seem'd, were shee unclouth'd, or that awak'd.

So much for one of the finest, and at the same time least known poems in our language. Let us hope, however, that the world will not willingly let it die, but award to Fairfax the just place he should occupy in the temple of fame—between his master Spenser and his pupils Waller and Dryden.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

REASONS WHY MR. JOHN SMITH

SHOULD NOT CHANGE HIS NAME

Smithville, Down east, February, 1890.

MY DEAR MR. EDITOR—I never was more struck up in my life than I was night afore last, about eight o'clock in the evening, when Cousin Debby come running into our house all of a giggle and most out of breath; and says she, "Cousin John, here's news for you; they've got you into the New-York Mirror, as true as my name is Debby Smith." Says I, what nonsense are you arter now, Debby? for she's always poking fun at somebody or other, although she don't mean nothin' by it, for she's as clever as the day is long. Says she, "I mean jest what I say, John; they've got you into the New-York Mirror, as large as life." And she held up the paper—Debby takes your paper, and has took it, I believe, going on a dozen years, for she's very fond of learning and has kept school in our village, off and on, about fifteen years—and she held up the paper, and, says she, "John, here's most a column and a half, all about you, every word of it. And they are making something of a fuss about you in New-York too, and say you must change your name." At that my dander began to start a little, and says I, Debby, are you in earnest, or what do you mean? For I knew I hadn't killed nobody, nor robbed, nor stole a sheep; and, says I, I should like to see the fellow that would dare to tell me, to my face, that I ought to change my name. My name is what I've valley'd myself on more than anything else in the world, and there never was a name yet that I'd change it for, unless it was George Washington. But come, says I, Debby, set down and read us your long yarn—Debby is a first rate reader, and she loves to read afore folks as well as she loves to eat. So we made room for her in the ring. We had a rousin fire, being it was a pretty cold night, so we could set back and make room for all; for there was something of a ring of us; our own family isn't small—there's myself and wife, and eleven children, and my mother, and aunt Jane, and my nephew William Smith that works for me; and besides that there was a number of the neighbours in, setting round to drink a mug of cider with us and eat a few of my fine winter apples. Debby hauled a chair up to the table, and snuffed the candle, and drew it close to her, so as to hold it between her hand and the paper; and then the reading seemed to bother her a little, for her paper, General, is rather fine print, and she had to hold it off fairly at arms length and hold the candle close to it, because she said her eyes were weak. Aunt Ruth—she's my uncle John Smith's wife, a very sensible woman, and one of the kindest neighbours there is in our village—she sat on 'tother side of the table with her knittin' work in her hands, and looking over the top of her specs across the table at cousin Debby. She see what was the matter, and pulled off her glasses, and reached them across the table and told Debby she better try her specs, and she thought she would read easier. Debby coloured as red as fire, and said she never used spectacles; and besides, "if I did," says she, "it isn't likely I could use yours; they must be a great deal too old for me." At that my uncle John Smith—he's a blacksmith by trade, and lives close on 'tother side of the road—he was setting in one corner, digging his teeth into the mellow side of a great sweet apple—he rolled up his eyes at Debby, and haw haw'd right out. Says he, "well done Debby, you've hit it now exactly; my wife is just five years older than you, and them specs suited her ten years ago." Debby kind of choked a little, and her face turned redder than ever: I don't know but she would have bit a board nail off, if she'd only had one in her mouth. Uncle John has a teasing kind of a way with him, and when he sees any body nettled, he loves to help 'em along a little. "So," says he, "Debby, I want a new vice in my shop; what will you take for your teeth? I think they'd hold a pretty good grip." Debby couldn't stand it no longer—she threw down the paper, and drew her head back as if she'd had a curb bit in her mouth. Says she, "Uncle John, you are the biggest plague that ever I see, and if you was worth a minding, I would be mad with you." I see the only way was for us to try to make a kind of a joke of the matter all round, till Debby got cooled down a little; for she was in too much of a flutteration to read now; "So," says I, "come John, fill up the mug with cider again and hand it round—this was to my son John; he is my oldest son, and will be seventeen years old if he lives to see the fifth day of next May; a smart boy as you will see one in a thousand, and folks say he takes after me very much"—says I, "Come, John, hand round the cider, beginning with the oldest, clear down to the youngest, and give it to cousin Debby last." At that Debby began to laugh, and says she, "Cousin John, you are almost as big a pester as uncle John himself, and one isn't worth a minding any more than 'tother is." After we took a drink of cider round, and each one took another apple, Debby got so calmed down that we got her hold of the paper again. She wouldn't touch the specs though, but after she got the candle fixed right, she made out to read it very well. And sure enough there was a whole column all about my changing my name. I never felt so queer before in my life. But when she read the line at the top, "Reasons for John Smith to change his name"—says I, "Debby, now before you begin, how do you know that means me? There's more John Smiths in the world besides me." "Why, because," says she, "everybody knows it means you. Here you've been selectman, of Smithville, this seven years; you have been surveyor of the roads, and on the school committee, and town agent, and been twice representative to the Legislature, and had a squire's commission five years; and it's pretty likely the piece could mean anybody else but you. Suppose General Washington was alive to this day, and such a piece should be published, saying George Washington ought to change his name!

Wouldn't everybody know it mean'd General Washington?"—"Well," says I, "Debby, to be honest about it, I think it pretty likely it does mean me. But let us hear what they have to say in New-York about my changing my name. So, as I said afore, she read it through. Sometimes, when she was reading it, I couldn't hardly keep my dander down, and sometimes I couldn't hardly help laughing to see how ignorant the man that writ it must be of the world. When she got along down to the place that says the five letters that spell Smith, stand for a Small—Mean—Insignificant—Trashy—Humbug, my son John started up as if he'd been shot—he looked as red as a rooster, and says he, "Father, I wouldn't stand that no how: I'd go right to New-York and put it into that chap what writ that to know which is the best road to mill. You are young and inexperienced, and you must try to keep your temper down and take things more moderate. I shall write to General Morris and get him to see to it, and then, if the fellow that's dared to call me a humbug, don't take it back, he must look out—that's all." "Read on, Debby," says I. By and by she come to where it said, "no honest man would change his name for that of Smith." "Stop," says I, "let us reason about that a little. Honest men don't have occasion to change their names. 'Tis rogues and knaves that change their names; and when they do, they try to pick for the likeliest and most respectable name they can find, and therefore they take the name of Smith. And this is one reason that Smiths are so plenty. There isn't so many real Smiths in the world as folks think for. There are a great many counterfeiters about. But that don't hurt the real Smiths, nor make 'em any less respectable. If you had a true silver dollar in your pocket, would you valley it any less because your neighbour had a pewter one? If you ever come across a person by the name of Smith that don't bear a good character, you may depend upon it, Smith isn't his real name—he has changed some other for it. And I've been told, on the very best authority, that all the Smiths that have been hung for any crime, have always confessed privately under the gallows, just before they were swung off, that their true name wasn't Smith, but Johnson, or Davis, or some such name. And now, my dear General Morris, this makes me think of another thing. There was my cousin Major Jack Downing—he's a cousin to me on the mother's side, and as good a feller as ever lived—upright and honest, and no slouch at writing. Well, he went down to Portland, in the State of Maine, seven or eight years ago, and went to writin' letters in the Portland Courier, and then he went off to Washington, and staid along with General Jackson some time, and writ letters to the Portland Courier; and when he got his name up pretty well, folks begun to counterfeit his letters and his name too, like smoke, all over the country. Most all the counterfeiters were so badly done, that any body could tell 'em the moment they put 'em along side the true ones. There was one chap in your city that carried on a great stroke of counterfeitin' these letters, and signing Major Jack Downing's name to 'em for a year or two, and I don't know but more—let's see, what was his name? Seems to me it begun with a D—. Well, he used to put in some kind of mettle into 'em that made 'em ring, and had a nacker of glossing of 'em over, so that he made 'em go quite current in your city and round there. But you put 'em along side of cousin Jack's and you'd see in a minute they wasn't the true silver. But he didn't care for that, as long as he could make 'em go, and make the folks round New-York think he was the real Major Jack Downing. And that's the way of the world, General; everybody wants to go by a good and respectable name, and you may depend upon it that is the true secret why there are so many Smiths." After Debby had got through reading the piece, we all sat as much as ten minutes and didn't say nothin'. At last, says I, uncle John, what do you think of it? "Think of it?" Says he—"why, I think it's the foolishhest mess of flummery that ever I seed put into a newspaper. In my opinion, it doesn't contain one single good reason why you should change your name. And there is no reason in the world why you should, but a thousand why you should not." "And what are they, uncle John?" says I. "Why," says he, "it is a very old and respectable name; it has been in our family a great while; it is therefore an honour to be called by the name of John Smith. And in the next place, it is the most popular name in the country; so that if popularity is worth anything, that proves John Smith to be the best name in the country. And in the next place, it is a very short name; you don't waste but little time in speaking it, nor but little paper in writing it. And in the next place, there's no such thing as clipping it off or nicknaming of it; if any body speaks your name at all, they can't make nothin' short of John Smith of it." Well, aunt Ruth, and cousin Debby, and mother, and aunt Jane, and my wife, and my son John, all expressed the same opinion as uncle John, only some of 'em a great deal more earnest. Mother, she sighed, and said she thought the man must be an awful wretch to want to make her son change his name, when it was the best name there was in the whole Bible, especially the John, and she had picked it out when she give it to me, out of that chapter where the angel give it to the child of Zachariah and Elizabeth. My wife, she almost cried, and said she should go crazy, if she thought I should ever change my name, and leave all her children poor orphans. So among all the other reasons, General, against my changing my name, you see what a disturbance it would make in my family. And, on the whole, I've made up my mind decidedly; I shan't do it. I don't know how it is in New-York, but down east, and in Smithville, and all round here, not only Smith, but John Smith, is considered the best and most honourable name there is going. It has come down to me in a straight line, clear from Capt. John Smith that first settled in old Virginia. And a braver man than he was never lived. I've got his coat of arms now, that's come down long with his name three Turke's heads made up in a picture, hanging up in our fore room. I said his name come down to me in a straight line; but it wasn't exactly a straight line, for it crooked out of the line a little in one place, and that was in the case of my father, whose name was James. I'll tell you how it happened. When my grandfather, whose name was John, carried my father to meetin' to be christened, it happened that the same day his cousin John Smith carried two of his children to be christened. And when the minister was ready, my grandfather, bein' a very pedit man, beckoned to his cousin John to carry his children up first. So he carried 'em up, and good old parson, John Smith, who preached in grandfather's parish then, whispered to him as he handed up the first child, and asked him its name. His name is John, said my grandfather's cousin. So the parson christened him John. The second child was then handed up, and the parson whispered again and asked its name. His name is John, said my grandfather's cousin. The good old parson shook his head, and whispered again, and told him he had christened the other one John. My grandfather's cousin shook his head too, and told the parson to never mind, but christen him John; "For," says he, "if I had a hundred children, I would call them all John." So finding there was no turning him, the parson christened the second child John. Then my grandfather went up with his child; and I've heard my grandmother say that his face was red as a blaze all the way 'gon' up to the pulpit. Well, the minister whispered to him and asked him what the child's name was. Grandfather choked a little, and says he, "I was a going to call him John, but I think we've had Johns enough for one day; you may christen him James." Now, General, I don't know but I've tired you with my long yarn. I didn't think of writin' sich a long letter when I begun. But when I get a goin', I'm a little like the steam er on the rail-road: I'm apt to run till I get to the end of the rr—only one thing more to say, and that is, bein' you've had my name figurin' in your paper, I believe I shall subscribe for it. And I guess I ain't the only Smith that will. As I am always called Squire Smith round in these parts, I want you to direct it to John Smith, Esquire, Smithville, Down East, and it will come to me straight as a hair. And if you want to hear anything more about our folks, jest say so in your paper, and I'll scratch down a line or two, once in awhile, and send it to you. So I remain your friend and constant reader,

JOHN SMITH, ESQUIRE.

DRAMATICK SKETCHES.

EMILY.

BY MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

SCENE—The inside of a cottage.—AMELIA, at work, singing; MAURICE enters during her song.

SONG.

THE sun is career'ing in glory and might
Mid the deep blue sky and the cloudlets white;
The bright wave is tossing its foam on high,
And the summer breezes go lightly by;
The air and the water dance, glitter and play—
And why should not I be as merry as they!

The linnets are singing the wild wood through;
The fawn's bounding footstep skims over the dew;
The butterfly flits round the flowering tree;
And the cowslip and blue-bell are bent by the bee.
All the creatures that dwell in the forest are gay—
And why should not I be as merry as they!

AMELIA. Ah! art thou there? I thought I was alone.

Hasn't thou been long returned?

MAURICE. Even now.

AMELIA. I'm glad;

For I would feel thy presence—as I used
When I, a conscious girl, if thou didst come
Behind my chair, knew thee without the aid
Of eye or ear. A wife's love is as strong,
Her sense should be as quick.

MAURICE. But maiden love

Is mixed with shame, and doubt, and consciousness,

Which have a thousand eyes, a thousand ears.

AMELIA. Thou art pale. Nay, if thou smilest

Thou wilt be pale no longer: thy rich smile

Is fitly wedded to a varying blush.

That flutters tremulously in thy fair cheek,

Like shivering wings of new-caught butterflies.

Ah, there it is!

AMELIA. Flatterer!

MAURICE. But thou wast pale,

Stooping so long o'er that embroidery,

That irksome tool. Go forth into the air.

AMELIA. Not yet: there is still light enough to work;

I have one flower to finish. Then I'll fly

To the sweet joys of busy idleness,

To our sweet garden. I am wanted there—

So William says; the freshening showers to-day

Have scattered my carnations; I must raise

Their clear and odorous beauties from the dark

Defiling earth.

MAURICE. That task is done.

AMELIA. By thee?

After thy hard day's toil? Oh what a fond

And foolish lover-husband I have got!

Art thou not weary?

MAURICE. Only just enough

To feel the comfort, sweetest, of repose;

Of such repose as this, here at thy feet

Extended, and my head against thy knee.

AMELIA. Even as that sweet and melancholy prince,

Hamlet the Dane, lay at Ophelia's feet,

His lady-love. Wast thou not thinking so?

MAURICE. I was.

Amelia. And I was likening thee to one—
Dost thou remember 'tis the prettiest moment
Of that most marvellous and truest book—
When her so dear Sir Charles at Harriet's feet
Lay turning up his bright face smilingly.
Dost thou remember?
Maurice. Banterer! Where is William?
Amelia. That is a secret. Do not question me,
Or I shall tell. He will be shortly back.

(Sings.)

The linnet is singing the wild wood through,
The fawn's bounding footstep skims over the dew;
The butterfly flits round the flowering tree;
And the cowslip and blue-bell are bent by the bee.
All the creatures that dwell in the forest are gay—
And why should not I be as merry as they!
And why should not I be as merry as they!

Maurice. How much thou lovest that song!
Amelia. He loves it so,
Our William: if far off within the wood
He do but catch one clear and ringing note
Of that wild chase and strain, he scuds along
With his small pretty feet, like the young brood
Of the hen-partridge for their evening call.

Maurice. Well but where is he?
Amelia. Guess.
Maurice. Nay, tell me, love.
Amelia. To-day, noon, returning from the farm,
Where on some trifling errand I had sent him,
He left the path in chase of that bright insect
The burnished dragon-fly, with net-work wings
So beautiful. His shining guide flew on,
Tracing the channel of the rippling spring
Up to its very source. There William lost him:
But looking round upon that fairy scene
Of tangled wood and babbling waters clear,
He found a fairy carpet; strawberries
Spread all about, in a rich tapestry
Of leaves and blooming fruit: and he is gone,
With his own basket that his father made him,
His own dear father, to bring home his prize
To that dear father.

Maurice. Prithce, love, say on;
This is a tale which I could listen to
The livelong day.
Amelia. And will it not be sweet
To see that lovely boy, blushing all over,
His fair brow reddening, and his smiling eyes
Filling with tears, his scarlet lips far ruddier
Than the red berries, stammering and forgetting
The little pretty speech that he hath come,
But speaking in warm kisses! Will it not Be sweet to see my precious William give
The very first thing he can call his own
To him who gives him all? My dearest husband,
Betray me not. Pretend an ignorance;
And wonder why that cream and bread stand there,
And why that china bowl. Thy precious boy!

Maurice. Thy precious boy! Amelia, that child's heart
Is like thee as his face.
Amelia. Laker to thee
Are both—our blessing! What a world of love
Dwells in that little heart!
Maurice. Too much! too much!
He is too sensitive. I would he had An airy playmate full of mirth and jests.
Amelia. Nature's his playmate; leaves and flowers and birds
And the young innocent lambs are his companions;
He needs no other. In his solitude
He is as happy as the glittering beetle
That lives in the white rose. My precious boy!
Maurice. What are these? Tears! My own Amelia,
Weep'st thou for happiness? What means this rain
That falls without a cloud? Fy! I must chide thee.

Amelia. Yes; thou art right! Useless, not causeless, tears!
They will have way. Forgive me, dearest husband!
This is our wedding-eve. Seven years ago
I stole, a guilty wanderer, from my home—
My old paternal home!—and with the gush
Of motherly love, another thought rushed in—
My father!

Maurice. My Amelia!
Amelia. Seven years
Have pass'd since last I saw him;—and that last!
The pangs of death were in my heart, when I Approached to say, "goodnight!" He had been harsh
All day; had press'd Sir Robert's odious love,
Had taunted at thy poverty—my Maurice!
But suddenly, when I all vainly tried
To falter out, "goodnight," in his old tone
Of fond familiar love, and with the name
Which from his lips seemed a caress, he said,
God bless you, Emily! That blessing pierced
My very soul. Off in the dead of night
I seem to hear it. Would he bless me now!
Oh no! no! no!

Maurice. My own beloved wife,
Think not too deeply. There will come a time—
Amelia. Oh Maurice! all the grandeur that she left,
The splendid vanities, ne'er cost thy wife
A sigh, contented in her poverty,
Happy in virtuous love. That kind voice,
That tender blessing, that accustomed name
Of fondness!—Oh! they haunt my very dreams;
They crowd upon my waking thoughts; then most
When some sweet kindness of my lovely boy,
Some sign of glorious promise, tells my heart
How little I deserve!

Maurice. My Emily!

Amelia. No, not from thee, not even from thee that name.
'Tis sacred to those dear and honoured lips
That ne'er will breathe it more. I am ungrateful
Thus to repine, whilst thou and our dear boy—

Where can he now be loitering! These dark clouds
Portend a storm.

Maurice. Already the large drops
Come pattering on the vine leaves. I will seek—

Enter WILLIAM.

Amelia. He's here. My William, wherefore didst thou stay
So long! and where's the basket?

William. Kiss me first.

Amelia. Now, where's the basket?

William. I had filled it half,

When a strange gentleman came through the wood,
And sat down by me.

Amelia. Did he eat the strawberries?

William. Dear mother, no. He talked to me, and then

I could not gather them.

Amelia. What said he, dearest?

William. He asked my name and yours, and where I dwelt,
And kissed me.

Amelia. And what else?

William. Called me dear boy,

Said that a storm was coming on, and asked
If I would go with him.

Maurice. Ha! what saidst thou

To that, my William!

William. No. But then I prayed him

To come with me to my dear home. Look there!

Do you not see that tall man in the porch,
His head against the woodbine! That is he.

Amelia. Dear William, bring him in. [Exit MAURICE.

William. I am so sorry

That it is grown so dark, you will not see

What a sweet face he has. Only he's older,

I think he's like you, mother; and he kissed me

As you do now, and cried—

Amelia. Oh can it be—

Re-enter MAURICE with LORD GLENHAM.

Lord Glen. If I intrude—

Amelia. That voice! Oh father! father!

Maurice. Oh pardon!

Lord Glen. Madam!

Amelia. I'm your daughter—

Call me so, father! for these seven long years

I have not seen your face. Disown me not!

Call me your daughter! Once from your dear lips

Let me hear that dear sound! Call me your Emily,

And bless my dear dear child! For such a blessing

I'd be content to die. William, kneel here;

Hold up your innocent hands.

Lord Glen. Rise, madam; rise.

Amelia. Oh call me once your daughter, only once,

To still my longing heart! My William, pray

For your poor mother.

William. Oh, forgive us, sir;

Pray, pray forgive us!

Lord Glen. Madam, I have sought

A half hour's shelter here from this wild storm;

And, as your guest, I pray you to forbear

These harrowing words. I am but lately risen

From a sick bed.

Maurice. My wife, compose thyself;

Retire awhile. [Exit AMELIA.

Please you to sit, my lord.

Lord Glen. I thank you, sir.—You have a pleasant cottage,

Prettyly garlanded with rose and woodbine,

And the more useful vine. Has it been long

Your home?

Maurice. Five years.

Lord Glen. You have left the army?

Maurice. Yes.

There was no chance of war; nor could I drag

My sweet Amelia through the homeless wanderings

Of a poor soldier's life. This is a nest,

However lowly, warm and full of love

As her own heart. Here we have been most happy.

Re-enter AMELIA, with a light and a basket.

Maurice (meeting her). Thou tremblest still.

Amelia. I could not stay away.

It is such joyful pain to look upon him;

To hear his voice;—I could not stay away.

William, there is my basket. Offer it.

Lord Glen. No, my dear boy.

Amelia. Now blessings on his head

For that kind word!

Lord Glen. Surely she was not always

So thin and pale!—Your husband says, Amelia,

That you are happy.

Amelia. I have only known

One sorrow.

Lord Glen. Ye are poor.

Amelia. Not that! not that!

Lord Glen. You have impaired my blessing on your son;

I bless him.

Amelia. On my knees I offer up

My thanks to heaven, and thee. A double blessing

Was that, my father! on my heart it fell

Like balm.

Lord Glen. I will do more. Give me that boy,

And he shall be my son. Give me that boy.

Amelia. My boy! Give up my boy!

Lord Glen. Why he must be

A burden. Ye are poor.

Amelia. A burden! William!

My own dear William!

Lord Glen. Miserably poor

Ye are. Deny it not.

Maurice. We earn our bread

By honest labour.

Amelia. And to work for him

Is such a joy! My William, tremble not!

Weep not, my William! Thou shalt stay with me

Here on my lap, here on my bosom, William!

Lord Glen. Why thou may'st have another child, and then—

Amelia. Oh never one like this—this dearest child

Of love and sorrow! Till this boy was born
Wretchedly poor we were; sick, heartick, desolate,
Desponding; but he came, a living sunbeam!
And light and warmth seemed darting through my breast,
With his first smile. Then hope and comfort came,
And poverty, with her inventive arts,
A friend, and love, pure, firm enduring love;
And ever since we have been poor and happy:
Poor! no, we have been rich! my precious child!
Lord Glen. Bewick these for that child, Amelia,
What fortunes thou dost spurn. His father's love
Perhaps is wiser.

Amelia. Maurice, say.

Maurice. My lord,

'Tis every whit as fond. You have my thanks.

But in a lowly station he may be Virtuous and happy.

William. Mother, let me stay

And I will be so good.

Amelia. My darling, yes;

Thou shalt not leave me, not for the wide world.

Lord Glen. Thou need'st not clasp him so against thy bosom;

I am no ruffian, from a mother's breast

To pluck her child—Amelia, as his arms

Wind round thy neck, so thou a thousand times

Hast clung to mine; as on his snowy brow

Thy lips are sealed, so mine a thousand times

Have prest thy face, with such a love, Amelia,

As thou dost feel for him.

Amelia. Oh father! father!

Lord Glen. Thou wert a motherless babe, and I to thee Supplied both parents. Many a night have I

Hung over thy sick bed, and prayed for thee

As thou dost pray for him. And thou, Amelia,

Didst love me then.

Amelia. Did love! Oh never, never

Can such love pass away! 'Tis twined with tender care,

Lord Glen. Then after eighteen years of life care,

Fond hopes, and fond fears, didst thou not fly

From me, thy father, with a light gay youth,

A love of yesterday! Didst thou not leave me

To die of a broken heart! Amelia, speak!

Didst thou not?

Amelia. Father! this is worse than death.

Lord Glen. Didst thou not! Speak.

Amelia. I did. Alas! I did.

Lord Glen. Oh miserably have my days crept on Since thou didst leave me! Very desolate

Is that proud splendid home! No cheerful meals;

No evening music; and no morning rides

Of charity or pleasure. Thy trim walks

Are overgrown; and the gay pretty room,

Which thou didst love so well, is vacant now;

Vacant and desolate as my sick heart.

Amelia, when thou saw'st me last, my hair

Was brown as thine. Look on it now, Amelia,

Maurice. My lord, this grief will kill her. See, she writes

Upon the floor.

Lord Glen. And must I go still desolate?

I might have found a comfort, had I had

Something to live for still, something to love;

If she who robbed me of my child had given

Her child instead—but all is over now!

She would not trust her father. All! Farewell!

Amelia (starting up). Take him, whilst I have life to bid thee! Take him!

Nay, cling not to me, boy! Take, take him—Maurice!

William. I will not leave you, mother.

Amelia. Hush! hush! hush!

My heart is breaking—William—Maurice, speak!

Maurice. Dearest and best, be it as thou hast willed.

I owed thee a great sacrifice, Amelia;—

And I shall still have thee!

Lord Glen. Thou giv'st him, then?

Maurice. I do. But for his own sake, good my lord,

Let not my son be called distressed, particularly one in a middle or humble life, where his duty, and it is consequently to be hoped her pleasure lies, in superintending and assisting in all domestic matters; but she may be always neat-well appointed. And as certainly as a virtuous woman is a crown of glory to her husband, so assuredly is a slovenly woman a crown of thorns.

WELLBESINGS.—"Von more embrace before we part," as the bear said to the boy down east the other day.—"I have taken some pains to come in," as the tutor said to the publican, when he drove his head through the window.—"How irresistibly kissing you are,"

as the thief said to the hangman when he tied the rope to his neck.

"I like your promises better than your conclusion," as the man said when they were taking him to be hanged. "You are more familiar than agreeable," as the debtor said when the constable tapped him on the shoulder.

ADVICE GRATIS.—If you are in law, get out; if you are out, stay on. If you are a bachelor, marry anon—if you cannot marry, drown

